So, also, in Ruth v. Oberbrunner, 40 Wis. 238, it was held that even though the statute was silent in respect to giving notice to parties interested in the application for judgment assigning the estate, such judgment was no bar to a subsequent action by the heirs against one taking under a testamentary provision alleged to be invalid; and that the notice required to be given of the application for the probate of the will did not have the effect to bring all parties interested in the estate before the probate court, so that without further notice the heir would be concluded in respect to the title of realty under a final order of distribution. The court said: "The proofs show that the plaintiffs resided in Germany; and the court found that no notice, either actual or constructive, was ever served upon them or either of them, of the proceeding for the distribution or assignment of the estate, prior to the time of the making of the order. We fully agree with the circuit court that such a notice was essential, and that the want of it deprived the probate court of jurisdiction to enter an order or judgment assigning the estate to the defendants, which would affect the rights of the plaintiffs. Failure to give the notice was not an irregularity or error merely, but it went to the jurisdiction of the court. It is a fundamental principle in the administration of justice, that no one shall be deprived of his property without his day in court, and having an opportunity to be heard. This principle is not always observed in the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) enactment of statutes, but it should ever be insisted upon and maintained, unless, by express words or strong implication, the legislature dispenses with the necessity of giving notice to a party before his rights are adjudicated. This remark is made in answer to the argument that, as the statute is silent in respect to giving notice to parties interested, of the application for judgment assigning the estate, it need not therefore be given. We can draw no such inference from that omission. It may be true that the statute nowhere requires previous notice to be given of the application for this order or judgment, while, in the subsequent sections, in regard to the partition of the real estate, provision is made for giving notice of that proceeding to the parties in interest. But we do not feel warranted in presuming from these facts that the legislature intended the judgment assigning the real estate should be made without some notice to the heir. If the order of distribution has the effect claimed for it, it is conclusive upon the question of title to real state, and may transfer it absolutely from the heir to the devisee under a void will. That a judgment attended with such grave results may be rendered by the probate court without notice to the heir, we are unwilling to hold until the legislature so declares by express words."

In Van Matre v. Swank, 147 Wis. 93, 131 N. W. 982, it was held that an order of distribution assigning a homestead in fee to the widow did not bind persons not before the court.

In Canfield v. Canfield, 55 C. C. A. 169, 118 Fed. 1, which was a bill for an accounting against a testamentary trustee, it was held that a decree of the probate court distributing the trust property and funds as property of the estate was void as against an heir of the cestui que trust, who was the real owner of the property, but who was not made a party to the proceedings.

In Rich v. Victoria Copper Min. Co. 77 C. C. A. 558, 147 Fed. 380, it was held that an order of distribution was no bar to an action for ejectment involving the title to the property distributed, where no notice of any application for such order had been given.

Section 3779 of the Compiled Laws of Utah 1907 contains in substance the principle of the decisions that when the world is summoned into an estate by the publication of notice, all persons interested must take notice of the laws of the state where the property is situate, and that such proceeding is due process of law.

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant brought this action as a vendee of certain real estate to recover damages for a breach of an agreement to convey a marketable title by the respondent as vendor. Upon a trial to the court, the title was held marketable, and therefore that the agreement had not been breached, and judgment was entered accordingly, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

The judgment is based upon an agreed statement of facts, and hence no findings were made by the court. The facts agreed upon are, substantially, as follows:

That on and prior to the 12th day of July, 1883, one Joseph Toronto was the owner in fee simple of the real estate which appellant purchased from respondent; that said Toronto, on said 12th day of July, 1883, died intestate in Salt Lake county; that thereafter, on the 1st day of December, 1900, after due notice, the district court of Salt Lake county, in its capacity and while acting as the probate court of said county, duly appointed one Joseph B. Toronto administrator of the estate of said Joseph Toronto, deceased; that said Joseph B. Toronto duly qualified and discharged the duties as administrator of said estate; that the petition praying for letters of administration, among other things, also stated the names and residences of the several persons who, it was alleged, constituted all the heirs of said deceased; that an inventory and appraisement of the property belonging to said estate were duly made and filed, and notice to creditors duly published as provided by law; that after fully administering said estate said administrator, on the 4th day of April, 1902, filed his final account in said court, and therewith also filed an agreement signed by all the persons claiming to be the only heirs at law of said deceased, and asked that said estate, consisting wholly of real estate, be distributed among the persons named in said application for distribution; that no notice, either by publication or otherwise, was ever had or given of the hearing on said application for distribution; that on said 4th day of April, upon a waiver of notice by all of such heirs, and without any other or further notice, a hearing was had upon said application for distribution, and a decree was entered by said court, by the terms of which said court settled and approved the final account of said administrator, distributed and partitioned the real estate of which said Joseph Toronto died seized among the several persons who claimed to be his heirs. The application and decree of distribution are made a part of the statement of facts.

The application for distribution, among other allegations, in substance, also contained the following: That all the debts and taxes due from said deceased had been paid; that all the heirs were of full age; that said deceased left no personal property, and the names of the heirs are given as they appear in the petition praying for letters of administration, and the part to be allotted to each is fully described; that all of the heirs and distributees joined in the application; and that they each and all waived notice of the application for distribution. The application is duly signed by all the persons named therein, and is duly verified.

In the decree were also contained the following findings: "The above distributees are all the heirs of said deceased and the only persons interested in said decedent's estate, and all . . . have duly and regularly waived and dispensed with notice of the hearing . . . for distribution. . . . That said court has full jurisdiction of all the heirs of said deceased, . . . and full jurisdiction . . . to distribute all the property of said deceased as the same is herein partitioned and distributed." The portion assigned to each person is specifically described.

Appellant concedes that the appointment of the administrator and the proceedings were regular and according to law up to the time of making distribution. He, however, asserts that the failure to give any notice of any kind of the hearing on the application for distribution makes the decree of distribution void as to all persons who may have or claim to have any interest in said estate, except those who signed the waiver of notice or participated in the distribution. In other words, appellant contends that such a notice is jurisdictional, and that a decree of distribution without a notice is vulnerable to collateral attack. Distribution to the interested parties without notice, it is asserted, amounts to the taking of property without due process of law.

In this case it will be observed that no presumption that notice was given may be indulged, since it is admitted that no notice of any kind was given, but that the publishing or giving of such a notice was waived by the several persons who claim to constitute the heirs of the decedent. No doubt, if such a notice is jurisdictional, as appellant asserts, then the decree cannot be binding except on those who participated in it, since the persons who claim to be the only heirs could not, by such a claim, exclude or bind others who may have or claim to have an interest in the estate. The whole question therefore hinges upon whether notice of the hearing on the application for distribution is essential to give the court jurisdiction. Upon this question the courts are not in perfect harmony. Much of the diversity of opinion, however, arises from the fact that the appellate courts have not always agreed upon the character of probate proceedings, nor upon the status of probate courts. Some of the courts hold that probate courts are courts of special and limited jurisdiction, whose records must affirmatively disclose jurisdiction; while others hold that they are to be treated as courts of general jurisdiction, with all the presumptions incident to such courts. Again, the appellate courts generally regard probate proceedings as proceedings in rem, while a small number apparently treat such proceedings as in personam. That is, while such proceedings are, as a general rule, regarded by all courts as proceedings in rem, yet some of the courts, when they come to apply the doctrine of notice, seem to disregard the rule applicable to proceedings in rem, and apply the rule applicable to proceedings in personam. We make this observation for the reason that, if these distinctions are not kept in mind when the cases are examined, the reader may easily become confused, and may conclude that the conflict among the courts with respect to probate proceedings is much greater than it really is. The divergence that has arisen among the appellate courts with respect to the effect to be given to the judgments of probate courts, and the reasons therefor, are in part stated in § 145 of volume 1, 2d ed. of Woerner on American Law of Administration. The following are some of the well-considered cases which hold that probate proceedings are, in their nature, proceedings in rem, and to which the doctrine of notice in such proceedings applies: Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. 319, 11 L. ed. 283; Sheldon v. Newton, 3 Ohio St. 494; Wilson v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 553, 90 C. C. A. 503, 164 Fed. 819; Good v. Norley, 28 Iowa, 188 (by a divided court); Mohr v. Manierre, 101 U. S. 417, 25 L. ed. 1052; Simmons v. Saul, 138 U. S. 439, 34 L. ed. 1054, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369; Garrett v. Boeing, 15 C. C. A. 209, 37 U. S. App. 42, 68 Fed. 51; Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 591, 15 Pac. 769; Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, 46 Pac. 736; Ladd v. Weiskopf, 62 Minn. 29, 69 L.R.A. 785, 64 N. W. 101; Clark v. Rossier, 10 Idaho, 348, 78 Pac. 358, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 231. The following text writers also state the rule to be as given in the foregoing cases: Waples, Proceedings in Rem, § 162; 2 Black, Judgm. §§ 635-639, 794, 808.

This court, in Snyder v. Murdock, 26 Utah, 233, 73 Pac. 22, has also, inferentially at least, held that probate proceedings are in their nature proceedings in rem. In a number of the foregoing cases, it is also directly held, as it necessarily must be, that a decree of distribution is a proceeding in rem, and not in personam. By referring to our statutes upon the subject of administration, it will be seen that such proceedings are treated as proceedings in rem, and not in personam. Section 3817, Comp. Laws 1907, among other things, provides that the petition for letters of administration must state the "facts essential to give the court jurisdiction of the case, and, when known to the applicant, he must state the names, ages, and residence of the heirs of the decedent, and the value and character of the property." Section 3818 is as follows: "When a petition praying for letters of administration is filed, the clerk must set the petition for rehearing, and give notice thereof by publication or by posting, and by mailing of notices to the heirs." Section 4026 provides the time for which notice must be given, and this court in a direct proceeding (Re Bunting, 30 Utah, 251, 84 Pac. 109) held that unless the notice is given for the time and in the manner provided in said section, the court acquires no jurisdiction of the proceedings. From what is said in the opinion in that case it is at least inferable that if the notice is given as provided by the statute, the court acquires jurisdiction of the whole case; that is, of the property and of the persons interested in the estate. In other words, from what is there said it would seem that the notice which is given upon the filing of the petition for letters of administration is the jurisdictional notice, the giving of which, when given as required by the statute, brings not only the property, but the persons interested therein, within the jurisdiction of the court. Indeed, no other conclusion seems permissible if § 3779 of our statutes is to be given force and effect. That section reads as follows: "No order or decree affecting the title to real property, heretofore or hereafter made in any probate or guardianship matter, shall be held to be void at the suit or instance of any person claiming adversely to the title of the decedent or ward, or under a title not derived from or through the decedent or ward, on account of any want of notice, defect, or irregularity in the proceedings, or of any defect or irregularity in such order or decree, if it appears that, before the order or decree was entered, the executor, administrator, or guardian, as the case may be, was appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction, upon such notice as was or may be prescribed by law; and in an estate in which a competent court shall have appointed an executor, administrator, or guardian upon due notice, no objection to any subsequent order or decree therein can be taken by any person claiming under the deceased or under the ward, on account of any such want of notice, defect, or irregularity, in any other manner than on direct application to the same court, made at any time before distribution, or on appeal."

Section 4037 provides as follows: "If all persons interested in an estate join in any petition, or signify in writing their assent thereto, notice may be dispensed with, and the hearing had at any time." There are a number of other sections which provide for notice and prescribe the method of procedure, but it is not deemed material to refer to any of them, since to do so would not shed any light upon, or aid in any way in disposing of, the real question before us.

From the provisions contained in § 3779, it seems reasonably clear that probate proceedings are deemed to be proceedings in rem, and that the court acquires jurisdiction of the res—that is, the property of the estate—and of all the persons who have or claim to have any interest in the property, by the notice required to be given for the appointment of an administrator or executor, as the case may be. If this be so, then all other notices provided for, however important they may be in certain cases and under certain circumstances, are, nevertheless, not jurisdictional,—that is, are not made essential in conferring power upon the court to act,—and hence to disregard them would constitute a mere irregularity which would have to be assailed and corrected in a direct proceeding, and, if not so attacked, in the absence of fraud, would be conclusive as to all the world. That such is the effect of that statute is contended by respondent, while appellant asserts the contrary.

Quite a large number of cases in support of both contentions are cited by respective counsel. The leading case cited by counsel for respondent is Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. 319, 11 L. ed. 283. In that case the question of the want of notice of the hearing on application by the administrator to sell real estate of the deceased to pay debts was involved. The question that the statutory notice was not given was raised in a collateral proceeding, and the Supreme Court of the United States in effect held that probate proceedings, in their nature, were proceedings in rem; that the probate court had acquired jurisdiction of both the property and all persons interested therein by the appointment of the administrator, and thereby, through him, obtained possession of the estate with full power to administer the same; that the notice of the hearing to show cause was not jurisdictional, and hence the judgment ordering a sale not assailable in a collateral proceeding. A page 339 of 2 How. Mr. Justice Baldwin, speaking for the court, said: "The record of the county court shows that there was a petition representing some facts, by the administrator, who prayed an order of sale; that the court took those facts which were alleged in the petition into consideration, and for these and divers other good reasons, ordered that he be empowered to sell. It did then appear to the court that there were facts and reasons before them which brought their power into action, and that it was exercised by granting the prayer of the petitioner." It is further said, at page 340 of 2 How. that the provisions of the statute with respect to giving notice to the interested parties of the order to show cause why a license to sell the land should not be granted did "not affect the jurisdiction of the court. They apply only to its exercise." It is further said: "The court having power to make the decree, it can be impeached only by fraud in the party who obtains it. United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 729, 8 L. ed. 561. A purchaser under it is not bound to look beyond the decree; if there is error in it, of the most palpable kind, if the court which rendered it have, in the exercise of jurisdiction, disregarded, misconstrued, or disobeyed the plain provisions of the law which gave them the power to hear and determine the case before them, the title of the purchaser is as much protected as if the adjudication would stand the test of a writ of error; so where an appeal is given, but not taken in the time prescribed by law. These principles are settled as to all courts of record which have an original general jurisdiction over any particular subjects."

In Wilson v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) at page 553, 90 C. C. A. at page 595, 164 Fed. at page 819, Mr. Justice Sanborn states the doctrine in the following language: "A proceeding in a probate court to administer upon the estate of a deceased person is a proceeding in rem, not in personam. The property within the jurisdiction of the court is the defendant, the executor or administrator is its representative, and all claiming any interest in that property under the deceased are parties to the proceeding."

In Sheldon v. Newton, 3 Ohio St. 494, in referring to the effect that the failure to give the heirs notice of an application by the administrator to sell real estate to pay debts has upon the jurisdiction of the court, the supreme court of Ohio uses the following language: "The heir was required to be made a party to the proceeding with a view to his having notice; but it is nowhere intimated that failure to give the notice should deprive the court of jurisdiction over the property. I am therefore strongly inclined to the opinion that such an omission goes only to the regularity of the proceeding, and not to the jurisdiction of the court." It was also, in effect held that probate proceedings are proceedings in rem, and that, when the jurisdiction of the probate court has once attached through the appointment of an administrator, by the giving of a statutory notice, subsequent notices with respect to the intervening proceedings are not jurisdictional, and a failure to give them does not make the court's decree collaterally assailable.

In speaking of this question, Mr. Chief Justice Dillon, in Good v. Norley, 28 Iowa, at page 208, said: "The following cases relating to administrator's sales, and that, too, under statutes providing that notice of the application should be given in terms as strong as in our statute, if not stronger, hold that the proceeding is in rem; that the provision as to notice is directory; and that, if not given, it does not deprive the court of jurisdiction; and hence an order for a sale without such notice, or upon notice alone to the guardian, while irregular, and reversible on appeal, is not void, when collaterally attacked."

In Mohr v. Manierre, 101 U. S. 423, 25 L. ed. 1054, in speaking of the effect of a want of notice in probate proceedings after the court has acquired jurisdiction of the estate, Mr. Justice Field says: "It is apparent from these sections that the publication of notice of the hearing is only intended for the protection of parties having adversary interests in the property, and is not essential to the jurisdiction of the court." (Italics ours.)

For other similar cases relating to probate proceedings, and where like expressions are used, see M'Pherson v. Cunliff, 11 Serg. & R. 422, 14 Am. Dec. 642; Garrett v. Boeing, 15 C. C. A. 209, 37 U. S. App. 42, 68 Fed. 51; Tilton v. Coffield, 93 U. S. 163, 23 L. ed. 858; Ladd v. Weiskopf, 62 Minn. 29, 69 L.R.A. 785, 64 N. W. 101; Clark v. Rosier, 10 Idaho, 348, 78 Pac. 358, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 231.

The only question therefore is: Did the district court of Salt Lake county, while acting as probate court, have jurisdiction of the property of the deceased and of the parties interested therein? While the probate proceedings in their nature are proceedings in rem, it does not follow that no notice of any kind to the interested parties is necessary in order to bind them. If the court, however, has once acquired jurisdiction of the property and of the parties, by the giving of the statutory notice, it is not easy to perceive how a judgment or decree affecting either or both is collaterally assailable by anyone interested in the property, although he may at any such proceeding, either by himself or through an attorney, have taken no part therein. When the notice for the appointment of an administrator was given as required by statute, we think that the effect of such a notice was to bring all the parties who had or acquired any interest in the estate into court. We cannot agree with counsel for appellant that the effect of this notice was only to bring the parties into court for the one purpose of appointing the administrator. While this was its immediate effect, it was clearly not its only purpose or effect. The effect of such a notice is to appoint someone, usually the person named in the petition, to administer the estate, and, for that pur-ness, the court is given full power or jurisdiction over the property belonging to the deceased person. All the interested parties are thus notified that the estate of their ancestor is, in contemplation of law, placed under the charge and control of the court, and that the court will, in due course of time, deal with it as the property of the deceased person; that the court, in due course of time, will dispose of it and distribute it to those who may be entitled to it. All parties in interest must take notice of the law, and while they, as a general rule, may rely on what may be termed a presumption that the court will obey the law, they, nevertheless, may not remain silent when the court erroneously departs from or disregards any of the provisions of the law, and then assail the erroneous acts of the court collaterally. We think the more reasonable and the safer doctrine is that, when the statutory notice that an administrator will be appointed is given, such a notice not only is notice to the parties of the fact, but is notice to all the world, that the court, by the appointment of an administrator, will take charge of the property of the deceased to administer it, and that it will finally distribute the remainder, if any, to the heirs of the deceased.

As we have seen, the statute requires that the names, ages, and places of residence of the heirs must be given in the petition for the appointment of an administrator. It seems quite clear to us that this requirement is not for the sole purpose of appointing an administrator. Quite true, the proposed applicant for appointment may be entirely satisfactory to all the interested parties, and they may not desire to contest his appointment; but the court is not absolutely bound to appoint the applicant. Any suitable person, if there be one within the class entitled to appointment other than the applicant, may be appointed. If such another were appointed, could any interested person thereafter collaterally assail such an appointment? We think no one would so contend. If all parties in interest are thus notified, and are brought into court for one purpose which affects their rights by reason of interest in the property of the deceased, why are they not in court generally, and why does not the court, in the absence of an express statute to the contrary, acquire jurisdiction over them for any purpose which may affect their interest? It is unreasonable to suppose that they are partly in court and partly out of court. We think the true distinctions are those laid down by Chief Justice Dillon in Good v. Norley, and by Mr. Justice Field in Mohr v. Manierre, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

supra, namely, that the subsequent notices required by the statute are directory merely, or that they are intended for the convenience and protection of the parties in interest, and are not jurisdictional. The heirs may be numerous, and may live in different parts of this, or even in some other, country. When their names and places of residence are thus given, or when the fact is made to appear that they are unknown, as it must be, in the petition for letters of administration, the probate court is fully advised with respect to the true situation. While the court may assume that, as a matter of law, and for the purpose of jurisdiction, both the known and the unknown heirs are before the court, yet, whether the heirs are living in different states or otherwise, it cannot be presumed that a prudent and careful judge would ordinarily proceed to distribute without notice to the heirs or to some accredited person representing them.

There are various provisions in the statute by which full power and discretion is vested in the probate court with respect to the time and manner of giving notice during the course of administration, and the court may thus, in every case, suit the notice to the circumstances and conditions confronting it. But the mere fact, that such notices may be provided for does not necessarily make them jurisdictional. Even if the legislature had not so stated in express terms, the court should hesitate to declare them so, since much more mischief would result from permitting proceedings in after years, when innocent parties can no longer be placed in statu quo, to be collaterally assailed, than could possibly arise by holding the judgments and proceedings of courts having jurisdiction and power to proceed conclusive as against such attacks. This is the doctrine upon which § 3779, supra, is based. Probate proceedings being in rem, it was within the power of the legislature (within reasonable bounds) to say what should constitute sufficient notice to give the court jurisdiction of the estate, and what should be sufficient to apprise those interested therein that the court will administer and ultimately distribute the property among the parties in interest. Where the notice is sufficient to accomplish this purpose (and no one contends that the notice provided for by our statute is not sufficient), the courts generally hold, and especially the Supreme Court of the United States, which is the final arbiter upon this subject, expressly holds, that such a notice constitutes what is termed "due process of law." Our legislature having thus spoken upon the subject, and by what it has said, has clearly manifested its intention that, when those who claim an interest in the property of a decedent are notified of the petition for the appointment of an administrator of the decedent's estate, they are in court for all purposes, we ought not, except for the most cogent reasons, interfere with the legislative intent as expressed in the law.

In this connection, it is a matter worthy of note that, while notices for various other hearings were expressly provided for in the several sections of our statutes, no express provision is found which required a notice on the application for distribution to be given until 1905, when § 3952 was amended. Laws 1905, p. 68, chap. 60. Such a notice was, however, implied from what is said in other parts of the statute, and expressly so from what is said in § 4037, which we have quoted. But, as we have seen, § 3779 expressly provides that a failure to give such a notice shall not affect the judgments or decrees except upon a direct proceeding; hence the effect of a failure to give the notice is expressly provided for, and had it not been for the earnestness with which able counsel have pressed the matter to our attention, and of its importance and far-reaching effects, we should have felt content to dispose of the question by referring to our statutes merely. Counsel have cited no case, and by a very careful research we have been unable to find any, where, under statutes like ours or under similar ones, any court has held a decree of distribution without special notice void and collaterally assailable. True, there are some expressions in some of the opinions in the cases cited by appellant that might lead one to infer such a result. But upon a close analysis of the opinions, such a conclusion, in our judgment, is not intended. As an instance, we refer to Ruth v. Oberbrunner, 40 Wis. 269, which is one of the few cases in which it is held that a notice for distribution is jurisdictional, and hence, in the absence of such notice, the decree is open to collateral attack. A careful reading of that case, however, will disclose that the supreme court of Wisconsin, in passing judgment, construed the Wisconsin statute as mandatory and jurisdictional. In the court's opinion it is in effect held that, unless the statute dispensed with such a notice, or made it non-essential in express terms, the court would not take the responsibility of declaring it to be so. But it should not be overlooked that the supreme court of Wisconsin has always held to an extreme view with respect to the giving of notices. This is apparent from the early cases in that court, as appears from Gibbs v. Shaw, 17 Wis. 197, 84 Am. Dec. 737, and Bressee 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Stiles, 22 Wis. 120, which latter case was followed in Ruth v. Oberbrunner, supra. This is perhaps better illustrated in the case of Mohr v. Tulip, 40 Wis. 66. In that case the doctrine was carried to its extreme limits, and the decree granting the guardian of an insane person permission to sell without notice to the insane person was held subject to collateral attack upon the sole ground that the insane person was not notified of the application by the guardian. The same plaintiff was, however, taken into the Federal courts, where, under the same state of facts, it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Mohr v. Manierre, 101 U. S. 417, 25 L. ed. 1052, that the notice was not essential nor jurisdictional, and held the decree conclusive upon a collateral attack. Subsequently the supreme court of Wisconsin, in a case by the same plaintiff, namely, Mohr v. Porter, 51 Wis. 487, 8 N. W. 364, modified, and in part overruled, its rulings in Mohr v. Tulip, supra, to conform to the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States in Mohr v. Manierre, supra.

In addition to the Wisconsin case, it may be said that the case of Shriver v. State, 65 Md. 278, 4 Atl. 679, holds that the notice of the application for distribution is jurisdictional. But this case is also based upon a Maryland statute. Mr. Van Fleet, in his work on Collateral Attack, refers to the Wisconsin and Maryland cases in § 403 of his work. While it is apparent that he does not agree with those courts, nor with the views entertained by them with respect to the effect of such a notice, yet all he says with respect to them is: "The distributees were in court all the time. They had an opportunity to rectify any errors when he came to obtain his final discharge." It will thus be seen that Mr. Van Fleet holds to the general doctrine that the notice for the appointment of an administrator or executor brings not only the property, but all the parties in interest, into court for all the purposes of administering upon the estate in which the application and appointment were made. While we have carefully examined all the cases cited by counsel for appellant, it would subserve no useful purpose to refer to any of them at length. Many of the cases referred to deal with attacks by appeal, and, whatever the expressions in those may be, they are not authoritative when the question is raised upon a collateral attack. The cases, other than those upon a direct attack, to which we have been referred, generally involved a construction of some particular statute which the courts held controlling, and which had not been followed.

It is further contended, as we understand appellant, that no one except the persons named in the decree could have appealed from it. He asserts that, if this be not conceded, an appeal would nevertheless have been of no avail, since the record would not have disclosed that anyone else had any interest except those mentioned in the decree. The contention, in our judgment, is not tenable. While the decree is not assailable on collateral attack, it, nevertheless, would have been so upon a direct attack by appeal. Indeed, § 3779 expressly authorizes a decree to be thus attacked. By application to the probate court, anyone having an interest could make his interest appear, even after judgment, and thus prosecute an appeal. True, as a general rule, only parties to the record may prosecute appeals. But this is upon the ground that, in ordinary proceedings, parties and their privies are the only persons bound by the judgment. But, as we have said, probate proceedings are proceedings in rem, and, when the statutory notice is given to bring the property and the persons interested therein within the jurisdiction of the court, all the interested parties are bound by the judgment and decree. Such cases, therefore, as shown by Mr. Elliott in his Appellate Procedure, § 136, constitute an exception to the general rule, and parties in interest may appeal notwithstanding the fact that they are not identified by the record. They have the right to make the record show their interest, or that they claim an interest, and when this fact is made to appear they may appeal and attack the judgment upon any ground that parties might otherwise attack it. In this case anyone interested might have shown the irregularity of the proceeding, and that by reason of that fact he was prejudiced in his rights; and the cases are numerous where the appellate courts have reversed judgments or decrees for such irregularities. We have no doubt such would have been the rule in this case upon a proper showing. In this case it is conceded that every person who claimed an interest in the estate was brought into court for the purpose of the appointment of an administrator, and that anyone could have appealed from the order of appointment, and unless the appointment was attacked on appeal, no one could have assailed it collaterally. If, therefore, the persons interested in the estate were parties for that purpose, when, how, and why did they, or any one of them, cease to be parties for the purpose of 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

prosecuting any appeal authorized by statute? We confess our inability to perceive why any and every interested person could not have appealed from any appealable order or decree; and for the same reasons we can see no good reason why all are not bound. We remark that we do not wish to be understood as passing upon the effect of a failure to give notice upon an application for the sale of real estate by an administrator. Upon that subject our statutes speak in explicit terms, and we refrain from expressing any opinion.

It is, however, urged that a title may be good, and still not be marketable. This, no doubt, is true. It may be that there is an apparent outstanding interest in some unknown heir, who, if alive, would be entitled to claim such interest. Several questions might thus arise, namely: Is the unknown heir alive? If not, did he survive the ancestor, and, if he did not, are there any of his heirs who succeed to his rights? It may also be the case that, if it were conceded that an unknown heir may still survive, yet that his interest is barred by an adverse possession. There are numerous cases in the books where such questions are discussed.

The case of Ferry v. Sampson, 112 N. Y. 415, 20 N. E. 387, is a case where there was an apparent outstanding interest in an unknown heir. This heir had, however, been absent and unheard of for forty years at the time the case came on for trial, and the court held that the presumption of his death, and that he left no heirs, under the facts and circumstances of that case, was so strong as not to leave such a doubt as would make the title unmarketable. The title was therefore held marketable, and the vendee was required to complete his purchase.

In another case, decided by the same court a year later (Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 253, 9 L.R.A. 591, 17 Am. St. Rep. 634, 24 N. E. 195), and cited by counsel for appellant, an opposite result was reached. The result in the latter case, however, was based upon the fact that the unknown heir had not been unheard of for a sufficient period of time to constitute a presumption sufficiently strong to remove the doubt that he might return and claim his interest.

Another illustration of this character is presented by the case of Swayne v. Lyon, 97 Pa. 436, also cited by appellant. In that case the title was based upon a judgment which was held to be open to collateral attack by a party who had some right to or interest in the land in question. The court therefore held the title so doubtful as to make it unmarketable.

Another illustration is found in the case of Hedderly v. Johnson, 42 Minn. 443, 18 Am. St. Rep. 521, 44 N. W. 527. That case involved the construction of an instrument from which it was to be determined whether an easement could or could not successfully be claimed in the property which was the subject of sale. The vendee claimed that, since it was possible that an easement could be claimed in the property, therefore the title was not marketable. The court, however, held that whether an easement could be claimed or not depended upon certain facts which were so clearly established as to leave no reasonable doubt that an easement could not be successfully claimed in the property, and hence the title was held marketable, and the vendee was required to receive it.

While the cases are very numerous, the ones we have cited above illustrate the doctrine quite as well as this could be done by citing a larger number.

It will thus be seen that, even though the title depends upon a question of fact, if the fact upon which the title rests is clearly established, or is undisputed, so as to leave no room for reasonable doubt with regard to the title, it will be held marketable. Maupin on Marketable Title, 2d ed. p. 730. But the title may be doubtful upon questions of law, and hence unmarketable, as well as upon questions of fact. If a doubt arises upon a question of law, it usually arises either by reason of the uncertainty of the meaning of some instrument which affects the title, or from the construction to be given to some general law which in some way is involved. When the doubt is based upon some instrument which directly affects the title, so that if the instrument be construed one way, some third person may have some interest in the land in question, and if construed the other, he will not have any interest, the courts usually refuse to declare the title marketable, or otherwise, unless all the parties in interest are before the court, so that the construction placed upon the instrument will be binding upon all who may be affected by the construction placed upon it. Where, however, the question depends upon the construction of a general law merely, the courts ordinarily pass upon the question regardless of whether all the parties who are alleged to have some interest are before the court or not. Ordinarily, when the question whether the title is marketable depends upon a general law of the land, the title will be held marketable if the court holds the law to be in favor of the title. Maupin, Marketable Title, 2d ed. pp. 713, 714.

from the authorities to this case, how can it be said that the title to the land in question is, or ever was, doubtful so as to be unmarketable, within the meaning of that term? The only objection to the title is that the final decree of distribution made by the probate court, and upon which appellant's title rests, is not binding except upon such persons as were actually before the court and consented to that decree when it was made. It, however, is nowhere alleged, nor is it claimed, that all the parties in interest were not actually before the court. The only claim is that there is a possibility that there may be some others who were not before the court. If all the interested parties were in fact before the court, then no doubt the title would be perfect, since all the parties in interest would be bound by the decree. Can we assume, as a matter of law, that there is an unknown claimant somewhere who will hereafter assert his claim, in the absence of an allegation that such a claimant at one time existed? In all the cases that have come under the writer's observation, there was some claim that at one time at least there was some person in existence who sustained such a relation to the land in question as would give him an interest if still alive. In the case at bar we are asked, however, to assume two things: (1) That an unknown heir once existed; and (2) that he is still alive. If it were claimed that such an heir once existed, it might well be that, under the facts and circumstances of this case, he would not be presumed to be dead; but can it be assumed, without any allegation to that effect, that some heir other than those who were parties to the final distribution ever existed? It might be that if it were conceded that the probate court had not jurisdiction of all the persons who might have, or claimed to have, an interest in the land in question when the decree of final distribution was made, and that the decree was binding only upon those who consented thereto, the title would not be held, as a matter of law, to be so free from doubt that a court would declare it marketable, although there was no allegation that at one time some heir existed who did not consent to the decree, and who was not included in the distribution. But when, as in this case, it is held that the probate court had jurisdiction of all the interested persons, and that the decree of final distribution under our statute is binding upon all whether consenting thereto or not, or whether notified of the application for final distribution or not, how then can it be said that there remains a doubt respecting the title upon the ground before stated? If, in addition to this, it be remembered that there is neither allegation nor claim that any other heir than those named in the decree of final distribution ever existed, and, further, that we have held that, if there were such, they are, nevertheless, bound by the final decree the same as those who were actually present and consented thereto, then how can it be said that this title is any more doubtful than any other title would be that is based upon a decree of final distribution, however perfect the proceedings leading up to such a decree might be? Is it not manifest that, in view of our statute which makes the failure to publish a notice of the character in question a mere irregularity, which must be corrected, if corrected at all, in a direct proceeding, and further that there is not even an allegation or claim that there now exists, or that there ever existed, some person who is not bound by the final decree of distribution upon which the title in question is based, that there is no tangible ground upon which to base a reasonable doubt concerning the marketability of the title in question?

From what has been said, it follows that the district court committed no error in holding that the title in question is a marketable title, and hence that the respondent committed no breach of his agreement to convey a marketable title, in view that he conveyed all that he had agreed to convey.

The judgment is therefore affirmed, with costs to respondent.

McCarty, J., concurs.

Straup, Ch. J., dissenting:

I dissent. On the 17th day of October, 1908, the defendant and respondent sold and conveyed to the plaintiff and appellant certain real estate situate in Salt Lake City. It is alleged in the complaint that at the time of the sale and conveyance, and as part of the same transaction, "the defendant agreed in writing with plaintiff that, in the event the title of said real estate should not be good and marketable, then he, the said defendant, would either take the necessary steps to make the title good and marketable, at his own expense, or that he would pay plaintiff the sum of $150, being the amount which, as estimated by plaintiff and defendant, would be sufficient to defray the expense of any proceeding necessary to render the title to said real estate good and marketable;" that the title to said real estate was not good and marketable; that the plaintiff demanded of the defendant that he either take the necessary steps to render the title good and marketable, or pay the plaintiff the sum of $150 for such purpose; and that the defendant refused and neglected to take any such steps, and also refused and neglected to pay plaintiff any part of the $150. A judgment was demanded against the defendant for the sum of $150. The defendant admitted all the allegations of the complaint except that the title was not good and marketable. Upon an agreed statement of facts, the court found the title good and marketable, and rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant, and dismissed the complaint. The real question, therefore, in the case, is that of marketable title. The agreed statement of facts shows, among other things, that the land in question was owned by Joseph Toronto at the time of his death, who died intestate in 1883. No administrator of his estate was appointed until 1900. The statute required the giving of a notice for the distribution of estates. A general provision of the Probate Code (Comp. Laws 1907, § 4037), however, provides that "if all persons interested in the estate join in any petition or signify in writing their assent thereto, notice may be dispensed with and the hearing had at any time." On the 4th day of April, 1902, certain persons, alleging that they were the heirs of the deceased, petitioned the court to distribute the estate, consisting principally of real estate, to them, and waived the giving of notice. The court thereupon, and on the same day, distributed the property of the estate to them without notice. The land in question was, under such petition, and by such a proceeding, distributed to Frank and Ernest Toronto, heirs of the deceased. They thereafter sold to Whitney, the defendant and respondent. He sold and conveyed it to the plaintiff, the appellant.

I think it is well settled that title to real estate may be good, and yet may not be marketable. It is not necessary to show that the title is bad to establish that it is not marketable. The court may consider and hold the title good, and yet hold it not marketable, if there be sufficient doubt and uncertainty in respect of the title to form the basis of litigation, or if it invites and exposes the party holding the title to litigation. The purchaser is entitled to have a title that will enable him to hold his land in peace, and, if he wishes to sell it, to be reasonably sure that no flaw or doubt will arise to disturb its market value. And if there be doubt, it cannot be thrown upon the purchaser to contest that doubt and encounter the hazards of litigation. If it were otherwise, the purchaser could be compelled to buy a lawsuit, which might be a very serious loss to him both of time and money, even if he ultimately succeeded. These principles are found stated in, and are taken from, the following cases: Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 253, 8 L.R.A. 591, 17 Am. St. Rep. 634, 24 N. E. 195; Herman v. Somers, 158 Pa. 424, 38 Am. St. Rep. 851, 27 Atl. 1050; Townshend v. Goodfellow, 40 Minn. 312, 3 L.R.A. 739, 12 Am. St. Rep. 736, 41 N. W. 1056; Swayne v. Lyon, 67 Pa. 436; Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 179, 9 Am. St. Rep. 189, 18 Pac. 262.

When the Toronto estate was distributed, without notice, to certain persons claiming to be the heirs of the deceased, I think sufficient doubt and uncertainty as to the title arose to render it not marketable, though this court should afterward entertain the opinion in favor of the title, and should decide that the probate court was not without jurisdiction to make the distribution without notice. I do not think that the question is so clear and free from doubt that such an opinion and conclusion, until decided by the court of last resort, cannot fairly and reasonably be questioned by other competent persons. Upon the very question involved, I find, as stated by Mr. Justice Frick, that the authorities, are not in perfect harmony. If, therefore, the courts are divided upon the question, and entertain different conclusions as to the jurisdiction of the court to make such a distribution without notice, I do not see why it should be said that the title of property affected by such a distribution is neither doubtful nor uncertain in this jurisdiction, until the court of last resort has set the matter at rest.

In the next place I am not satisfied with the conclusion reached by the other members of the court, that when a court in a probate proceeding has appointed an administrator, upon proper notice, it thereby obtained jurisdiction of subject-matter and all the parties interested in the estate, for all subsequent proceedings in the course of administration, including a settlement and distribution of the estate, and that whatever action the court thereafter took, or whatever proceedings were thereafter had, though in violation of the prescribed procedure, and of the giving of notice as required by the statute, constituted but irregularities, and did not affect jurisdiction.

I do not think that the adjudged cases go to the extent of holding that when a proper notice has been given for the appointment of an administrator, the court acquired not only jurisdiction to make the appointment, but also acquired jurisdiction, after the appointment, to do all other things in the course of administration, including the distribution of the estate, notwithstanding, to do them, a notice was also required to be given as prescribed by the statute, and that such notice was not given. Neither do I think that § 3779 of the statute is open to such a construction. The first portion of the section provides that no order or decree affecting the title to real property made in any probate matter shall be held void at the suit or instance of any person claiming adversely to the title of the decedent, or under a title not derived from or through the decedent, on account of any want of notice of the decree or irregularity in the proceeding, if made to appear that the administrator was appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction, upon notice as prescribed by law. This is not a suit where a litigant is claiming adversely to the title of the decedent, or under a title not derived from or through the decedent. The latter portion of the section provides that, when a "competent court" shall have appointed an administrator upon due notice, no objection to any subsequent order or decree therein can be taken by any person claiming under the deceased, "on account of any such want of notice," in any other manner than on direct application to the same court "made at any time before distribution," or on appeal. When the statute reads that no objection to any subsequent order, etc., can be taken "on account of any such want of notice," what notice is meant? I think, the notice just mentioned and referred to in the section,—the notice given for the appointment of the administrator. If, for instance, after an administrator has been regularly appointed of an estate in which the decedent left A, B, C, and D surviving as his heirs at law, A, B, and C should thereafter petition the court, and therein allege that they are the only heirs, waive the giving of notice for distribution of the estate, ask the court to distribute all the property of the estate, consisting of real and personal property, to them, I do not think such a decree or judgment of distribution, made on the same day and at the same time of the filing and presentation of the petition, and without notice, would be binding upon D, and would divest him of all right, title, and interest in and to the property of the estate, or bar him from thereafter asserting or claiming any right, title, or interest therein, except on appeal, or "on direct application to the same court made at any time before distribution."

When a distribution is made, as was the case in the Toronto estate, on the same day of the filing and presentation of the petition for distribution, and without notice, I do not see how anyone interested in the distribution or entitled to a distributive share of the estate, and who had no notice of such a proceeding, could "at any time before distribution" apply to the court making the distribution, for relief from such a judgment or decree of distribution. To say that he may assail the judgment on appeal (if it is his good fortune to somehow obtain information within the time, six months, in which an appeal may be taken, that proceedings of distribution had been had, and a judgment rendered) is also but to say that he may directly attack it. To say that he may not attack the judgment except on appeal, "or on direct application to the same court at any time before distribution," is to assert that the judgment has all the binding effect of any other judgment. Under our statute, when a person dies intestate, his property passes to his heirs. Of course, it is subject to debts and expenses of administration. When an administrator is appointed, the property is subject to the control of the court for the purposes of administration. But the statute directs to whom the property shall be distributed, and prescribes the proceedings to be had for distribution. After an administrator has been appointed, on proper notice, the court may not, upon his petition, or another, without notice, take the property away from the heirs and give it to a stranger; nor may the court, without notice of any kind, take it away from one heir entitled to a distributive share, and give all of it to other heirs; nor can it be successfully asserted that such action, so taken in defiance of law and of the requirements of the statute, is but an irregularity, and assailable only on direct attack. When the court takes property from one person to which he is entitled, and gives it to another, such person is entitled to notice, and to his day in court. He is entitled not only to his day in court on an appeal, but to his day in court before the tribunal that takes it away from him.

It, however, is said that the plaintiff neither alleged nor proved that the deceased left legal heirs who were entitled to a distributive share, other than those who petitioned for distribution, waiving notice, and to whom the property was distributed. That implies that if the plaintiff had shown that there was an heir who was entitled to a distributive share, and did not join in the petition waiving notice for distribution, and had not obtained his distributive share, then the court was without jurisdiction to make the distribution. But since the plaintiff did not aver nor prove the existence of such an heir, then the court had jurisdiction. Thus the question of the court's jurisdiction is made to depend upon the further question as to whether the court correctly or incorrectly adjudged the matter brought before it, or as to whether the result reached, when considered in respect of particular facts shown, was right or wrong.

When the proceeding, as here, is a special statutory one, and not in accordance with the course of the common law, the jurisdiction of the court, though a court of general jurisdiction, must affirmatively appear upon the record, and no presumption will be indulged in support of its decree or judgment when such jurisdiction does not thus affirmatively appear. If the jurisdiction of the court is thus made to appear, then the judgment rendered, though erroneous, would be a shield to ward off any claim which an heir or his assigns or representatives might assert to the property in the hands of the plaintiff. But suppose a person who is an heir, and entitled to a distributive share, but who had not joined in the petition for distribution, asserts a claim to his distributive share of the property in the hands of the plaintiff, would the decree or judgment rendered by the court distributing all the property to others, without notice of any kind, be a shield in the hands of the plaintiff against such a claim? If it would, then why would not a judgment of settlement and distribution of an estate also be a shield to a creditor's claim asserted against the property in the hands of a distributee or his assigns, where the settlement and distribution were had without publishing or giving notice to creditors? I do not think it would in either instance. If in a case a settlement and distribution were had without notice to creditors, and the title of a distributee was questioned or assailed for the want of such a notice, it could as well be asserted that, to make the assault successful, it must be averred and shown that there were creditors, as here to assert that the plaintiff was required to aver and show that there were heirs entitled to a distributive share, who had not joined in the petition for distribution, waiving notice.

But, aside from these considerations, the title depending upon a decree of distribution rendered on proceedings without notice was, I think, sufficiently doubtful and uncertain as to expose the plaintiff to the hazards of litigation, and thereby render the title not marketable, until the court of last resort, in a proper proceeding before it, has finally determined and adjudicated that a court in probate proceedings has jurisdiction to render a decree of distribution without notice. Suppose this court, in this proceeding between the plaintiff and the defendant, should now adjudge the title good and marketable, of what avail is the adjudication in the hands of the plaintiff in a case where an heir entitled to a distributive share, and who had not joined in the petition for distribution, waiving notice, asserted a claim against the property in the hands of the plaintiff?

I think, from the terms of the written agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, it may be fairly presumed that the parties themselves thought that sufficient doubt and uncertainty existed with respect to the title by reason of the distribution without notice, as to require some action or proceeding to clear up the title, and that such doubt and uncertainty led to the making of the agreement, by the terms of which the defendant agreed to take such steps or to pay the plaintiff the sum of $150 for such purpose. The defendant, upon demand, refused to do either; and, when he so refused, I think a breach of his contract occurred.

I therefore think that upon the issues, and upon the agreed statement of facts, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that the court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the defendant, and in dismissing the complaint.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

J. J. LEE, Appt.,

INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT OF

(149 Iowa, 345, 128 N. W. 533.)

Judgment — binding effect — person not party.

1. A judgment in favor of a taxpayer, enjoining a school district from paying out money under certain contracts alleged to be invalid, is not a bar to an action by the contractor to recover against the district on quantum meruit for money expended and services rendered in reliance on the contract, unless the contractor was a party to the former proceeding, or so connected therewith as to have had an opportunity to present therein an issue as to his right to recover on quantum meruit.

Party — taxpayer — contractor with district.

2. A taxpayer of a school district who has entered into a contract with it is not, unless expressly made so, a party to a suit by another taxpayer on behalf of himself and all other taxpayers, to enjoin the officers of the district from performing the contract on the ground of its invalidity, so as to be bound by a judgment entered in such proceeding, when he brings an action individually to enforce his claim under the contract.

Same — privity with district.

3. Persons who have contracted with a school district are not so far in privity with the district as to be bound by a judgment enjoining it from carrying out the contract on the ground of its invalidity, in a proceeding to which they are not formally made parties.

Same — becoming witness — effect.

4. One does not become a party to a suit so as to be bound by the judgment, even though he has an interest in the result, by appearing therein to testify as a witness at the call of one of the parties carrying on the litigation.

Same — affecting interests — knowledge of action.

5. One is not necessarily bound by a judgment in an action the result of which may affect his interests, by the fact that he is cognizant of the litigation and is present at the trial.

Judgment — right of intervention — binding effect.

6. The right to intervene in an action does not, in the absence of its exercise, subject one possessing it to the risk of being bound by the result of the litigation.

The above is apparently the only case wherein this specific question has been decided. The doctrine therein asserted, however, finds support in Detroit v. Detroit R. Co. 134 Mich. 11, 104 Am. St. Rep. 600, 95 N. W. 992, 99 N. W. 411, holding that 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) a judgment in favor of a taxpayer against a city or board of public works, restraining the concreting of a street under street car tracks, on the ground that the contract with reference thereto was ultra vires, is not binding upon a street railway company, a party to the contract, but not a party to the taxpayer's suit. The contract in this case was one permitting the construction of a street railroad through the streets of a Statement by McClain, J.:

Plaintiff, as surviving member of the firm of Lee & Harvat, and as assignee of the firm of Cerney & Louis, brought action to recover compensation alleged to have become due to said firms under written contracts made with them by the defendant, under which contracts defendant became bound to pay compensation to said firms for keeping and handling text-books for use in defendant's schools, furnished under alleged contracts, with the publishers of such books. The allegations of the petition in this respect were met by the defendant with averments that no books were furnished by said publishers to the respective firms under any contract with defendant, and that the contracts with said firms were invalid. By way of amendment to his petition, plaintiff alleges as an additional cause of action, that said firms, relying upon representations made by the officers of defendant, rendered services and advanced money in attempting to carry out the terms of said contracts, and recovery was also asked on that ground. A demurrer to the amendment to plaintiff's petition was overruled, whereupon defendant pleaded as a defense to plaintiff's entire cause of action, including the matter alleged in the amendment to the petition, that the whole matter had been adjudicated against this plaintiff in an action brought by a taxpayer against the president and board of directors of the defendant corporation, to enjoin them from paying to the firms now represented by plaintiff any sums of money under the contracts set out in the petition in this case. The plaintiff demurred to the portion of the answer setting up the defense of a prior adjudication, on the ground that the record of such adjudication as pleaded by the defendant, showed on its face that the former action was not between the same parties, and did not involve the same issues. It has been held that a judgment entered in a suit by a taxpayer against a city and a contractor with the city, in which the validity of a contract was sustained, is conclusive as to all the issues in the suit, in a subsequent suit between the contractor and the city. And this is true, although in the former suit the contractor and city occupied toward each other no adversary position. *El Reno v. McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The nature of the former adjudication relied upon by defendant as a bar to this action, and held sufficient on demurrer, will be apparent by reference to the report of the case on appeal to this court. See Ries v. Hemmer, 127 Iowa, 408, 103 N. W. 346. In that case Ries, suing as taxpayer, asked that the officers of defendant be restrained from paying any money under the assumed contracts which plaintiff now sets out in his petition, and this court, holding the contracts to be invalid, reversed the action of the lower court in entering a decree in favor of the defendants.

1. In the former action the issues were whether the officers of the defendant corporation could lawfully pay to the respective firms of booksellers with whom defendant had entered into contract relations, the compensation provided for in such contracts. One of the issues presented in the case now before us was whether the plaintiff, representing said contracting firms, could recover from the defendant, by way of quantum meruit, compensation, for money expended and services rendered in reliance upon such contracts. This cause of action was held by the lower court, on demurrer, to be properly pleaded, and, for the purposes of the present appeal, we must assume that, if the plaintiff could prove the facts alleged, he was entitled to recover. This issue was plainly a wholly different issue from that determined in the former case, which related entirely to the validity of the contracts made between defendant and the respective firms of booksellers, whom plaintiff now represents. We are not now called upon to decide whether in law the allegations of the plaintiff's petition, if true, entitled the plaintiff to recover from the defendant in quantum meruit, notwithstanding the invalidity of the contracts under which money was expended and services were rendered by the firms of booksellers represented by plaintiff. That question was determined by the lower court in favor of the plaintiff, and no appeal from the action of the court in this respect has been taken. Under this state of the record we cannot hold that the adjudication in the former case on the issue involved therein constituted a bar to the recovery by plaintiff under the issues presented by the amendment to plaintiff's petition based upon quantum meruit. It may well be that if the firms represented by plaintiff were parties to the former suit of Ries v. Hemmer, or were so connected with such suit as that they could have had their right to recover on quantum meruit adjudicated therein, then the adjudication was binding on them as to the issue which they might then have presented. It will be necessary, therefore, to consider whether said firms of booksellers were so connected with the former case that the adjudication therein was binding upon them.

2. The plaintiff in the former suit was successful in securing an adjudication against the officers of this defendant, that the contracts made between defendant and the firms represented by plaintiffs were invalid, and no money should be paid to said firms in pursuance with said contracts. The question now to be considered is whether the contracting firms were so related to the former suit that they were bound by the adjudication, for it is conceded that they were not in form made parties to such suit, were not notified of its pendency, and did not take charge of or control the defense. From the record in the former case it plainly appears that the defense was made by the officers of this defendant in its behalf, and that they resisted for defendant the appeal which resulted in a reversal.

It is contended, however, that the firms represented by plaintiff, although not formally parties to the prior adjudication, were bound thereby for two reasons: First, it is said that in the former action, Ries, suing as a taxpayer, represented all the taxpayers of the school district, and an adjudication in his favor was binding upon all the taxpayers, including the members of the contracting firms. Many cases are cited in support of this contention, and of these the following may be here mentioned as typical on the proposition presented: Cannon v. Nelson, 83 Iowa, 242, 48 N. W. 1033; Clark v. Wolf, 29 Iowa, 197; State ex rel. Wilson v. Rainey, 74 Mo. 229; Harmon v. Auditor, 123 Ill. 122, 5 Am. St. Rep. 502, 13 N. E. 161; Sauls v. Freeman, 24 Fla. 209, 12 Am. St. Rep. 190, 4 So. 525. And see note to Henderson County v. Henderson Bridge Co. 105 Am. St. Rep. 213, where other cases are cited. These cases are predicated upon the thought that, where a taxpayer secures an adjudication in the interest of all taxpayers as to the invalidity of an alleged indebtedness of a public corporation, enforcement of which would affect him and all other such taxpayers alike, the question cannot again be litigated in a suit brought by another taxpayer seeking the same relief. As stated in Cannon v. Nelson, 83 Iowa, 242, 48 N. W. 1033, the rule is that "a judgment against a county or its legal representatives in a matter of general interest to all the people thereof—as one respecting the levy and collection of a tax—is binding not only on the official representatives of the county named in the proceeding as defendants, but upon all the citizens thereof, though not made parties defendant by name." Applying that rule to this case, the adjudication in the action brought by Ries was binding upon this defendant and upon all the taxpayers of the defendant corporation, with the result that no other taxpayer suing as such could maintain another action with reference to the right or duty of the defendant to pay claims founded upon the contracts in question.

But it is plain that this plaintiff is not suing as a taxpayer, and that neither he nor the firms whom he represents have now, or ever had, any claims which they were asserting as taxpayers either in their own right or in behalf of the public. Certainly it is not true that an adjudication in an action by a taxpayer against a public corporation to which an alleged creditor of the corporation is not made a party can bind such creditor as to the validity of his claim. Lyons v. Cooledge, 89 Ill. 529. The case of Scotland County v. Hill, 112 U. S. 183, 28 L. ed. 692, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 93, relied upon by counsel for appellee, is not in point, for in that case, involving the right of the plaintiff to recover on county bonds, it was found that there was a prior adjudication in an action to which a holder of other bonds was expressly made a party, that such bonds were invalid, and the court therefore held that plaintiff, having acquired his bonds with notice of the pendency of the prior suit affecting their validity, could not again litigate that question. We reach the conclusion without difficulty or doubt that the adjudication in behalf of Ries as taxpayer against the officers of the defendant determining the invalidity of the contracts in question, and enjoining the payment of money by defendant under such contracts, was not binding upon the other parties to such contracts, unless such parties were in fact so related to the suit as to be bound by the result in consequence of such relation. The fact that such contracting parties were also taxpayers, even if alleged, would be wholly immaterial and without bearing upon the question as to the effect upon them of such prior adjudication.

3. It may be conceded that an adjudication binds not only the parties thereto, but others who are in privity with them. It is not necessary to enter into an elaborate discussion as to who may be deemed privy in this sense; for, under the facts of this case, privity between plaintiff and either party to the prior adjudication is clearly negatived. There was no privity of interest between this plaintiff and the plaintiff in the injunction suit, for their interests were plainly and confessedly hostile. Neither was there any privity between this plaintiff and the officers of this defendant, who were the defendants in the injunction suit; for, while such officers did make a defense, the maintenance of which would have been to the advantage of the parties whom this plaintiff represents, they were not employed by such parties to do so, nor were they under any obligations to them in that respect. Such parties and the defendant corporation, represented in that suit by its officers, were mutually contracting parties, and, as to the question respecting the validity of the contracts, there was necessarily hostility of interest between them. Failure of the defendant in that suit to maintain the defense that the contracts were valid, or, indeed, failure to interpose any such defense, could not plainly be binding upon other parties to the contracts, unless they had been made parties to the litigation or had voluntarily associated themselves with the officers of this defendant in attempting to sustain the validity of the contracts.

The case is very well illustrated by those cases in which it has been held that, in a suit by stockholders against a corporation to enjoin its officers from carrying out a contract alleged to be illegal and prejudicial to the stockholders, the other party to the alleged illegal contract is a necessary party to the suit. Central R. Co. v. Mills, 113 U. S. 249, 28 L. ed. 949, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Grayson, 119 U. S. 240, 30 L. ed. 382, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190. Thus, in Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Co. L. R. 20 Eq. 474, a suit by shareholders in an incorporated company to restrain its officers from making alleged illegal payments to the officers of another company, it was said: "If the subject-matter of the suit is an agreement between the corporation acting by its directors or managers and some other corporation, or some other person strangers to the corporation, it is quite proper and quite usual to make that other corporation or person a defendant to the suit, because that other corporation or person has an interest, and a great interest, in arguing the question and having it decided once for all, whether the agreement in question is really within the powers or without the powers of the corporation of which the corporator is a member. So that in these cases you must always bring before the court the other corporation." As illustrating the want of privity between the officers and one who is making a claim against the corporation, which a stockholder seeks to enjoin the corporation from paying, it is pertinent to refer to the case of Mexican Ore Co. v. Mexican Guadalupe 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Min. Co. (C. C.) 47 Fed. 351, in which it was held that, while an injunction in such a case was binding upon an officer of the defendant corporation acting as such, so that he might be punished for violating it, although not made a party in name, yet, after resignation as an officer, he might with impunity proceed to litigate his claim with the corporation.

The only actual connection which the parties represented by plaintiff are alleged to have had with the litigation between Ries and the officers of this defendant is that resulting from the fact that one of the members of each of the firms now represented by plaintiff was called as a witness and testified in behalf of the defendants in that suit in relation to the validity of the contracts involved, and that each of said witnesses was present during a part or all of the trial of said case and fully cognizant of the proceedings therein. No cases are cited by counsel for appellee in support of the proposition that one becomes party to a suit, even though he may have an interest in the result, by appearing therein to testify as a witness at the call of one of the parties carrying on the litigation; and we venture to think that no such cases can be found. The proposition is manifestly unsound and unreasonable. Equally without support in any adjudicated case to which our attention has been called is the contention for appellee that one who is cognizant of litigation, the result of which may affect his interests, and is present at the trial, will be bound by the result. Plainly there must be some obligation imposed upon one who is not party or privy to a suit, and who does not in fact actively maintain or defend it, or take some charge or control of it, to see that the prosecution is carried on or the defense made, before he will be charged with the result as binding upon him. 1 Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. § 189. The case of Tredway v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 663, when considered with reference to the issues actually involved, gives no support to the contention made for appellee. That was a case in which a taxpayer of the county asked to have set aside a decree rendered against the county in an action brought by a railroad company awarding specific performance of a contract to convey swamp land, and to have the board of supervisors of the county enjoined from disposing of such land in accordance with the terms of the decree. The actual decision of the court was that the taxpayer was bound by the decree, and what is said in the opinion of the court with reference to the effect of a party sitting by and allowing an adjudication to be made against his interest without objection must be confined to the facts of the case. In the case before us, the plaintiff is not asserting any right as taxpayer or member of the general public, but is an individual claimant seeking to enforce obligations of the defendant corporation, and there is nothing in the circumstances of the case to indicate that he or those whom he represents were under obligation to take charge of or control the defense, or that they in fact attempted to do so. They might very well have been made parties in the first suit, but, not having been in fact made parties, they were not bound to so connect themselves with the litigation that the result would be binding upon them. It is true they might perhaps have intervened and asked to join in the defense, but the right to intervene does not involve the duty to do so, and it was plainly competent for them, if they saw fit, to abstain from participation in that case, and thus preserve the right to have their claims under their alleged contracts litigated in an action brought by them, or to which they were properly made parties. That the right to intervene does not, in the absence of its exercise, charge persons who have such right with the result of the litigation, is well settled. Dalhoff v. Coffman, 37 Iowa, 283; Woodward v. Jackson, 85 Iowa, 432, 52 N. W. 358; Guinn v. Iowa & St. L. R. Co. 125 Iowa, 301, 101 N. W. 94.

The action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the divisions of the answer in which defendant sought to interpose the plea of a prior adjudication, and in rendering judgment for the defendant, was erroneous, and the judgment is reversed.

Kalb*, 50 Wis. 178, 6 N. W. 557.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding in error is to review the judgment of the trial court, holding that § 16, chap. 69, Session Laws 1910, as amended by § 1, chap. 56, Session Laws 1911, entitled "An Act Amending § 16 of an Act Entitled 'An Act Relating to Certain County and District Officers,' Chapter 69 of Session granted to such subordinates in violation of the constitutional inhibition against making any extra allowances to such officers for extra work, nor cases involving simply the right of such subordinates to a reasonable compensation, nor cases where a new or additional deputyship was created by statute, and such new or additional deputy is demanding his salary as such.

Reference must often be made to the pro-

Laws 1910, Repealing All Laws in Conflict," wherein the compensation of certain deputies was increased, applied to deputies then in office who held not for any specified time or defined term, and that it was not repugnant to § 10 of article 23 of the Constitution, which is in hac verba: "Except wherein otherwise provided in this Constitution, in no case shall the salary or emoluments of any public official be changed after his election or appointment, or during his term of office, unless by operation of law enacted prior to such election or appointment; nor shall the term of any public official be extended beyond the period for which he was elected or appointed: Provided, that all officers within this state shall continue to perform the duties of their offices until their successors shall be duly qualified."

Section 3, art. 12, of the Constitution of South Dakota (1889), provides: "The legislature shall never grant any extra compensation to any public officer, employee, agent, or contractor after the services shall have been rendered or the contract entered into, nor authorize the payment of any claims or part thereof created against the state, under any agreement or contract made without express authority of law; and all such unauthorized agreements or con-visions of the particular Constitution or statute in question. Frequently, however, the decision is placed upon other than constitutional grounds.

This subject resolves itself into the question as to what subordinate officials are public officers within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against changing salary of public officer during term of office. It has been stated that only such officers as receive a fixed salary, payable out of the public treasury, are included, and not that large class of officers who receive specific fees for specific services as they are from time to time required to render them. Milwaukee County v. Hackett, 21 Wis. 620. This was a case, however, of a county treasurer, and does not fall within the scope of this note.

The general rule, however, seems to be that this constitutional prohibition against changing the salary of a public officer during his term of office applies only to officers who have a fixed and definite term, and does not apply to appointive officers, who hold only at the pleasure of the appointing power.

This rule has been applied, and a change in salary held valid, in case of a deputy county surveyor (Harrold v. Barnum, 8 Cal. App. 21, 96 Pac. 104); steward of county jail, appointed by sheriff (Hibbard v. Suffolk County, 163 Mass. 34, 39 N. E. 285); chief of fire department, appointed by mayor (State ex rel. Kane v. Johnson, 123 Mo. 43, 27 S. W. 399); deputy county clerk (Gibbs v. Morgan, 39 N. J. Eq. 126); messenger to president of board of aldermen of New York city (Smith v. New York, 67 Barb. 223); attendant on marine court of New York city, appointed under act authorizing the appointment of extra assistants subject to confirmation by board of supervisors (Wines v. New York, 9 Hun, 659, affirmed in 70 N. Y. 613; see Moser v. New York, 21 Hun, 163, infra); health officer, appointed by board of health (State ex rel. Miller v. Massillon, 24 Ohio C. C. 249); deputy clerk (MUSKOGEE COUNTY v. HART); deputy superintendent of public instruction (Somers v. State, 5 S. D. 321, 58 N. W. 804, affirmed on rehearing in 5 S. D. 584, 59 N. W. 962).

In other cases a change in salary of a subordinate official has also been held valid, but upon other grounds.

Where compensation for a certain office is not fixed at the time of election or appointment, it may be thereafter fixed. This was applied to a case where a board of commissioners fixed the salary of a deputy district attorney after his appointment, at an amount which was lower than what he would have received in fees under the system in force when he was appointed, but at the time of his appointment no regular salary was provided for such office. Merwin v. Boulder County, 29 Colo. 169, 67 Pac. 285; Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 855-858.

Where the compensation of a county officer is fixed at one sum, and the clerk hire is fixed separately therefrom, while the officer's compensation cannot be changed during his term, the county board has power to change the allowance for clerk hire. People v. Fuller, 141 Ill. App. 374, affirmed in 238 Ill. 116, 87 N. E. 336; Daggett v. Ford County, 99 Ill. 334; LaSalle County v. Milligan, 143 Ill. 321, 32 N. E. 196.

Where a state auditor appointed a clerk as "chief of claims department" at a yearly salary, and the clerk remained in the office three years, but at the end of ten months his salary was reduced by the auditor, it was held that since the auditor could discharge such a clerk, he could impose as a condition to his retaining the place a reduction in salary, and if he continued in the place and drew the reduced salary, he would be presumed to have accepted it in full payment for his services. Hager v. Shuck, 120 Ky. 574, 87 S. W. 300. See Kehn v. State, 93 N. Y. 291, infra.

The clerk of the grand juries of the courts of oyer and terminer and general sessions in New York is not an officer under the judicial system of the state, but is solely a county officer, and accordingly his salary may be changed as provided in the act relating to county government. Dolan v. New York, 6 Hun, 506, affirmed in 67 N. Y. 609.

Where, because of small appropriation, the appointing officer was compelled at the time of making the appointment to reduce the salary of the chief clerk to the district attorney below the amount as previously fixed by law, the case does not fall within the constitutional prohibition against change tracts shall be null and void; nor shall the compensation of any public officer be increased or diminished during his term of office: Provided, however, that the legislature may make appropriations for expenditures incurred in suppressing insurrections or repelling invasion."

In Somers v. State, 5 S. D. 321, 58 N. W. 804, Id. 5 S. D. 585, 59 N. W. 963, it was held: "A deputy appointed by an officer to hold during the pleasure of such principal does not hold for a 'term,' within the meaning of § 3, art. 12, of the Constitution, prohibiting any change in the compensation of any public officer 'during his term of office.'"

Section 8, art. 14, of the Constitution of Missouri (1875), provides: "The compensation or fees of no state, county, or municipal officer shall be increased during his term of office; nor shall the term of any office be extended for a longer period than that for which such officer was elected or appointed."

In State ex rel. Kane v. Johnson, — Mo. — 25 S. W. 855, § 1 of the syllabus is as follows: "A municipal officer subject to removal at the pleasure of the council is not an officer within Const. art. 14, § 8, prohibiting an increase in the salary of any officer during his term of office." In the opinion it is said: "Counsel for relator concede in their brief that he is a public officer within the meaning of the general definition of a public officer, and that he performs public duties and offices and functions of a public character; but they contend that he is not an officer within the meaning of the section of the Constitution quoted. It will be observed that this section of the Constitution only embraces within its provisions officers who are elected or appointed for some specific or definite time, and that it has no application whatever to the case in hand, when the relator's term of office is not fixed by any law or ordinance, and when he simply holds at the pleasure of the appointing power. This is manifest from the fact that it also provides that the term of office shall not be extended for a longer period than that for which such officer was elected or appointed. The relator was not elected, nor was he appointed, for any definite time." On a rehearing, the court adhered to its former decision. State ex rel. Kane v. Johnson, 123 Mo. 43, 27 S. W. 399.

Article 4, § 7, ¶ 11, of the Constitution of New Jersey (1844), provides: "The legislature shall not pass private, local, or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases; that is to say: . . . Creating, increasing, or decreasing the percentage or allowance of public officers during the term for which said officers were elected or appointed."

In Gibbs v. Morgan, 39 N. J. Eq. 126, it is said: "By the act of 1874, entitled 'An Act to Regulate the Salary of the Clerk of of salary, especially where the appointee accepted the place and received the reduced salary for over two years without protest. People ex rel. Bacon v. Kings County, 105 N. Y. 180, 11 N. E. 391. See Kehn v. State, 93 N. Y. 291, infra.

In Reid v. Smoulder, 128 Pa. 324, 5 L.R.A. 517, 18 Atl. 445, it was held that since the office of assistant clerk of the orphans' court was created by the Constitution, and the legislature fixed the salary, although the legislature might increase or diminish the salary subject to the Constitution, they could not repeal the provision for a salary altogether, and so virtually expel such a clerk from his office.

In Gage County v. Wright, 86 Neb. 347, 125 N. W. 626, it was held that where an act increased the salaries of clerks and assistants in the county treasurer's office, and the previous clerks were retained and paid the increased salaries, the county could not recover of the treasurer the amount of the increase. The constitutional question does not seem to enter the discussion, but the argument implies that the act was valid. See Kehn v. State, 93 N. Y. 291, infra.

Since a deputy clerk of the board of supervisors holding office during the pleasure of the appointing power can be dismissed by the board, he cannot recover salary at the previous rate, or any salary, if he continues in office after the appropriation there- 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for has been withdrawn. Dunphy v. New York, 8 Hun, 479.

A statute reducing the salary of the clerk of a municipal court was held valid, but it is not clear whether the reduction went into operation in the midst of a term of office or between two terms. Stevens v. Minneapolis, 29 Minn. 219, 12 N. W. 533.

On the other hand, applying the general rule laid down above, a change of salary has been held invalid in the case of a clerk of a board of supervisors (Power v. May, 114 Cal. 207, 46 Pac. 6); clerk of probate court (Cook County v. Sennott, 136 Ill. 314, 28 N. E. 491); clerk of circuit court (Bright v. Stone, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 817, 43 S. W. 207); clerk of court of appeals (Com. v. Addams, 95 Ky. 588, 26 S. W. 581); fireman in public building, employed by the superintendent, salary fixed by law when appointed; held, he could recover residue after accepting reduced amount for some time (Kehn v. State, 93 N. Y. 291; see Hager v. Shuck, 120 Ky. 574, 87 S. W. 300; People ex rel. Bacon v. Kings County, 105 N. Y. 180, 11 N. E. 391, and Gage County v. Wright, supra); deputy city comptroller, decision based on interpretation of statute rather than on constitutional grounds (Pryor v. Rochester, 166 N. Y. 548, 60 N. E. 252, modifying 57 App. Div. 486, 68 N. Y. Supp. 86); police surgeon appointed by board of police, holding such an officer not a clerk nor employee, but an

the County of Camden' (P. L. of 1874, p. 280), it was provided that the clerk of Camden county shall receive from the county, in lieu of fees, for his services as clerk of the criminal and civil courts of the county, a salary of $4,000 per annum; his fees to go to the county. The act was to take effect at the expiration of the term of office of the then clerk. By the act of 1876, entitled 'An Act Concerning Clerks of Counties in this State' (P. L. of 1876, p. 289), it was enacted that the clerk of each of the counties of this state might appoint an assistant in his office, to be known and denominated as his 'deputy clerk,' and gave to such deputy power, during the absence or inability of the clerk, to exercise all his powers and perform all his duties. But it was thereby provided, also, that 'no additional compensation shall be paid to the deputy by the county.' The before-mentioned act of 1882 [P. L. 1882, p. 195], which is entitled a supplement to the last-mentioned act, if valid, in effect partially repeals the provision of the act of 1876, that deputy clerks shall receive 'no additional compensation from the county,' and gives to the deputy clerks of counties where the clerk is paid by annual salary a salary of $2,000 per annum from the county. It is an act giving a salary out of the county treasury to a certain deputy clerk or certain deputy clerks, as the case may be, and the only question to be considered is whether it is a special or local law. Deputy clerks are public officers, but they have no term, in the sense in which the expression is used in the paragraph above quoted [referring to paragraph 11, supra]. They are employees of the county clerks, and their employment is a matter of mere private contract. The law merely constitutes them public officers, and gives them certain powers. It does not establish any particular period of service for them. That is left to private agreement. Since they have no term, in the sense in which the word is used in the Constitution, it follows that the constitutional prohibition, when applied to legislation to create or increase their compensation, is unqualified. It must be by general law, and cannot be by local or special enactment."

Section 9, art. 11, Constitution of California (1879), provides: "The compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office; nor shall the term of any such officer be extended beyond the period for which he is elected or appointed."

In Tulare County v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 50 Pac. 427, it was held that said provision did not apply to deputy county officers who had no fixed term.

Henderson v. Boulder County, — Colo. —, 117 Pac. 997, construing § 30, art. 5, Constitution (1876) of Colorado, is not in conflict with the foregoing authorities; for officer within the charter of the city (People ex rel. Satterlee v. Board of Police, 75 N. Y. 38); crier of supreme court (Ricketts v. New York, 12 Daly, 504; 67 How. Pr. 320); attendant upon marine court of New York, appointed by judges, not subject to confirmation by board of supervisors, the court saying in this case that these attendants are not in any just sense servants of the judges; their number, appointment, and salary are regulated by law, their duties are public, well defined, and by no means menial (Moser v. New York, 21 Hun, 163; see Wines v. New York, 9 Hun, 659, supra); attendant upon the supreme court (Rowland v. New York, 12 Jones & S. 559, affirmed in 83 N. Y. 372); attendant upon court of common pleas (Sweeney v. New York, 5 Daly, 274, affirmed in 58 N. Y. 625).

This rule has been expressly disaffirmed in one case, however, and another adopted, namely, that if an individual be invested with some portion of the function of the government to be exercised for the benefit of the public, he is a public officer within the constitutional prohibition against changing salary. This was applied, and a change of salary held invalid, in the case of a secretary of the board of public works, an assistant bailiff of police court, and official stenographer of city court. Louisville v. Wilson, 99 Ky. 598, 36 S. W. 944. Definitive L.R.A. (N.S.)

tion of public officer in this case quoted from Mechem, Pub. Off. § 1.

Also, under a statute giving the board of apportionment of New York city the authority to regulate salaries of political officers, but not of judicial officers, they may not reduce the salary of the deputy clerk of the court of common pleas, who is a part of the judicial system. Landon v. New York, 7 Jones & S. 467, 49 How. Pr. 218.

An act purporting to place extra burdens upon the clerk of an orphans' court after his term of office has begun, and to provide additional fees for such services, is unconstitutional as to services already rendered, as increasing salary or emoluments of office. Shiffert v. Montgomery County, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 241.

In Com. v. Carter, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1509, 55 S. W. 701, it was held that since an act changing the fees of clerks of circuit court was invalid, the state could recover back from such clerks the fee thus paid by mistake of law.

But under a statute providing that all fees of clerks of courts above the amounts of salaries shall be paid into the county treasury, an act increasing the amount of costs to be paid to such clerks is constitutional, for it does not increase the salary. People ex rel. Bussey v. Gaultier, 149 Ill. 39, 36 N. E. 576.

there the statute fixing the county judge's salary provided that the compensation for his clerk should be paid by him out of his fixed salary.

The deputy clerk here is without any "term," as the same is used in § 10, art. 23, supra. It follows that that portion of the provision which prohibits the change of the salary or emoluments of a public officer during his term of office does not apply to the defendant in error. The question further arises, Does that part which prohibits the changing of such salary or emoluments after his election or appointment apply? Article 24 of the Constitution of Connecticut (1818), as adopted by amendment in October, 1877, provides: "Neither the general assembly nor any county, city, borough, town, or school district shall have power to pay or grant any extra compensation to any public officer, employee, agent, or servant, or increase the compensation of any public officer or employee, to take effect during the continuance in office of any person whose salary might be increased thereby, or increase the pay or compensation of any public contractor above the amount specified in the contract."

The Connecticut provision does not depend upon the public officers having a fixed term, and it includes deputies. The Oklahoma provision prohibits the changing, either increasing or decreasing, of the salary or emoluments of a public officer after his election or appointment or during his term of office. If this provision is to be construed to mean that after an officer has received his appointment or been elected his salary or emoluments shall not be changed, either increased or decreased, then why the necessity of adding the clause "or during his term of office?" It is a rule of construction that, if reasonably practicable, effect is to be given to the entire provision, and no part shall be nullified. If this section be construed to mean that after an officer has been elected or appointed, and prior to the time that his term begins, no change, either by increasing or decreasing, shall be made in his salary or emoluments, and, further, after his term has begun, during such term no change shall be made, either by increasing or decreasing such salary or emoluments, then effect is given to all of this provision. But it may be urged that then the clause "or during his term of office" was unnecessary, and that the clause "after his election or appointment" would have covered not only the period prior to his being installed in office and beginning his term, but also subsequent thereto to the end of this term. That may be true; but some framers of provisions prefer to use specific language, and cover the entire grounds in specific detail, rather than in general terms, and it is not for us to determine which is preferable. Then, again, mark the language, "after his election or appointment, or during his term of office." "During his term of office," construed with what goes before, indicates that it was intended that this provision applied to public officials that had a term of office, and the defendant in error has no term of office. He serves at the pleasure of his principal.

We conclude that the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Mandamus — to review judicial action — remand of cause to state court.

The refusal of a Federal circuit court to remand a civil cause to the state court whence it had been removed as presenting a separable controversy between citizens of different states cannot be reviewed by mandamus, which may not be used to perform the office of an appeal or writ of error.

Note. — Mandamus: to compel removal of case to Federal court or remanding of case to state court.

For a treatment of the general question of superintending control and supervisory jurisdiction of the superior over the inferior or subordinate tribunal, see the note to State ex rel. Fourth Nat. Bank v. Johnson, 51 L.R.A. 33.

RE HARDING is a case of especial importance as it sets out at length and discusses all the cases which seem to have passed directly upon the question whether the Supreme Court of the United States may issue a mandamus to an inferior Federal court to compel it to remand a case pending therein to the state courts, after denial by the inferior Federal tribunal of a motion so to remand, deducing therefrom not only the general rule applicable in such case, and the exception thereto, but clearing up an admitted conflict among the authorities. These cases are as follows:

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, to remand a civil cause to the state court whence it had been removed as presenting a separable controversy between citizens of different states. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George F. Harding and William J. Ammen for petitioner.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

By a motion for leave to file a petition for mandamus, George F. Harding seeks the reversal of the action of the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, eastern division, in taking jurisdiction over a cause as the result of a refusal to grant a request of Harding to remand the case to a state court. The facts shown on the face of the motion papers are these:

On October 19, 1907, George F. Harding, the petitioner, alleging himself to be a resident of the state of California, sued in an Illinois state court various corporations alleged to be created by and citizens of the state of New Jersey, and fourteen individuals whose citizenship and residence were not given. The suit was brought by Harding as a stockholder in the Corn Products Company, one of the defendants, and the object of the suit was to annul an alleged unlawful merger of that company, and for relief in respect of an asserted misappropriation whether or not it has jurisdiction to try a civil cause properly brought before it, and that such decisions are not open to collateral attack; Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 25 L. ed. 667, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 524; Virginia v. Paul, 148 U. S. 107, 37 L. ed. 386, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536; and Kentucky v. Powers, 201 U. S. 1, 50 L. ed. 633, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 692, which establish an exception to the general doctrine above stated, in holding that in criminal proceedings the extraordinary process of mandamus does not lie to control judicial discretion, except when that discretion has been abused, but that it is a remedy when the case is outside the jurisdiction of the court or officer to which or to whom the writ is addressed; and Ex parte Wisner, 203 U. S. 449, 51 L. ed. 264, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 150; Re Moore, 209 U. S. 491, 52 L. ed. 904, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585, 706, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1164; and Re Winn, 213 U. S. 458, 53 L. ed. 873, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 515, which are disapproved in so far as they conflict with the general rule announced in the Hoard, Pollitz, Nebraska, and Gruetter Cases, and the exception established in the Rives, Paul, and Powers Cases.

But the question whether or not a Federal court may compel a state court to remove a case to the Federal court, and whether or not an appellate state court may compel an inferior state court to remove a cause to the Federal court, by the extraordinary remedy of mandamus, has often arisen. In connection with such cases, which are set out hereafter, however, it should be stated, that the question of the appropriateness of the remedy in, and the jurisdiction of, such courts to issue the writ, is no longer of practical importance, as the jurisdiction of the Federal courts attaches as matter of law upon the filing of a sufficient petition and bond, if the cause is removable, even if the state or Federal courts have refused to grant an order of removal.

There is a decided conflict among the authorities as to the right of a Federal court to issue a writ of mandamus to compel a state court to remove to the former an action pending in the latter, as will be seen by 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) an examination of the following cases: Thus, in Spraggins v. County Ct. Brunner, Col. Cas. 218, Fed. Cas. No. 13,246, it was held that the United States circuit court had power to enforce by mandamus the removal of a cause from a state to the Federal court, where the state court had illegally and unjustifiably refused to transmit the case, it being said that in such case, if the Federal court refused to issue the writ, the applicant would be remediless. And in People ex rel. Kanouse v. New York C. P. Judges, 2 Denio, 197, the court, following Spraggins v. County Ct. supra, refused to grant a mandamus to compel an inferior state court to permit a cause pending therein to be removed to the United States circuit court, on the ground that the latter court could itself exercise the power to award the writ when necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction, and that for the state court to do so would be to make an officious tender of services. See also dicta in Gordon v. Longest, 16 Pet. 97, 10 L. ed. 900, and United States ex rel. White v. Judges, 5 Chicago Leg. News, 137, Fed. Cas. No. 15,501. And see Ex parte Turner, 3 Wall. Jr. 258, Fed. Cas. No. 14,245, wherein, upon motion to the United States circuit court for a mandamus to a state court to remove the cause to the Federal court, no objection was made as to the power of the court to issue the mandamus.

The doctrine announced in the Spraggins and Kanouse Cases, however, has been severely criticized, and the writ denied on the ground that no mandamus is necessary, for the applicant is not without redress, as he may take his exception, have the appellate court of the state remedy any wrong worked by the inferior court, and in case of a refusal by that court to correct, carry the issue to the Supreme Court of the United States. This was the reasoning applied in Hough v. Western Transp. Co. 1 Biss. 425, Fed. Cas. No. 6,724, in holding that the United States circuit court has no power to issue a writ of mandamus to a state court for the removal of a cause to it. And Re Cromie, 2 Biss. 160, Fed. Cas. No. 3,405, follows and adopts the reasoning of the of its assets. On November 6, 1907, the Corn Products Company applied to remove to the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, eastern division, on the ground that there was a separable controversy between it and Harding. By separate petitions all the other defendants united in the prayer for removal. The state court, not having acted on the petition for removal, the judge of the United States court, upon the application of the Corn Products Company, ordered the transcript of record from the state court to be filed and the case to be docketed. This being done, the Corn Products Company filed what was styled an amendment and supplement to the petition for removal, stating the residence and citizenship of the individuals named as defendants in the original bill, four of them being averred to be residents of Chicago, Illinois, one of Pekin, Illinois, and the others citizens and residents of states other than Illinois.

In December, 1907, Harding moved to remand to the state court, in substance upon the ground that there was no separable controversy, and that the requisite diversity of citizenship was not shown by the petition for removal, and especially directed attention to the fact that at the time of the commencement of the suit in the state court, he, Harding, was not a resident of the district, and that none of the corporate defendants were such residents.

Prior to the bringing of the Harding suit, a suit had been brought in an Illinois state court by the Chicago Real Estate & Trust Company, an Illinois corporation and a stockholder in the Corn Products Company, upon substantially the same grounds as those subsequently alleged in the Harding suit, against the principal corporations and individuals who were thereafter made defendants in the Harding suit. This cause had been removed by the Corn Products Company into the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, eastern division, and on its removal, at the instance of the Corn Products Company, the court had restrained the real estate company, its officers, agents, attorneys, etc., from further prosecuting the cause in the state court. Immediately after the bringing of the Harding suit in the state court, the Corn Products Company applied to the circuit court, in the real estate company suit, to restrain Harding from prosecuting his suit, on the ground that the bringing of the same was a violation of the previous restraining order. The court issued a temporary restraining order. Thereafter, as we have said, the Harding suit was removed on the application of the Corn Products Company to the circuit court of the United States, and the motion to Hough Case. And the same conclusion was reached in Fisk v. Union P. R. Co. 6 Blatchf. 362, Fed. Cas. No. 4,827, upon the ground that no mandamus was necessary, and that therefore the United States court had no jurisdiction to issue the writ to the state court. And in Ladd v. Tudor, 3 Woodb. & M. 325, Fed. Cas. No. 7,975, although not expressly deciding the point, it was said that where a discretion is given by law to the state court, to decide the matter in issue, the Federal court ought not to interfere by a mandamus, although the result reached might not be exactly what the Federal court would think correct,—especially if the state court has acted within the line of its discretion and with fairness, instead of clearly abusing a discretion intrusted to it.

But in Hough v. Western Transp. Co. supra, it was said that Congress undoubtedly could give power to United States circuit courts to issue a writ of mandamus to a state court for the removal of a cause to it, but that it had not done so.

Likewise, a conflict exists among the cases which treat the question of the right of a state court to control by mandamus the action of an inferior state tribunal. Thus, in State ex rel. Tod v. Common Pleas Ct. 15 Ohio St. 377, the state supreme court issued a writ of mandamus to compel an inferior court to remove a cause to the Federal court, the court saying that by so doing, it 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

does not control a judgment of the inferior court, but the act of the court which was to follow its judgment, and that, although the first would be judicial, the latter was purely ministerial. Continuing, the court said: "It would be strange indeed if we have power to compel the proper court to take jurisdiction, and have not the power to compel the improper court to relinquish jurisdiction, or to do a necessary act in order to the exercise of jurisdiction by the proper court." But that an inferior court does not act ministerially, but judicially, see opinion of Humphreys, J., in Kennedy v. Woolfolk, 1 Overt. 453.

And in Kennedy v. Woolfolk, supra, it was held per Overton, J., that mandamus was the proper remedy where the inferior court had denied a motion to remove a cause to the Federal court.

So, in Brown v. Crippen, 4 Hen. & M. 173, mandamus from the higher to the inferior state court was held to be the only proper remedy where the inferior court had refused to remove a cause pending before it, which was removable as a matter of right. The court saying that the defendant could neither appeal nor obtain a writ of error until the final decision of the suit, when it might be too late. And in Ex parte Andrews, 40 Ala. 639, it seems to have been assumed that mandamus was the proper proceeding, but the supreme court overruled the motion for the writ upon the

which we have referred was made by Harding to remand. The motion to remand, however, in consequence of the restraining order, which had been made permanent, was not heard until the summer of 1909, after the restraining order above referred to had been dissolved by the circuit court of appeals. 94 C. C. A. 144, 168 Fed. 658. Before the motion to remand, however, was passed upon, the circuit court granted permission to the Corn Products Company to amend its removal petition by alleging that, at the time of the commencement by Harding of his suit, and continuously thereafter, he was a citizen of Illinois and a resident of Chicago, in that state. To this Harding objected on the ground that the court was without power to allow an amendment, and that its jurisdiction was to be tested by the averments of the original removal petition. The permitted amendments having been filed, the motion to remand was denied. Harding thereupon, reiterating his objection to the allowance of the amendment and to the jurisdiction of the court to do other than remand the cause, traversed the averment in the amended removal petition as to his Illinois citizenship and residence, and specially prayed "that there may be a speedy hearing and a decision of such issue of citizenship and a remand of this cause to the state court by the order of this court. . . ." The request for hearing was granted. A large amount of evidence was introduced on such hearing, which extended over a period of more than fifteen months, and the taxable costs, it is said, "ran up into several thousands of dollars." Finally, on October 25, 1910, the issue was decided against Harding. 182 Fed. 421. The court, finding from the proof that Harding was, as alleged in the amended petition, a citizen and resident of the state of Illinois, expressly refused the prayer for removal, made by Harding in his answer to the amended petition; in other words, the court reaffirmed and reiterated its previous action in refusing to remand the cause. Whether these facts give such color of right to the contention that we have jurisdiction to review the action of the trial court by the writ of mandamus as to lead us to be of opinion that further argument at bar is necessary, and therefore a rule to show cause should issue, is then the question for decision.

The doctrine that a court which has general jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties to a cause is competent to decide questions arising as to its jurisdiction, and therefore that such decisions are not open to collateral attack, has been so often expounded (see Dowell v. Applegate, 152 U. S. 327, 337, 38 L. ed. 463, 467, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611, and cases cited), and has been so recently applied (United States use of ground that the action was not one the removal of which was authorized. And the same is true of Ex parte Grome, 40 Ala. 731, and of State v. Common Pleas, 3 Ohio, 49, where the motions were denied on the ground that the actions were not removable to the Federal court to which the applicants sought to remove them; and of Orosco v. Gagliardo, 22 Cal. 83, where the application was denied on the ground that the action was one of which the Federal court did not have jurisdiction; and of People ex rel. Western Transp. Co. v. Superior Ct. 34 Ill. 356, in which the petition was denied on the ground of the failure to show that the action was one of which the Federal court had jurisdiction.

And where, under the statutes, no appeal lies from an order refusing to remove a case from an inferior state court to the Federal court, it has been held that the proper remedy is by mandamus from the higher to the inferior state court. Hopper v. Kalkman, 17 Cal. 517.

But this is not true where an appeal or writ of error lies from a refusal of an inferior state court to remove a cause pending therein to a Federal court, it being held in such case that mandamus is not the proper remedy. Hill v. Henderson, 6 Smedes & M. 351 (dictum); State ex rel. Combination Silver Min. Co. v. Curler, 4 Nev. 445; Shelby v. Hoffman, 7 Ohio St. 450; Campbell v. Wallen, Mart. & Y. 266.

So, it has been held that an appellate state court will not grant a writ of mandamus to compel an inferior state court to remove a case pending therein to a United States circuit court, on the ground that the latter court itself has the power to award the writ when necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction. People ex rel. Kanouse v. New York C. P. Judges, supra. See this case as set out and discussed, supra.

And in People ex rel. Glen Falls Ins. Co. v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 21 Mich. 577, 4 Am. Rep. 504, it was held that the writ of mandamus could not be resorted to to compel an inferior state court to remove a case to the Federal court, the court approving of the reasoning of the court in People ex rel. Kanouse v. New York C. P. Judges, supra, and in addition it was remarked that the removal was a matter of right, and not within the discretion of the state courts.

So, in Baron v. Kingsland, 5 La. 378, it was held that the supreme court had been given none but appellate power, and that therefore it could not issue a writ of mandamus to an inferior court to compel the removal of a cause to the Federal court, even though no appeal would lie from a refusal of an inferior court so to remove the cause.

Hine v. Morse, 218 U. S. 493, 54 L. ed. 1123, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37), that it may be taken as elementary and requiring no further reference to authority. Nor is there any substantial foundation for the contention that this elementary doctrine has no application to decisions of courts of the United States, refusing to remand causes to state courts since there is nothing peculiar in an order refusing to remand which differentiates it from any other order or judgment of a court of the United States concerning its jurisdiction. The importance of the subject which is involved in the contrary assertion, the apparent conflict between certain decided cases dealing with the right to review by mandamus orders of circuit courts refusing to remand, and a long and settled line of other cases relating to the same subject, the confusion and misapprehension which must result unless the conflict is reconciled or abated, and the duty to remove obscurity, as far as it may be done, concerning the review of questions of jurisdiction, all lead us to give the subject a more extended examination than it would otherwise be entitled to receive.

In Ex parte Hoard, 105 U. S. 578, 26 L. ed. 1176, the court was called upon to consider whether the judgment of a circuit court of the United States, declining to remand a civil cause to a state court from which it had been removed, was reviewable by the extraordinary process of mandamus. In refusing to exert jurisdiction by mandamus, and considering the inherent nature of the powers of a circuit court, it was declared that "jurisdiction has been given to the circuit court to determine whether the cause is one that ought to be remanded," and it was also observed that "no case can be found in which a mandamus has been used to compel a court to remand a cause after it has once refused a motion to that effect." Calling attention to the fact that the act of 1875, in § 5 [18 Stat. at L. 472, chap. 137, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 511], expressly gave an appeal to or a writ of error from this court for the review of orders of circuit courts remanding causes, without regard to the amount involved, the court said: "The same remedy has not been given if the cause is retained. It rests with Congress to determine whether a cause shall be reviewed or not. If no power of review is given, the judgment of the court having jurisdiction to decide is final."

laws of the states of Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Missouri, and a citizen of the state of Ohio, and various other defendants, chiefly citizens and residents of the state of New York. The Wabash Company removed the cause to the circuit court of the United States, on the ground of a separable controversy. A motion of Pollitz to remand was denied. The controversy was decided by this court on the hearing of a rule, which was granted on the application of Pollitz for a writ of mandamus to direct the remanding of the cause. The court, after stating (p. 331) the general rule that "mandamus cannot be issued to compel the court below to decide a matter before it in a particular way, or to review its judicial action had in the exercise of legitimate jurisdiction, nor can the writ be used to perform the office of an appeal or writ of error," refused to take jurisdiction and review the action of the court below, and therefore declined to issue the writ.

Ex parte Nebraska, 209 U. S. 430, 52 L. ed. 876, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581, presented the following facts: In a suit against a railway company, commenced in a court of the state of Nebraska, the state, its attorney general, the railway commission, and the members of the commission individually, were plaintiffs. The defendant railway removed the cause to the United States court, upon the ground that the state was not a proper or necessary party to the suit, and that the controversy was wholly between citizens of different states. A motion to remand having been denied by the circuit court, this court issued a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not be allowed, ordering the remanding of the cause. Upon the hearing on the return to this rule, the court declined to take jurisdiction and review the action of the trial court. It was said that the circuit court had jurisdiction to pass upon the questions raised by the motion to remand, and if error was committed in the exercise of its judicial discretion, "the remedy is not by writ of mandamus, which cannot be used to perform the office of an appeal or writ of error." After declaring that "the applicable principles have been laid down in innumerable cases," the court cited Ex parte Bradley, 7 Wall. 364, 19 L. ed. 214; Ex parte Loring, 94 U. S. 418, 24 L. ed. 165; Re Rice, 155 U. S. 396, 39 L. ed. 198, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 149; Re Atlantic City R. Co. 164 U. S. 633, 41 L. ed. 579, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 208. The case of Pollitz was also cited and reviewed.

In Ex parte Gruetter, 217 U. S. 586, 54 L. ed. 892, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 690, the doctrine of Re Pollitz and Ex parte Nebraska was reaffirmed. The case was this: An action commenced by Gruetter in a state court was removed into a circuit court of the United States, and Gruetter moved to remand. One ground of the motion was that the case was not removable because it was not an action of a civil nature, but was one to recover penalties. It was also urged that the petition and record did not show that the suit was sought to be removed to the circuit court of the United States for the district in which either the plaintiff or the defendant resided. On return to a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not be granted, the court declined to take jurisdiction of the case, saying (p. 588):

"There was no controversy as to there being diversity of citizenship. The defendant was a corporation of Kentucky, and plaintiff was a citizen of Tennessee. Inasmuch as we are of opinion that the circuit court of the United States had jurisdiction to determine the questions presented, we hold that mandamus will not lie. The final order of the circuit court cannot be reviewed on this writ. Re Pollitz, supra.

It is patent from the review of the decided cases just made that the contention that the order of the court below, refusing to remand the cause, is susceptible of being here reviewed by the extraordinary process of a writ of mandamus,—in other words, that that writ may be used to subvert the purpose of a writ of error or an appeal,—is so completely foreclosed as not to be open to contention, unless it be that other cases which are relied upon as sustaining our jurisdiction to issue the writ of mandamus have either overruled the line of cases to which we have referred, or have so qualified them as to cause them to be here inapplicable. We therefore come to consider the cases upon which petitioner relies, to ascertain whether they sustain either of these views. The cases are Ex parte Wisner, 203 U. S. 449, 51 L. ed. 264, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 150; Re Moore, 209 U. S. 490, 52 L. ed. 904, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585, 706, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1164, and Re Winn, 213 U. S. 458, 53 L. ed. 873, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 515. But to an elucidation of these cases it is necessary that the briefest possible recurrence be had to two leading cases which long preceded them; viz., Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 25 L. ed. 667, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 524, and Virginia v. Paul, 148 U. S. 107, 37 L. ed. 386, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536.

In Virginia v. Rives a prosecution of persons accused of murder was removed from a state court to a circuit court of the United States. The latter court, moreover, under a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, took the prisoners from the custody of the state authorities. The case in this court arose upon an application by the commonwealth 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of Virginia for a rule to show cause why the prisoners should not be returned to the state court for trial. On hearing, this court took jurisdiction over the cause, issued the writ of mandamus, and directed the return of the accused. Speaking of the functions of the writ of mandamus, the court said (p. 323): "It does not lie to control judicial discretion, except when that discretion has been abused; but it is a remedy when the case is outside of the exercise of this discretion, and outside the jurisdiction of the court or officer to which or to whom the writ is addressed." It is obvious from the opinion of the court and the concurring opinion that jurisdiction over the cause was taken because of the extraordinary abuse of discretion disclosed by the power attempted to be exerted, the confusion and disregard of constitutional limitations which the asserted power implied, and because, under the law as it then stood, no power would otherwise have existed to correct the wrongful assumption of jurisdiction by the circuit court.

In Virginia v. Paul, 148 U. S. 107, 37 L. ed. 386, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536, a person in the custody of the state authorities, charged with murder, was released under a writ of habeas corpus issued by a district judge. Subsequently the circuit court of the United States took, by way of removal, jurisdiction over the prosecution. The commonwealth of Virginia applied to this court for a mandamus to remand the prosecution and to restore the accused to the custody of the state authorities. The court, reaffirming the doctrine of Virginia v. Rives, pointed out that to wrongfully deplete the state of its right to prosecute in its own courts for crimes committed against its authority was a gross abuse of discretion, which, if not corrected by mandamus, could not be done in any other form. A mandamus to remand was issued. The court, however, declined to review the order discharging on habeas corpus, on the ground that, on the face of the application for habeas corpus, issue had been presented which the judge had a right to decide, and, if error was committed, there was a remedy by appeal.

In Ex parte Wisner, 203 U. S. 449, 51 L. ed. 264, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 150, mandamus was sought to compel a circuit court of the United States to remand a civil cause to the state court from which it had been removed, and which the circuit court had refused to remand. The case was one where, although there was diversity of citizenship, neither of the parties resided in the particular district to which the suit had been removed. This court took jurisdiction. Reviewing the action of the court below, it was observed that the absence of residence within the district of either of the parties demonstrated the absolute want of authority of the circuit court over the cause, and that even if the objection was susceptible of being waived, a waiver by both parties was essential, and the record did not disclose that there had been such waiver. Considering the right to revise by mandamus the action of the circuit court in refusing to remand, no reference whatever was made to the existence of statutory remedies to correct the error found to have been committed, and no authority was cited, it being simply observed: "Our conclusion is that the case should have been remanded; and, as the circuit court had no jurisdiction to proceed, that mandamus is the proper remedy."

Re Moore, 200 U. S. 490, 52 L. ed. 904, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585, 706, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1164, was also a case of removal, where there was diversity of citizenship, but neither of the parties resided in the particular district. The circuit court had refused to remand. Taking jurisdiction to review such action, an application for a writ of mandamus, this court held that, as there was diversity of citizenship, there was general jurisdiction in the circuit court, and that the objection that neither party resided within the district was a matter susceptible of being waived by the parties, and that such waiver had taken place. The observations in Ex Parte Wisner to the contrary were expressly disapproved. The action of the circuit court in refusing to remand was consequently approved. No discussion was had or authority referred to upon the question of the right to review by mandamus the action of the circuit court, the right to exert such authority having in effect been assumed as the result of the decision in the Wisner Case.

Re Winn, 213 U. S. 458, 53 L. ed. 873, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 615, an action commenced in a state court, had been removed into a circuit court of the United States, not upon diversity of citizenship, but upon the ground that the case stated was one arising under the laws of the United States. The circuit court denied a motion to remand. Upon application for mandamus, this court took jurisdiction to review such actions, and directed that the case be remanded, upon the ground that the cause of action, when rightly construed, did not arise under any provision of the Constitution, or under any law of the United States. Referring to some of the previous cases, and manifestly noting an apparent conflict between them, it was said that this court had declined to exert jurisdiction by mandamus in Ex parte Nebraska and Re Pollitz, because those cases but exemplified the exercise of judicial discretion by the circuit court as to a matter within its jurisdiction, while the case in hand presented a question of a want of jurisdiction in the circuit court, clearly apparent on the face of the record, and therefore that court, when it decided that the cause of action alleged arose under a law of the United States, could not possibly have exercised a discretion to decide a matter which was within its jurisdiction. Virginia v. Rives and Virginia v. Paul were approvingly cited, and it was said that, in case of a refusal to remand, "although the aggrieved party may also be entitled to a writ of error or appeal," mandamus may be resorted to. On this subject it was further observed: "Mandamus, it is true, never lies where the party praying for it has another adequate remedy, . . . but where, without any right, a court of the United States has wrested from a state court the control of a suit pending in it, an appeal or writ of error, at the end of long proceedings, which must go for naught, is not an adequate remedy."

Comprehensively considering the two lines of cases, one beginning with Ex parte Hoard, 105 U. S. 578, 26 L. ed. 1176, and ending with Ex parte Gruetter, 217 U. S. 586, 54 L. ed. 892, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 690, and the other beginning with Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 25 L. ed. 667, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 524, and ending with Re Winn, supra, it is to be conceded that they are apparently in conflict, both as to the assertion of power which one line upholds to review by mandamus the action of the United States circuit court in refusing to remand, and the non-existence of such power which the other line of cases expounds, and also as to much of the reasoning in the opinions in some of the cases. Thus the ruling in Ex parte Hoard, that where, in a civil case, statutory remedies by error or appeal are provided for the ultimate review of errors, committed by a court in determining its jurisdiction, such statutory provisions are, in their nature, exclusive, and therefore deprive of the right to resort to the remedy by mandamus, is directly in conflict with the jurisdiction which was exercised in Ex parte Wisner, Re Moore, and Re Winn, as those cases were civil cases, and the right to review the error, if any, committed by the circuit court in refusing to remand, was regulated by statute. So, also, the statement, by way of reasoning, in the opinion in Re Winn, to the effect that, in case of a refusal to remand, "the remedy by mandamus is available, although the aggrieved party may also be entitled to a writ of error or appeal," is in direct conflict with the reasoning upon which the decision in Ex parte Hoard was based. The conflict just stated becomes more manifest when the ruling in Virginia v. Paul is considered, since in that case the court declined by mandamus to review the action of the court below in taking one accused of crime by a writ of habeas corpus from the custody of the state authorities, on the ground that prima facie there was jurisdiction to issue the writ of habeas corpus, and a remedy by appeal existed to review the action of the circuit court. Moreover, the decision in Re Pollitz, that there was not power to review the action of the court below in refusing to remand, because the circuit court, in passing upon the question as to whether, on the face of the papers, a separable controversy was alleged, decided a matter within its jurisdiction, and which involved the exercise of judicial discretion, cannot be harmonized with the ruling in Ex parte Wisner and Re Moore, that the action of a circuit court in refusing to remand could be reviewed by mandamus, because the court, in deciding whether the parties had waived the right to be sued in a particular district, had not been called upon to decide a matter within its jurisdiction, involving the exercise of judicial discretion. This conflict becomes more obvious when the ruling in Re Winn and Ex parte Gruetter are contrasted, the one deciding that the action of the circuit court in refusing to remand because, from an analysis of the pleadings, it was found that a claim of Federal right was presented, was reviewable by mandamus, since it was plain, as a matter of law, that the court erred, and therefore its decision involved no element of judicial discretion, and the other deciding that the denial by a circuit court of a motion to remand based upon the ground, among others, that, on the face of the papers, the suit was not removable, because it was not of a civil nature, but was for a penalty, was not reviewable by mandamus, because the decision of such a question was within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and therefore involved the exercise of judicial discretion.

We must, then, either reconcile the cases, or, if this cannot be done, determine which line rests upon the right principle; and having so determined, overrule or qualify the others, and apply and enforce the correct doctrine. This is the case, since to do otherwise would serve only to add to the seeming confusion and increase the uncertainty in the future as to a question which it is our plain duty to make free from uncertainty. Coming to the origin of the two lines of cases, it is manifest that it was not conceived that there was conflict between them, since Virginia v. Rives and Ex parte Hoard were practically contemporane-

ously decided, and were treated, the one as relating to an exceptional condition, that is, an effort to remove a criminal prosecution, which, if wrong was committed, no power otherwise to redress than by mandamus existed, and the other but involved the application of the well-settled rule as to civil cases, concerning which the right to review by error or appeal was generally regulated by statute. Following down the two lines of cases, it is equally manifest that it was never conceived that they conflicted with each other, because some of the cases were also practically contemporaneously decided without the suggestion that one was in conflict with the other; indeed, the decisions in Re Moore and Ex parte Nebraska were announced on the same day. When the cases are closely analyzed, we think the cause of the conflict between them becomes at once apparent. As we have previously pointed out, no authority was referred to in Ex parte Wisner sustaining the taking in that case of jurisdiction to review by mandamus the ruling of the circuit court, although, in the course of the opinion, the statement was made with emphasis that the face of the record disclosed an entire absence of jurisdiction in the court below. In the opinion, however, in Re Pollitz, the Wisner Case was referred to, and in pointing out why it was not apposite and controlling, it was observed that that case (the Wisner) presented a total absence of jurisdiction, involving no element of discretion, and Virginia v. Rives was cited, manifestly as indicating the basic authority on which the jurisdiction to review by mandamus had been exerted in the Wisner Case. Again, in Re Winn it is to be observed that not only was Virginia v. Rives cited, but the cases of Virginia v. Paul and Kentucky v. Powers, 201 U. S. 1, 50 L. ed. 633, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 692 (the last of which also concerned a criminal prosecution in which the doctrine of Virginia v. Rives had been applied), were also cited, evidently for the purpose of pointing out the source from whence came the doctrine of the right to review by mandamus under the facts presented. Bearing these matters in mind, it plainly results that the conflict presented has arisen, not because of the announcement in any of the cases of any mistaken doctrine as to jurisdiction, or of any wrongful decision of any of the cases on the merits, but has simply been occasioned, beginning with Ex parte Wisner, from applying the exceptional rule announced in Virginia v. Rives to cases not governed by such exceptional rule, but which fell under the general principle laid down in Ex parte Hoard and the line of cases which have followed it. Under these circumstances it becomes our plain duty, while not questioning the general doctrine announced in any of the cases, yet to disapprove and qualify Ex parte Wisner, Re Moore, and Re Winn to the extent that those cases applied the exceptional rule of Virginia v. Rives, and thereby obscured the broad distinction between the general doctrine announced in Ex parte Hoard and the cases which have followed it, and the exception established by Virginia v. Rives and the cases which have properly applied the doctrine of that case. Our duty to take this course arises not only because of the misconception which must otherwise continue to exist, but also because it is to be observed that material portions of the act of 1875, which were made the basis of the ruling in Ex parte Hoard, are yet in force, and because the cogency of the considerations arising from this fact are greatly increased by the duty to give effect to the provisions of the judiciary act of 1891 [26 Stat. at L. 826, chap. 517, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 488], concerning the review of final orders and judgments or decrees of the circuit courts of the United States.

As, then, our conclusion is that the case under consideration is not controlled by the ruling in Ex parte Wisner or kindred cases, but is governed by the general rule expressed in Ex parte Hoard, and followed in Re Pollitz and Ex parte Nebraska, and, lastly, applied in Ex parte Gruetter, it clearly results that the application for leave is without merit, and leave to file is denied.

The office of this note is to present decisions involving testamentary provisions not only practically identical with that under construction in the case reported, but also those which, while differing therefrom to some extent, are so sufficiently similar as to be likely to be of use in connection therewith: the question in these cases being whether the testamentary provision is sufficiently indicative of an intention to create a trust to preclude the legatee from taking beneficially.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County for the determination by the Law Court of questions contained in a bill filed to obtain a construction of the will of Elizabeth Doherty, deceased. Decree for complainants.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph B. Reed, John B. Kehoe, and Connellan & Connellan, for complainants:

Under the terms of the will the executrix, Isabelle C. Harmon, takes no beneficial interest, but there is a resulting trust for the benefit of the heirs at law, and the estate should be divided among them.

Whitehouse, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Elizabeth Doherty, of Portland, died on the 18th day of October, 1909, leaving a will which reads as follows:

"I, Elizabeth Doherty, being in my right hold for the benefit of another property received through devise or inheritance, where no actual testamentary intention has been frustrated.

"There is a distinction," says the court in Ralston v. Telfair, 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 255, "between an express trust for an indefinite purpose, and those cases where, from the indefinite nature of the purpose, the court concludes that a proper trust could not have been intended, though words may have been used which, had the objects been definite, would by construction import a trust. In the first description of cases, the devisee does not take beneficially; in the latter, he does." This statement will be found a material aid to the understanding of many of the following decisions.

In Yeap Cheah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo, L. R. 6 P. C. 381, it is said: "In the numerous decisions which are found in the books on this subject, curious matters have been relied on as indicia of intention on the one side or the other, such as the use of the words 'upon trust'; the gift of specific legacies to the executors or trustees; and the mention of the executors by their proper names. Indicia of this kind, on which eminent judges have relied, may no doubt afford in some cases useful aids to construction, but after all they may, and often must, be modified by the provisions and language of the particular instrument to be construed."

So, also, it is said by Lord Cottenham, in Ellis v. Selby, 1 Myl. & C. 286, that the construction to be given to a provision of this character "depends upon the particular language which the testator has used, and very slight expressions may make a most material difference."

The grouping of the following cases, which has been made in order to facilitate reference, is primarily with regard to the character of the testamentary provision involved, rather than to the controlling factor of decision.

Gifts "in trust" or "upon trust."

The words "upon trust" are very strong evidence of the donor's intention not to confer a beneficial interest upon the donee; although it seems that it may be negated by the context and the general interpretation of the whole instrument. See Perry, Tr. § 158.

Thus, in Morice v. Durham, 10 Ves. Jr. 522, 7 Revised Rep. 232, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 548, where a bequest was in trust for such objects of benevolence and liberality as the trustee in his own discretion should most approve, it was held that the words "in trust" precluded any implication of an intention to give a beneficial interest, but that, the trust being insufficiently expressed, a trust resulted for the next of kin.

So, also, in Vezey v. Jamson, 1 Sim. & Stu. 68, where testator gave the residue of his estate to his executors, upon special trust and confidence, nevertheless, to apply and dispose of the same in or toward such charitable or public uses or purposes, person or persons, or otherwise, as he might by any codicil or codicils to that his will, or by memorandums in his own handwriting, direct or appoint, and as the laws of the land would admit of; and in default of any such directions or appointment, then as to the whole residue, or such part thereof concerning which no such direction or appointment should be made, upon trust to pay and apply the same in or toward such charitable or public purposes as the laws of the land would admit of, or to any person or persons in such shares and proportions as his executors or the survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, should in their or his discretion, will, and pleasure think fit, or as they should think would have been agreeable to him, the said testator, if living,—it was held that, the gift being expressly upon trust, the trustees could not hold it for their own benefit; but that the purposes of the trust being so general and undefined as to be incapable of execution by the court, a trust resulted for the next of kin.

In Buckle v. Bristow, 10 Jur. N. S. 1095, where a testator gave the residue of his property upon trust, for his executors to mind at this date (October 13th, 1909), wishing to dispose of property now in my name, give, devise, and bequeath my property of whatever kind to Isabelle C. Harmon to divide as seems to her best, as I have told her my wishes in the matter, mentioning all relatives including my nephews.

"I name Isabelle C. Harmon as my executor."

In this bill in equity, brought by some of the heirs of the testatrix, the plaintiffs ask the court to construe and interpret the provisions of this will, and particularly to determine, first, whether the legatee and executrix therein named takes any beneficial interest under it; second, if the legatee named takes no beneficial interest, hold the same for such uses and purposes as he might by codicil or deed direct or appoint, and in default thereof then for the same to be expended and appropriated within three years after his decease, in such way and manner and for such purposes as they, or the majority of them, might in their judgment and discretion agree upon, it was held that, as the words "upon trust" override the whole sentence, the executors did not take beneficially, but upon a trust void for uncertainty; and it was further held that such construction was in no way altered by the fact that in a codicil, after giving unequal legacies to the five executors, testator, said: "I give such five legacies irrespective of any interest they may ultimately take in the residue of my estate," as no interest was given by the will to the trustees and executors until some further act should be done, and as the language of the codicil may be explained upon the supposition that the testator had in mind a further gift which he might make by appointment of the residue in their favor.

In Fowler v. Garlike, 1 Russ. & M. 232, where a testatrix bequeathed the residue of her property to certain individuals, who were her executors, "to hold to them, their heirs, executors, and administrators, according to the nature and tenure of such property, upon trust to dispose of the same at such times and in such manner and for such uses and purposes as they shall think fit, it being my will that the distribution thereof shall be left entirely to their discretion," it was held that the executors did not take an absolute beneficial interest, but upon a trust too uncertain for a court to execute.

In Hughes v. Bent, 118 Ky. 609, 81 S. W. 931, where a testatrix left her residuary estate "as a sacred trust" to her daughter, "knowing that she will faithfully carry out my wishes regarding it," also appointing the daughter executrix, and on a separate signed paper, written at the time of the writing of the will, stated her desires, it was held that the daughter took the property in trust for the purposes expressed.

whether the will declares a trust sufficiently definite to be executed; and, third, if no such trust is declared, to whom shall the residue of the estate, after the payment of all debts and expenses of administration, be distributed.

In her answer, Mrs. Isabelle C. Harmon, named as defendant in the bill, joins in the prayer of the plaintiffs for a judicial construction of the will.

The plaintiffs contend, first, that under the terms of the will, Mrs. Harmon, the legatee and executrix therein named, takes no beneficial interest; second, that while the terms of the will clearly manifest an intention on the part of the testatrix to create a trust, the trust thereby indicated is not made sufficiently definite to be exe-

In Heidenheimer v. Bauman, 84 Tex. 174, 31 Am. St. Rep. 29, 19 S. W. 382, testator gave his residuary estate to his brother "in trust, to be disposed of by him as I have heretofore or may hereafter direct him to do," it was held that, in view of the statute requiring testamentary dispositions to be in writing, oral evidence was inadmissible to show the purpose for which the trust was created; and therefore that a trust resulted for testator's heirs.

In Sims v. Sims, 94 Va. 580, 64 Am. St. Rep. 772, 27 S. E. 436, where testator gave a share in his estate to a nephew, "to be disposed of by him as a private trust, about which I shall give him specific verbal directions, having full confidence in his honesty to carry out my wishes in regard to this bequest," it was held that the will on its face showed plainly and unequivocally that the bequest to the nephew was a gift to him upon trust, in which he was not to take any beneficial interest; and that, in view of the statute requiring testamentary provisions to be in writing, parol evidence was inadmissible to show the verbal directions upon which the trust was to be administered.

Where other provision is made for legatee.

In Briggs v. Penny, 3 De G. & Sm. 535, affirmed in 3 Macn. & G. 546, testatrix, after giving divers legacies, including one to the executrix for her trouble, gave the residue of her personal estate to the person named as executrix, "her executors, administrators, and assigns, well knowing that she will make a good use, and dispose of it in a manner in accordance with my views and wishes." It was held that both the language of the residuary clause, which was held to be such as to exclude all option or discretion, and the fact that a separate legacy was given to the executrix for her trouble, which the testatrix would not have done, knowing her estate would be abundantly sufficient to satisfy all the bequests, had she intended the residue to be taken beneficially, showed that the legatee was not entitled to take beneficially. A further cuted; and, third, that there is a resulting trust in favor of the heirs at law of the testatrix, and that the estate should be divided among them.

The privilege of making a disposition of property by will is created, and the exercise of it definitely regulated, by the statutes of this state. The leading provision is found in § 1 of chapter 76, Rev. Stat., and is as follows:

"A person of sound mind and of the age of twenty-one years may dispose of his real and personal estate by will, in writing, signed by him, or by some person for him, at his request and in his presence, and subscribed in his presence by three credible attesting witnesses, not beneficially interested under said will."

argument was drawn from the circumstance that, while the trouble which the executrix would have in the execution of the bequests in the will itself was not commensurate with the legacy given, she might, be put to considerable trouble in carrying out the trusts entailed upon her by the residuary bequest.

In Balfe v. Halpenny [1904] 1 I. R. 486, where testator by his will, besides other dispositions, left to his two executors legacies of £10 each for their trouble in administering his estate, and disposed of the residue in the following words: "I bequeath all the residue of my property of every kind to my executors, to apply the same as they shall think fit," the court held that the residuary bequest, having regard to its terms, and in view of the previous legacies to the executors for their trouble, was not a gift to them beneficially, but as trustees; the trust, however, being of so vague, uncertain, and indefinite a character that effect could not be given to it. It was further held that no constructive trust could be based on a conversation after the execution of the will, between the testator and one of the executors, in which the former indicated the direction which he desired the residue to take.

In Re Keenan, 107 App. Div. 234, 94 N. Y. Supp. 1099, where testator gave to a friend a sum of money "to be expended by him as I have instructed him during my lifetime," in a subsequent clause giving the same person a sum of money "for his personal use," it was held that the latter clause showed that the former was not a personal bequest, but that it was upon a trust, which was void for uncertainty.

Gifts to executors or trustees eo nomine.

In Forster v. Winfield, 142 N. Y. 327, 37 N. E. 111, where testator, after giving his executors a power of sale, and directing them, out of the proceeds realized by them from the execution of the power of sale, which they were to receive as trustees and in trust, to pay any debts that he might owe, gave the entire residue after payment of such debts to his executors eo nomine, and to the survivor of them, as joint tenants, adding, "7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The statute thus clearly prescribes the method of transmitting property by will, which the court is not at liberty to ignore, although in particular instances the actual intention and desire of a person respecting the disposition of his property may be defeated by adhering to the rule prescribed. A bequest of personal property, as well as a devise of real estate, in order to be effectual, is required to be made by an instrument in writing signed by the testator and subscribed by three attesting witnesses. Even a letter or other document containing explicit directions for the disposition of property cannot become part of a will by reference, unless it be shown to have been in existence at the time the will is executed, and be so clearly and precisely

"I have entire confidence that they will make such disposition of such residue as, under the circumstances, were I alive and to be consulted, they know would meet my approval," it was held that, as all the language used related to them as executors, and to them only in their official capacity, there was no evidence, either in the language of the gift or in testator's expression of confidence in them, of an intention that they should take as individuals absolutely, but that the gift was upon an undefined and void trust.

In Gross v. Moore, 68 Hun, 412, 22 N. Y. Supp. 1019, affirmed on opinion of the court below, in 141 N. Y. 559, 36 N. E. 343, it was held that under the following testamentary provision, "I give, devise, and bequeath unto my executor hereinafter named all the rest, remainder, and residue of my personal estate, to be distributed by him according to instructions given to him by me," having regard both to the language directing that the residuum "be distributed by him according to the instructions given him by" testatrix, and the fact that when the testatrix intended to make an absolute gift of her property in other parts of the will, she used apt and technical language to express her intention, the executor did not take an absolute interest for his own use personally, but upon a trust which was void for uncertainty.

In Ellis v. Selby, 1 Myl. & C. 286, testator directed that his trustees should retain to themselves what should remain from the proceeds of the sale of his freehold property after payment of legacies, upon trust to pay, apply, and distribute the same to and for such charitable or other purposes as they should think fit, without being answerable or accountable for the disposition thereof; and further provided that in the event of the failure of certain trusts, "then and in such case, my will is that my said trustees and the survivors and survivor of them, . . . his executors or administrators, do pay and apply the whole of my said funded property . . . to and for such charitable or other purposes as they" should described and referred to in the will as an existing document, as to be readily identified as the particular paper intended by the testator. Bryan's Appeal, 77 Conn. 240, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 393, 68 L.R.A. 353, 107 Am. St. Rep. 34, 58 Atl. 748, and cases cited.

In the case at bar it has been seen that the only wishes expressed for the guidance of the legatee in the distribution of the property had been given orally, and they were not incorporated in the will. The language of the testatrix is: "I give, devise, and bequeath my property of whatever kind to Isabelle C. Harmon to divide as seems to her best, as I have told her my wishes in the matter."

1. The phraseology employed in making this bequest to Mrs. Harmon utterly fails to disclose any purpose on the part of the testatrix to make an absolute gift of the property to Mrs. Harmon for her personal benefit. It is not given to her to consume, but to "divide." It expressly requires her to "divide" all the property thus bequeathed to her. The fact of the division is not left to her discretion, but imposed upon her as a duty. It gives her discretionary authority only respecting the manner of the think fit, without being accountable therefor. It was contended that, under the second clause, the executors took an absolute beneficial gift, the testator not having used in such clause the words "upon trust," with which he had prefaced his disposition of the proceeds of his real estate; but it was held that as, if the fund was intended for the executors' own benefit, the testator might have left with them the option of disposing of it; and, again, as the direction to the executors to pay and apply the fund to such charitable or other purposes as they should think fit was inconsistent with the notion that they were absolutely to be entitled to it; and as the direction that they should not be held answerable or accountable would be superfluous had it been his intention to give them the property absolutely, although it is perfectly consistent with the intention to create a general and indefinite trust, the discretion vested in them was not so large as to relieve the gift from being a trust, too indefinite, however, to be carried into effect.

In Yeap Cheah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo, L. R. 6 P. C. 381, the first bequest in a will vested all the property in the executors "as such," and "in trust always" for the purposes thereafter mentioned, and the residuary clause was as follows: "As regards the remainder of my real and personal property, of what kind soever, not already disposed of, I direct that my executors shall receive and collect the same from all persons whatever, and in such manner as to them may seem proper; and I direct that they, their heirs, successors, representatives, or descendants may apply and distribute the same, all circumstances duly considered, in such manner and to such parties as to them may appear just." It was held that the facts that the residuary clause contained no words of gift, but a direction to the executors, and that they were mentioned by that title, and not by name, and the fact that the will as a whole manifested a desire throughout to benefit two certain families, negative the supposition that the testatrix intended to sever the residue from the trust with which the will clothed all her property in the hands of her executors, and to make an absolute gift to them as individuals; but that a trust was intended to be created, which failed for want of adequate expression of it.

In Fenton v. Nevin, Ir. L. R. 31 Eq. 478, where testator, after making various legacies and directing his property to be sold, added: "I will my executors shall apply the overplus, if any, as they think fit," it was held that, there being no direct gift, and the legacy being to the executors as such, they did not take beneficially, but upon a trust too indefinite to be carried into effect.

In Nichols v. Allen, 130 Mass. 211, 39 Am. Rep. 445, where testatrix gave her residuary estate to her executors and the survivor of them or their successors, if any such should be appointed, "to be by them distributed to such persons, societies, or institutions as they may consider most deserving," it was held that notwithstanding the omission of the words "in trust," yet, as the bequest contained no words tending to show that the executors were to take the property or any part of it absolutely, or for their own benefit, but on the contrary was not to them by name, but was to them and the survivor of them and to their successors, and all the property given to them was to be by them distributed, they took, not beneficially, but in trust; and that the trust declared, not being capable of being sustained as a charity, was too indefinite to be carried into effect.

Minot v. Atty. Gen. 189 Mass. 176, 75 N. E. 149, involved the interpretation of the following provision: "I give and devise to my executors and the survivor of them, or whomsoever shall lawfully have the execution of this my will, all the residue and remainder of my property and estate, to be distributed by them to charitable or worthy objects, or such as I may designate during my lifetime, and particularly for the purpose of giving to any relative of mine whom, without apparent reason, I may have overlooked, such sum as may seem to them or him under all the circumstances fitting, suitable, and proper. But my said executors or executor shall have full discretion in the matter of the distribution of said residue, and shall not be under any legal accountability or subject to any trust, or be liable to any person or corporation by reason of any memorandum which I may leave." It

2. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the terms of the bequest do manifest an intention on the part of the testatrix to create a trust.

But the trust declared by the terms of the will is too indefinite and uncertain to be executed. Among the essentials of a valid trust are that the precise nature of the trust which the donor intended to create should appear, and that the particular persons who are to take as cestuis que trust, and the proportions in which they are to take, should be pointed out. If they are not, then the trust cannot be executed, it must fail. Where the character of a trust is impressed upon the gift, and it fails because ineffectually declared, and the cestuis que trust are not clearly designated, the trustee is not entitled to the gift for his own benefit. It was said by Lord Eldon, in Morice v. Durham, 10 Ves. Jr. 521, 537, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 548, that, "though the trust is not declared, or is ineffectually declared, or becomes incapable of taking effect, the party taking shall be a trustee, if not for those who were to take by the will, for those who take under the disposition of the law." Briggs v. Penny, was held that the effect of the language used in the opening words of the clause was materially qualified by the positive direction that the property was "to be distributed by them," which was wholly inconsistent with the purpose to give the residue to them for their own benefit; that such purpose was not changed by the provision that the executors should not be under any legal accountability; that, as to hold there was an outright gift to the executors would be repugnant to and defeat the declared purpose of the testator, it must be held that it was his intention to create a trust in some form, and not to make an unlimited bequest to his executors.

On the other hand, in Ralston v. Telfair, 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 255, where testator bequeathed the residue of his estate "to be paid to the executors to dispose of as they may think fit. It is my will that the remainder of my property should be disposed of as my executors think proper," it was held that, as the words used are too indeterminate to raise a trust, the executors took beneficially for themselves.

And in Higginson v. Kerr, 30 Ont. Rep. 62, testator made the following provision: "I desire that my executors herein named shall have full power to make such and any disposition of the residue and remainder of my property and estate as they, in their judgment, may deem best, and to make due inquiry into the financial and social standing of my relatives in Ireland, and, after an investigation and a proper knowledge is obtained, to make such grants and disposition of a portion of my estate and property as they, in their judgment, consider best, to such relations. I also give my said executors power and desire them to dispose of any balance of my estate or property which may be in the bank or in any securities, to the best of their judgment, where they may consider it will do the most good and deserving." It was held that, as the executors were given an absolute power of appointment in respect of the residuary estate, under which they might appoint in favor of themselves, they took absolutely, and not upon trust; and that neither the fact that, in the clause appointing the executors, they are called "executors and trustees," nor the fact that they were by another clause empowered to hold property in trust for any of the friends of the testator, as they, the executors, might think proper, was sufficient to show that the residue mentioned in the paragraph above quoted was held by them in trust, or that there was any trust connected with the power given therein.

For other cases in which the gift was to an executor or trustee, eo nomine, see Morice v. Durham, 10 Ves. Jr. 522, 7 Revised Rep. 232, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 548; Vezey v. Jamson, 1 Sim. & Stu. 68; and Buckle v. Bristow, 10 Jur. N. S. 1095, under the heading "Gifts 'in trust' or 'upon trust,'" supra; also Balfe v. Halpenny [1904] 1 I. R. 486, under heading "Where other provision is made for legatee," supra; and also Hill v. Fiske, 69 Misc. 507, 125 N. Y. Supp. 1026, under heading "Gifts to persons also appointed executors," infra.

Gifts to persons also appointed executors.

In Condit v. Reynolds, 66 N. J. L. 242, 49 Atl. 540, where testatrix, after giving her husband a life interest in her estate, further provided: "Upon the death of my said husband I give, devise, and bequeath all my said hereinbefore-mentioned estate in such manner as he may by his last will and testament, or by an instrument in the nature of a last will and testament, devise and bequeath, or appoint to receive the same, trusting entirely to his discretion to carry into execution such charge and instruction as I may during my life have expressed to him in regard thereto," it was held, in view of the fact that the husband was appointed executor, an office which implies a trust to effectuate purposes manifested by the will, and of the fact that the power contemplated was to operate on the remainder after his death, giving rise to a strong presumption that the power was not intended to be absolute for the benefit of the donee, but was meant to be exerted only for the benefit of others, and of the explicit declaration of the testatrix that the purpose of the grant was "to carry into execution such charge and instruction as I may during my life have expressed to him in regard thereto," that the intention was to confer upon the husband not an absolute, but a fiduciary, power of disposal; and that no implication

3 Macn. & G. 546, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 265, 16 Jur. 93; Warner v. Bates, 98 Mass. 274; Hess v. Singler, 114 Mass. 56; 1 Perry, Tr. 83; Id. 5th ed. 46; Sheedy v. Roach, 124 Mass. 472, 26 Am. Rep. 680.

In Nichols v. Allen, 130 Mass. 212, 39 Am. Rep. 445, the court said: "Two general rules are well settled: (1) When a gift or bequest is made in terms clearly manifesting an intention that it shall be taken in trust, and the trust is not sufficiently defined to be carried into effect, the donee or legatee takes the legal title only, and a trust results by implication of law to the donor and his representatives, or to the testator's residuary legatees or next of kin." Briggs v. Penny, 3 De G. & S. 525, 13 Jur. 909, and 3 Macn. & G. 546, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 265, 16 Jur. 93; Thayer v. Wellington, 9 Allen, 283, 85 Am. Dec. 753.

But Olliffe v. Wells, 130 Mass. 221, is a case strikingly analogous to the one at bar. In that case the bequest submitted to the court for construction was as follows: "To the Rev. Eleazer M. P. Wells, all the rest and residue of my estate, to distribute the same in such manner as in his discretion shall appear best calculated to carry out wishes which I have expressed to him to the contrary could be drawn from the fact that the objects to be subserved by the execution of the power were undefined, the terms of the gift showing that the thing given could not be used for the benefit of the donee.

But in Gibbs v. Rumsey, 2 Ves. & B. 294, where a testatrix, after bequeathing her property to two individuals, who were also her executors, upon trust to sell, and out of the proceeds to pay legacies, among which were legacies to each of them for their care and trouble, gave the residue "unto my said trustees and executors [naming them] to be disposed of unto such person and persons, and in such manner and form, and such sum or sums of money, as they in their discretion shall think proper and expedient," it was held that as the first words of the residuary clause amounted clearly to an absolute gift to the persons named, and the subsequent words not importing a trust (the court remarking in this connection that the testatrix had frequently in the course of her will used the words "in trust" where she intended to create a trust), the legatees took beneficially, and not as trustees. This decision has been regarded by the English courts with but little favor (see Ellis v. Selby, 1 Myl. & C. 286, 5 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214; Yeap Cheah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo, L. R. 6 P. C. 381, and Fenton v. Nevin, Ir. L. R. 31 Eq. 478), and is characterized by Wood, V. C., in Buckle v. Bristow, 10 Jur. N. S. 1095, as going "to the very outside of the doctrine."

So, also, in Re Murray, 124 App. Div. 548, 108 N. Y. Supp. 1047, where testatrix gave her residuary estate to a certain person, who was also appointed executor, "requesting that he make such distribution of the same or any portion thereof as I shall indicate by memorandum, written direction, or otherwise," it was held that, although the word "distribution" would tend strongly to indicate the absence of any intention to make an absolute gift, yet, in view of the fact that in another clause of her will she created another trust and appointed the same person trustee, using different language, and of the use of the words "or any portion thereof," showing an uncertainty whether she would make any request, or, if she made one, to what portion of the residuary estate it 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

might relate, the testatrix intended to give the residuary estate absolutely, imposing no obligation upon the residuary legatee whatever, but trusting entirely to him to carry out any direction she might see fit to make.

In Re Perkins, 68 Misc. 255, 124 N. Y. Supp. 998, the joint will of testator and his wife provided that the remainder of their personal and real estate and belongings were to be disposed of by two certain individuals "as they think best, we having advised with them thereof, and left the disposition of any residue of our estate to their judgment as may seem best to them at that time," the same persons being appointed executrices. It was held that as no direction was given to the legatees as to the disposition to be made of the estate, either secretly or by the terms of the instrument, but it was expressly provided that the property should be disposed of by them as they should see fit, the case was within statutory provisions that "a general or special power is beneficial where no person other than the grantee has, by the terms of its creation, any interest in its execution," and that "where a like power of disposition is given to a person to whom no particular estate is limited, such person also takes a fee subject to any future estates that may be limited thereon, but absolute in respect to creditors, purchasers, and encumbrancers;" so that the instrument in question passed an absolute title to the legatees.

So, also, in Hill v. Fiske, 69 Misc. 507, 125 N. Y. Supp. 1026, where a will provided "the balance of my estate to be distributed by executor in his discretion, or as may be hereafter mentioned in codicils or written additions to this will," and the testatrix died without having made any such codicils or additions, it was held that the clause conferred a general and beneficial power with respect to the residuary estate, by which an absolute title passed.

For other instances of gifts to persons also appointed executors, see Fowler v. Garlike, 1 Russ. & M. 232, 8 L. J. Ch. 66; Hughes v. Bent, 118 Ky. 609, 81 S. W. 931; Heidenheimer v. Bauman, 84 Tex. 174, 31 Am. St. Rep. 29, 19 S. W. 382, under heading "Gifts 'in trust' or 'upon trust,'" supra; also Briggs v. Penny, 3 DeG. & Sm. 535, affirmed in 3 Macn. & G. 546, under heading or may express to him." In the opinion the court say: "The will declares a trust too indefinite to be carried out, and the next of kin of the testatrix must take by way of resulting trust, unless the facts agreed show such a trust for the benefit of others as the court can execute. Nichols v. Allen, 130 Mass. 211, 39 Am. Rep. 445. No other written instrument was signed by the testatrix, and made part of the will by reference, as in Newton v. Seaman's Friend Soc. 130 Mass. 91, 39 Am. Rep. 433. . . . The will upon its face showing that the devisee takes the legal title only, and not the beneficial interest, and the trust not being sufficiently defined by the will to take effect, the equitable interest goes, by way of resulting trust, to the heirs or next of kin, as property of the deceased not disposed of by his will. Sears v. Hardy, 120 Mass. 524, 541, 542. They cannot be deprived of that equitable interest, which accrues to them directly from the deceased, by any conduct of the devisee; nor by any intention of the deceased, unless signified in those forms which the law makes essential to every testamentary disposition. A trust not sufficiently declared on the face of the will cannot therefore be set up by extrinsic evidence to defeat the rights of the heirs

Gifts to individuals designated by name.

In Ingram v. Fraley, 29 Ga. 553, where a testator made the following provision: "Owing to the peculiar condition of my property, and being desirous of keeping my negroes together as long as it can be done; and having the utmost confidence in the integrity of my long-trying friend, William Fraley, of said county, and that he will entirely carry out my wishes and desires, as they may be expressed to him by me, either verbally or in writing; and knowing that my said friend will, by this will, be able much more effectually to dispose of my estate as I wish it done, than I could at this time do myself, and with much less trouble to himself, I hereby give to the said Fraley my entire estate, real and personal, notes and other debts due me, money and property of every kind," it was held that the legatee took no beneficial interest, but took upon a trust insufficiently declared.

The case of Olliffe v. Wells, 130 Mass. 221, is sufficiently set out in the opinion in the case above reported, and therefore need not be restated in this place.

In Jay v. Lee, 41 Misc. 13, 83 N. Y. Supp. 579, a bequest to certain individuals "to distribute and make over the same to the persons to whom I indicate to them during my lifetime," it was held that the bequest was upon a trust which was valid, and not void for indefiniteness in that it does not designate the beneficiaries.

On the other hand, in George v. George, 186 Mass. 75, 71 N. E. 85, where testatrix, after devising her estate to her nephew, "to have and to hold the same unto him and his heirs and assigns forever," added: "I make this disposition of my estate, as I have heretofore expressed to my said nephew my desires concerning the division and disposition of my estate, and I have full confidence that he will respect my wishes, and will carry them out so far as possible," it was held that the paragraph quoted did not impose a trust on the property left to the nephew.

In Morris v. Larkin [1902] 1 I. R. 103, where a devise was made to a parish priest "for a Roman Catholic school, or for whatever other purpose he pleases," it was held that, as the devisee was not described as a trustee, or directed to hold upon any trust, but was given complete discretion to do whatever he should like with the property, he took beneficially, and not upon a trust.

In O'Brien v. Condon [1905] 1 I. R. 51, where a bequest of money was made to a certain person "to be distributed as he thinks right," it was held that the legatee, not being an executor of the will (in which no executor was named), and there being nothing in the word "distribute" to imply an absence of beneficial interest in the property, and no trust appearing upon the face of the will, the legatee took, so far as the will was concerned, a beneficial interest.

In McIsaac v. Beaton, 37 Can. S. C. 143, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 612, it was held that the absolute estate granted to the testator's widow in the first part of the following devise: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife . . . all and singular the property of which I am possessed, . . . to be by her disposed of amongst my beloved children as she may judge most beneficial to her and them," is not cut down by the subsequent words; and that those words did not constitute a trust which a court of equity would administer.

So, also, in Sinclair v. Malay, 40 N. S. 181, it was held that under a provision by which testator gave his wife all his property to "dispose of it to the best advantage for the support of the family, and to leave the residue as she sees fit and proper at her death," she took an absolute estate, and not in trust for the family.

In Re McDougall, 8 Ont. L. Rep. 640, it was held that under the following testamentary provision: "I bequeath to my wife all that I possess, with full power to dispose of part or the whole as she and the children may think wisest and best at any time," the widow clearly took absolutely.

In Jacob v. Macon, 20 La. Ann. 162, where testator gave to his wife a sum of money, desiring her to use it for the benefit of her brothers and sisters according to her best judgment and discretion, it was held that the wife had the absolute disposal of the money bequeathed, the desire or request of the testator being simply addressed to her conscience.

at law or next of kin. See Lewin, Tr. 3d ed. 75." See also Minot v. Atty. Gen. 189 Mass. 176, 75 N. E. 149.

In the case at bar Mrs. Isabelle C. Harmon, the legatee and executrix, who wrote the will herself at the request of Mrs.

Doherty, who signed it, was permitted to state in her testimony that she did not intend to use a dollar of the estate for her own benefit, and that, in writing the will, she "intended to so word it that she would not keep a dollar of it." It is not in ques-

In Rector v. Alcorn, 88 Miss. 788, 41 So. 370, where a testator, after making provision for his son and reciting the fact that he had in his lifetime conveyed to his daughters their portions of his estate, gave all the balance thereof to his wife, "to be hers and to be disposed of as she may think best," adding: "I have full confidence in my said wife, and have abiding faith that she will deal justly with our children and the descendants of them," it was held that if the expression quoted should be construed as not merely an expression of confidence in the wife's acting wisely, but as imperative to control her as trustee, the whole purpose of testator, as indicated by the language used with reference to her, to make an independent provision for her, would be defeated, and therefore that she took absolutely.

In Walter v. Walter, 60 Misc. 383, 113 N. Y. Supp. 465, affirmed without opinion in 133 App. Div. 893, 118 N. Y. Supp. 268, which is affirmed also without opinion in 197 N. Y. 606, 91 N. E. 1122, where the bequest was to a certain person of a sum of money "for the purpose of dividing the same among such needy relatives" of testator's mother "as he in his discretion and judgment may select," it was held that the words of this clause, as to the legatee's payment over to persons whom he may select in his discretion from among the members of a certain class, import an intention not to create a trust, and that, the right of the legatee to receive or hold the legacy not being made conditional upon the continuation of his life until the amount was disbursed by him, nor upon the willingness of his executors so to disburse it, his personal representatives were entitled to the legacy.

In Bennett v. McLaughlin, 125 App. Div. 172, 109 N. Y. Supp. 63, where testator gave his wife all his property, adding, "and I desire that my said wife at my decease shall take my place, and shall have the right to sell and dispose of all or any of my real or personal estate as she may deem proper, and for the best interest of our children; and lastly, if anything is left, it is my desire that she shall divide the same between our children as she in her good judgment may consider just and fair," it was held that the wife took the property absolutely.

In Weller v. Weller, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 247, 54 S. W. 652, testator gave his estate to his wife "and her heirs forever, to have and to hold in her own use and benefit until my heirs become of age, and for her to divide equally the amount due to each that she in her judgment shall be entitled to," it was held that, in view of the condition 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of testator's estate at the time of making his will, the circumstances under which it was made, and the primary object of testator in executing the instrument, it should be regarded as vesting a fee simple estate in the wife, and the expression quoted as merely precatory words, which do not create a trust.

But in Green v. Collins, 28 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 139, where testator left the remainder of his estate to his wife "to be divided amongst my children as she thinks proper," it was held that an express trust was created which carries the capital and the profits until a division to the children in such proportions as the mother may appoint, the court saying: "To language so unequivocal, it is vain to oppose suppositions that, as the testator ought to have provided for his wife, and as he left it to her discretion to make a division among their children, therefore he might have intended to leave it also to her discretion to keep a part or all for herself. If he had such an intention, it is not to be found in the will; but the contrary very plainly."

And in Seefried v. Clarke, — Va. —, 74 S. E. 204, where testatrix left a will by which she appointed her husband as executor, and bequeathed to "said husband, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, all of my estate, real and personal, with one simple request, that the estate be divided with my children or its equivalents, as his better judgment may direct," it was held that the use of the word "request" was indicative of an intention to create a precatory trust; that its force was not diminished, but was rather emphasized, by the use of the word "simple," and that the use of the term "as his better judgment may direct" was not meant to clothe the husband with an arbitrary discretion with respect to the division of the estate.

And in Carroll v. Adams, 105 N. Y. Supp. 967, where testatrix directed her residuary estate to be divided into three shares, one share going to a niece "for her to divide as she thinks best with" her mother, sister, and four brothers, it was held that, as the whole scheme of the will seems to have been the purpose of testatrix to devise her property to her nephews and nieces, the bequest above stated was in trust for the persons mentioned.

For other instances of gifts to individuals designated by name, see Sims v. Sims, 94 Va. 580, 64 Am. St. Rep. 772, 27 S. E. 436, under heading "Gifts 'in trust' or 'upon trust,'" supra; also Re Keenan, 107 App. Div. 234, 94 N. Y. Supp. 1099, under heading "Where other provision is made for legatees," supra.

tion that in attempting to administer the trust she has adhered to that intention with scrupulous fidelity. But while the language of the will clearly manifests an intention to create a trust, it is the opinion of the court that for reasons above stated, under the salutary and time-honored rules governing the creation and execution of trusts, the terms of this bequest do not declare a trust sufficiently definite to be executed; that there is a resulting trust in favor of the heirs at law; and that the estate should be divided among them after the payment of debts and expenses of administration.

Decree for plaintiffs accordingly.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.
B. ADOUE et al.

(— Tex. —, 137 S. W. 648.)

Subrogation — guardian's surety — one assisting defalcation.

1. The surety on a guardian's bond, who is compelled to make good a defalcation of the guardian, is subrogated to any right which the estate has against one who aided in the defalcation.

Same — assisting guardian's misappropriation of funds — liability.

2. A bank which issues to its customer a certificate of deposit in his favor as guardian, the funds for which he secures from individual sources and from a loan by it on collateral furnished by him individually, which certificate he needs to make good a defalcation in his guardian's account, in order to secure a surety on his guardian's bond, is charged with notice that he thereby devotes the funds to the use of his ward, and will be liable to the estate in case it accepts a surrender of the certificate, returns the funds represented by it to their original sources, and surrenders the collateral, although it had no notice of the defalcation and acted in good faith in the transaction.

Note. — Applicability of deposits to individual indebtedness of depositor where word suggestive of fiduciary character is appended to his name.

The right to garnish money deposited in a bank in a form importing that depositor is acting as agent or fiduciary is treated in the note to Silsbee State Bank v. French Market Grocery Co. 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1207.

The earlier cases upon the question stated in the title are treated in the notes to Cunningham v. Bank of Nampa, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 706; Boyle v. Northwestern Nat. Bank, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1110; and Rochester & C. Turnp. Road Co. v. Paviour, 52 L.R.A. 790. In connection with the cases discussed in these notes, see also Petty v. Dunlap Hardware Co. 99 Ga. 300, 25 S. E. 697, holding that money deposited in a bank to the credit of "P., agent," could be reached by a garnishment served upon the bank at the instance of a creditor of P., and that, if the bank knew the creditor's contention was that this money in fact belonged to P. individually, and not to another for whom he claimed to act in making the deposit, it could not, except at its peril, pay over the money, even to the alleged principal; and Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Alexander, 120 Pa. 476, 14 Atl. 402, holding that a bank in which money had been deposited under the name of "A., deputy treasurer," could not apply such money to the payment of an overdraft by another as county treasurer, it being said that, granting that the money belonged to the county, yet, as between the bank and its depositor, it was the money of the latter, and was in no sense earmarked as public money.

Later cases are Silsbee State Bank v. French Market Grocery Co. 103 Tex. 629, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1207, 132 S. W. 465, holding that money on deposit in a bank in the name of a certain person, "agent," is prima facie his property, and therefore subject to garnishment for his debt, to defeat which he has the burden of showing that it in fact belonged to an undisclosed principal; Denton Nat. Bank v. Kenney, — Md. —, 81 Atl. 227, holding that the deposit of a check made payable to "W. H. D., Atty.," did not, because of the mere placing of the abbreviation "Atty." after the payee's name, give notice to the depositor that the check was impressed with a trust so as to prevent the bank applying the amount thereof to the individual indebtedness of the depositor to the bank; and First Nat. Bank v. Greene, — Ky. —, 114 S. W. 322, holding that where a bank receives a check for a ward's share of an estate, made payable to "A. W. G., guardian, and M. G.," the ward, and, knowing of the trust character of the funds, credits the deposit to the individual credit of the guardian, it cannot avoid liability to the ward, where it applies the deposit in payment of a debt due it from the guardian individually.

It will be observed that the decision in UNITED STATES FIDELITY & G. Co. v. ADOUE, that the bank was chargeable with notice that the funds had been devoted to the use of the ward, did not rest alone upon the use of the word "guardian," but upon that fact in connection with other facts in the case suggestive of the fiduciary character of the funds.

dian of funds belonging to his ward. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hunt, Myer, & Townes and George G. Clough, for plaintiff in error:

Adoue & Lobit were notified by the fact that Compton made the deposit as guardian, that the money belonged to the estate of the ward, and they could not lawfully pay it to any person, except by Compton's order, and then only for the uses of the estate.

Plaintiff, having been compelled as a surety on the bond of Compton, as guardian, to make good to the estate the misappropriation by Compton and defendants of the fund represented by the certificate of deposit, was subrogated to the rights of said estate against the defendants.

Mr. James H. Robertson, also for defendants in error:

This court should not determine the question as to the legal effect of the fact that the actual transaction was the issuance of the deposit certificate against a deposit of cash and of collaterals, and the redemption of the certificate by returning the deposits to Compton, the depositor.

Brown v. Elmendorf, 87 Tex. 56, 26 S. W. 1043.

Having deposited collateral for the loan, Compton did not owe the bank the sum which went into the certificate. The deposit prima facie belonged to him personally.

Ramsey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For the purposes of this opinion, we adopt the statement of the case made by the court of civil appeals. While quite lengthy, it cannot be well abbreviated. It is as follows:

"This suit was brought by the appellant against the appellees, Adoue & Lobit, a banking firm composed of B. Adoue and Joseph Lobit, to recover of said firm and of the individual members thereof the sum of $11,939.83, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from March 7, 1903, together with the court costs paid by appellant in a suit brought in the district court of Galveston county by S. S. Hanscom, guardian, against appellant and other parties upon the bond of A. J. Compton, guardian of the estate of Menard James. The petition alleges, in substance, that on March 3, 1903, the appellant became surety upon the bond of A. J. Compton, guardian of the estate of Menard James, a lunatic, said guardianship being then pending in the county court of Galveston county; that prior to the time appellant became such surety, the said guardian had deposited with the appellee bank the sum of $11,913.83, which was all of the cash assets of said estate, and as evidence of such deposit appellee bank on October 20, 1902, executed and delivered a certificate of deposit in said amount in favor of A. J. Compton, guardian, and payable to his order; that, after appellant became surety for said guardian, he indorsed and delivered said certificate to appellees on or about March 7, 1903, and they canceled same, and appropriated the proceeds thereof to the payment and satisfaction of an individual indebtedness due them by said Compton; 'that appellees at the time of the deposit of said money and the issuance of said certificate to A. J. Compton, guardian, and at all times thereafter, had full knowledge and notice that the said deposit and said money represented by the certificate was not the individual property of A. J. Compton, but that it was, and continued to be, the property of said estate, of which A. J. Compton was the duly qualified and acting guardian, and that, by reason of the premises, Adoue & Lobit, when they knowingly applied said sum as before stated, knowingly misapplied, misappropriated, and converted the same to their uses, and thereby became indebted, liable to, and bound to pay, said estate the said sum so converted, together with 6 per cent interest from date of conversion, and that, upon the death of said Menard James, they became liable and bound to pay the temporary administrator as aforesaid, but they have failed and refused to pay same; that said sum of money was never restored to or repaid said estate by the said Compton, and after the death of said guardian and of said lunatic, in a suit against appellant and other sureties of said guardian, judgment was rendered against appellant for said sum, and in satisfaction of said judgment appellant has paid to the administrator of said estate said sum of $11,913.85, with legal interest thereon from the date of its conversion by appellees, as aforesaid, and that, by reason of such payment, appellant has become and is subrogated to the rights of said estate against appellees.' The defendants answered by a general exception, various special exceptions (which were overruled), a general denial, and special pleas, in substance, as follows:

ey or credit it represented were not the assets of said estate, nor were same deposited with defendants as such, nor were they deposited by A. J. Compton as guardian of said estate, or in his capacity as such, nor were defendants ever notified by any person, or in any manner, that Compton made such deposit or any deposit as guardian of said estate, nor that the certificate or what it represented belonged to said estate, or was claimed to belong thereto, and that they deny that they ever had any knowledge or notice, actual or constructive, that such certificate, or what it represented, was the money or property of said ward's estate, or was claimed to be such, or in any manner concerned therewith, until about March, 1905, or later. That said certificate was issued under the following circumstances: A. J. Compton placed with, or caused to be sent to, defendants $5,000, loaned him by his brother, and arranged with defendants for a credit of about $6,913.85, to secure which he deposited collaterals and securities sufficient in amount and value to protect them in said loan, and, based upon said two transactions, defendants issued the certificate described in plaintiff's petition. That upon the return, surrender, and cancellation of said certificate, about March 7, 1903, defendants delivered to said Compton said securities, and shortly after paid his check for $5,000, without any knowledge or notice, actual or constructive, that either said certificate or the money or credit represented by it, or the $5,000 deposited by or for said Compton and paid out as above stated, and the credit or loan advanced by defendants, were the property and assets of any person or estate other than of the defendants or A. J. Compton, as the case may be. That they did not know that he was guardian of an estate, or that he was a guardian of any kind, or in any capacity, nor did they know, actually or constructively, that any claim other than by or through Compton individually was, or would be, asserted to said certificate or said funds and credit, and that said certificate issued by them was reacquired by them for a valuable consideration, without notice of any adverse claim thereto, or to that which it represented, and that they were innocent purchasers thereof at or before maturity, and entitled to protection as such. That, so far as the certificate or the money which it represented being the property of said estate, that same was or represented in law and equity defendants' property, or that of Compton, or person other than James, as none of it ever came from said estate directly or indirectly, or was ever owned by it, but that, if same was in legal contemplation the property of said estate, then they say that they had no intimation, knowledge, or information of such fact, and were not put upon inquiry, and were not only justified, but required, by law to redeem said certificate and pay out said $5,000, as was done, and return to said Compton that which they had received from him; and that they cannot and should not be required to pay the same a second time, as Compton's estate is insolvent, and that they would have lost their debt and securities if they had pursued any other course.

"(2) That, if said Compton was ever short in his account with said estate, the same occurred long before any of the transactions before described, and that they never knew, actually or constructively, that the same was claimed or was the fact, until several years after they had redeemed said certificate and paid out the money and returned said securities, and that it would be unjust and inequitable, after they had parted with a valuable consideration in the redemption of same, to require them, without the return of such cash and collaterals, to again pay the amount of said certificate, and that they are entitled to be restored to the position they occupied prior to the redemption or payment of said certificate.

"(3) That they deny they ever knew or were informed, directly or indirectly, that said Compton had represented to plaintiff or its agent that the certificate or fund represented by it was the property of said estate, or was ever held by him in his capacity as guardian thereof, and they deny that Compton as guardian of said estate ever had any account with them, or any credit extended to him in such capacity, and that the word "Guardian" following his name upon said certificate and upon any entry in their books was a mere descriptio personæ, and did not and could not advise them of any of the matters alleged as constituting knowledge or notice that the money or certificate or both belonged to said estate or were assets thereof.

"(4) That the plaintiff in the former suit described in its petition asserted that the shortage occurred long prior to the issuance of said certificate, and that no restitution was ever made by Compton, and that plaintiff should not now be allowed to assume an inconsistent and contrary position, but held to such assertion.

"(5) They plead the two-year and four-year statutes of limitation against plaintiff's demand.

"(6) That plaintiff is a bonding and guaranty company for compensation."

"(1) That on October 20, 1902, said Compton was short in his guardianship accounts to the amount of $11,913.83, and that said certificate was obtained for the purpose of replacing the funds theretofore embezzled by him, and that said certificate, together with other assets of said estate, were thereupon delivered to said Marx and Moore to be held by them while sureties upon the guardianship bond of said Compton, and on said same day, after being indorsed to them by said Compton as guardian of said estate, said certificate, together with all the assets of said estate, were delivered to Adoue & Lobit as trustees, who held same as such until about March 7, 1903. That, by the issuance of said certificate, Adoue & Lobit placed it in the power of said Compton to repay the money which he had theretofore embezzled from said estate, and said Compton did so replace same, and by reason thereof said certificate and its proceeds became the property of said estate. That, at all times after the execution and delivery of said certificate, said defendants, and each of them, had both actual and constructive knowledge and notice of the ownership of said certificate, and of the money it represented, and, if not, that they had notice of such facts as would have put a person of ordinary care and prudence upon notice and investigation of the true facts, and from an investigation of such facts they would have learned that said certificate and the money represented thereby was the property of said estate; and they are now estopped to claim that they did not know that said certificate and the money it represented was the property of said estate.

"(2) That at the time of the conversion of said certificate and the money it represented, and long prior thereto, the said Menard James was non compos mentis, and a lunatic, and continued to be such until his death, about March 19, 1906, and that under the statutes of limitation, neither the two nor the four years nor any other statutes of limitation run against lunatics or persons of unsound mind, and that after the death of said Menard James the statutes of limitation were suspended for one year, or until the appointment and qualification of his administrator. That the instrument herein sued upon was payable to A. J. Compton as guardian, and that the real beneficiary was the said Menard James, as aforesaid, and no statute of limitation, if ever put in operation, had run in favor of defendants prior to the filing of this suit. That the statutes of limitation could not begin to run against plaintiff's cause of action, because same is based upon a trust, and that defendant held said money in trust for the benefit of said estate. That the statutes of limitation did not begin to run against plaintiff until it was forced to pay the indebtedness which is the basis of this action, which was done about March 14, 1908. That plaintiff is subrogated to all the rights of said Menard James, non compos mentis, and his estate, and, by reason thereof it is entitled to the benefit of the exception made in the statute with reference to persons of unsound mind.'

"The cause was tried in the court below without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in favor of defendants.

"The following findings of fact by the trial court are supported by the evidence, and are adopted as our fact conclusions:

"On the 20th of October, 1902, A. J. Compton obtained from Adoue & Lobit, bankers at Galveston, a cash advance of about $7,000 on open account against collaterals regarded by them as of sufficient value to secure the amount. On the same day, against the $7,000 so advanced, and upon the faith of a despatch to them from the cashier of a bank in Houston, to the effect that the Houston bank had forwarded them their check for $5,000, payable to Compton's order, he procured from them a certificate of deposit, reading as follows:

Galveston, Tex. Oct. 20, 1902.

"A. J. Compton, guardian, has deposited with us in cy. eleven thousand nine hundred thirteen and  $\frac{83}{100}$  dollars, payable to the order of himself on return of this certificate, properly indorsed.

No. 1895.

[Signed] Adoue & Lobit.

"Indorsed: A. J. Compton Gdn.

"The certificate was charged by Adoue & Lobit to Compton's personal account, absorbing the credit items named. Compton had only two accounts with them, one as county treasurer and the other personal. He at no time had any account with them as guardian of any estate. No other entry was made on the books of Adoue & Lobit of the certificate, save as above, except its notation in the list of certificates of deposit, showing that a certificate of deposit, payable to A. J. Compton, guardian, was an outstanding liability of the bank.

"Compton was, and had been for a year or more before this transaction, a defaulter in his account as guardian of the estate of Menard James, non compos mentis, an estate being administered in the county court of Galveston county for about $12,000. His purpose in obtaining the certificate was to cover up the defalcation. Pursuant to this purpose, on the day of its issuance, he exhibited the certificate to the county judge to procure the approval of his account showing a corresponding cash balance on hand. His bond as guardian had been originally fixed by the county judge at $20,000, and afterwards raised to $70,113.66, which he had not given at the time of the issuance of the certificate. He contemplated at the time securing its reduction to about $30,000, and procuring plaintiff's suretyship on his bond when it should be thus reduced. On the same day, 20th of October, he exhibited the certificate to the local agent of the plaintiff, a surety company, in verification of the correctness of his account as guardian. He exhibited the certificate, also on the same day, to M. Marx and C. H. Moore, to give them assurance of the correctness of his accounts, and procure their signatures as sureties on the $76,113.66 bond, pending the application for its reduction. He, at the same time, exhibited to Marx and Moore all the other personal property of the estate, consisting of wharf and gas company stock issued to Menard James, estate of Menard James, and Compton, guardian; and upon his indorsing the certificate of deposit to them, and agreeing to deposit it, together with the certificates of stock, with Adoue & Lobit, subject to the order of Marx and Moore, they signed his bond. Mr. Moore accompanied Mr. Compton to Adoue & Lobit's bank, having first prepared a receipt for them to sign. Moore and Compton stated to Mr. Lobit that they wished to leave the papers with them for safe-keeping, or as a special deposit, and asked him to sign the receipt. He did so, and placed the envelop containing the securities in their safe. The receipt is as follows:

"Galveston, Tex. Oct. 20, 1902.

"Received of C. H. Moore and M. Marx one unsealed envelop containing one certificate of deposit, No. 1895, signed by Adoue & Lobit, to the order of A. J. Compton, Gdn., properly indorsed for amount of eleven thousand nine hundred thirteen and  $\frac{83}{100}$  dollars; also certificate No. 1335 for twenty-six shares of Galveston Gas Company stock and certificates Nos. 3254, 73 shares; 820, 2 shares; 845, 31 shares; 876, 20 shares; 998, 10 shares; 562, 17 shares; and 1045, 20 shares, representing in all 173 shares of Galveston Wharf Company stock, to be delivered only on an order signed by C. H. Moore and M. Marx, or their administrators. (Original.) Adoue & Lobit.

"On the 20th of February, 1903, Compton obtained the reduction of his bond to $30,000, and the signatures thereto of the plaintiff as his surety, which was approved by the county judge on the 3d day of March, 1903. On the 7th day of March, 1903, he presented to Adoue & Lobit the order of Marx and Moore for the delivery to him of the package of securities left with them, as above stated. The order is in the following form:

"Galveston, Texas, March 4th, 1903.
"Messrs. Adoue & Lobit,
Galveston, Texas,

"Gentlemen:—

"Please deliver to Mr. A. J. Compton the following papers left with you for our account, viz.: Certificate of deposit No. 1895 for $11,913.83. Certificate No. 1335, 26 shares Gas Company stock. Certificates Nos. 3524, 820, 845, 998, 562, and 1045, Wharf Company stock, aggregating 173 shares.

Yours truly,

"C. H. Moore, M. Marx.

"Adoue & Lobit thereupon delivered the package to Compton, and he, having first erased the names of Marx and Moore from his indorsement, leaving thereon his indorsement, "A. J. Compton, Guardian," requested them to cash it by crediting it to his account. They did so, thus repaying themselves their advance of $7,000, and leaving a balance of proceeds to Compton's credit of $5,000, which he shortly afterwards withdrew by check. At the same time they returned to him his collaterals.

"There was no agreement that the money called for by the certificate was to remain in the hands of Adoue & Lobit, or that the certificate was to be returned to their custody, or that it was not to be negotiated. Adoue & Lobit would have paid it at any time over the counter in cash on its presentation, indorsed by Compton in the words, "A. J. Compton, Guardian."

"Adoue & Lobit did not know at any time of the events stated that Compton was guardian of the estate of Menard James, as above stated, in obtaining the certificate of deposit; and when presented for payment, March 7, 1903, knew nothing of the use he had made of it, either its exhibition to the county judge, to plaintiff's local agent, or the agreement with Marx and Moore. They had no knowledge or information on these subjects until the facts were developed by the suit against Compton's sureties as guardian of the estate of Menard James, in 1905. When the package was brought them for safe-keeping by Moore and Compton, Mr. Lobit did not take the papers out of the unsealed envelop, but glanced at the corners sufficiently to satisfy himself that the shares of stock called for by the receipt were there. He also recognized their certificate of deposit. He made no inquiry. His suspicions were not in any way aroused. The relations of Adoue & Lobit to the transaction were exclusively through Mr. Lobit. They received no pecuniary profit from it, and contemplated none. They charged no interest on the $7,000 advanced, and acted throughout to oblige a customer whose account as county treasurer was valuable to them as bankers. Compton died on the 1st day of November, 1904. His estate is notoriously insolvent. Suit was instituted by the legal representatives of the estate of Menard James against Compton's estate, and against three sets of sureties on his bond as guardian, and judgment recovered against the plaintiff as surety on the last bond on the 22d day of January, 1908, in the supreme court. Moore v. Hanscom, 101 Tex. 293, 106 S. W. 876, 108 S. W. 150. Plaintiff has since paid the judgment, amounting to $14,361.60.

"The plaintiff sues Adoue & Lobit, alleging the appropriation and conversion of the certificates; also, that it had not been paid, and was due the estate of James, and claiming subrogation to the rights of the estate of Menard James against them. I find that Adoue & Lobit acted throughout the transaction in good faith; that they regarded the certificate of deposit as the private property of A. J. Compton; that the facts known to them were not such as to affect them with notice, or excite the suspicion of a person of reasonable or ordinary prudence, and put him on inquiry. If the defendants are affected with notice that the certificate was or represented fiduciary funds, proper inquiry would have developed that Compton was the legally appointed guardian of the estate of Menard James, and that his accounts on file showed he should have on hand the amount of money called for by the certificate." [— Tex. Civ. App. —, 128 S. W. 636.]

To get the questions before our minds in order, it may be well to briefly restate some of the dates of the happenings above set out and other matters apparent of record, and not at all in dispute. The original certificate of deposit issued by Adoue & Lobit to A. J. Compton, guardian, was dated on October 20, 1902. The receipt issued by them to C. H. Moore and M. Marx for this certificate, payable to Compton as guardian, and for certain stocks therein described, was dated the same day. On the next day, October 21, 1902, Moore and Marx became sureties on Compton's guardianship bond in the sum of $76,113.66. On March 3, 1903, the plaintiff in error became surety on said guardian's bond in the sum of $30,000. On March 7th thereafter, the certificate of deposit issued to Compton as guardian was surrendered to Adoue & Lobit, and in part extinguishment of the liability therein recognized and thereby created, his personal debt to the bank was extinguished, his securities returned to him, and his personal account was credited with the balance thereof, to wit, $5,000. It also appeared from the testimony of Compton's brother that his debt of $5,000 was repaid to him on that day. It was shown that Compton represented, not only to Moore and Marx, but also to the county judge of Galveston county, that all the cash belonging to his ward's estate was on hand and intact, and as evidence thereof produced the certificate of deposit in question. This was a restoration of the funds of the ward which had theretofore, it seems, been dissipated, and these acts of Compton unequivocally stamped such fund with a trust character. On March 3, 1903, when plaintiff in error became his surety, the condition of the ward's estate, at least as to the fund in question, was unchanged. The ward's money was on hand and on deposit to his credit as guardian in a solvent bank. On March 7, 1903, it was all gone, and had by him been misapplied to the payment of his personal debts. The question before us is whether under the facts stated plaintiff in error can recover of the bank.

1. It was correctly held by the trial court that limitation had not, at the time of the institution of the suit, barred the company's claim, if such right of recovery existed. This seems so clear that we do not feel called on to discuss that question.

2. We think the conclusion of the learned trial court equally sound that the plaintiff in error was subrogated to all the rights of the ward or his estate, and that, if the administrator of the estate of the ward could, under the facts in the case, recover against Adoue & Lobit, that a recovery should also be adjudged in its favor.

3. The principal question in the case is, Were Adoue & Lobit charged with notice of the trust character of the funds in question, and were their acts and conduct in relation to same such as to render them liable? This, we think, must be answered in the affirmative. Such was clearly the effect and fair purport of the decision of this court rendered on the 22d of January, 1908, in the case of Moore v. Hanscom, supra.

The facts of that case, so far as essential to a decision by us now, are practically identical with the facts in the present record.

It was there said: "When Compton deposited in the bank of Adoue & Lobit the sum of money due to the estate of Menard James, and the money was entered to the credit of A. J. Compton, guardian, the fund so deposited became the money and property of the ward's estate. Anderson v. Walker, 93 Tex. 119, 53 S. W. 821; Skipwith v. Hurt, 94 Tex. 322, 60 S. W. 423. Lobit testified that the bank would have paid the money on presentation of the certificate of deposit by Compton, or by any person holding it with Compton's indorsement on it. Adoue & Lobit were notified by the fact that Compton made the deposit as guardian, that the money belonged to the estate of the ward, and they could not lawfully pay it to any person except by Compton's order, and then only for the uses of the estate; that is, they could not have knowingly applied the money in their hands to the payment of any order made by Compton in any other character than that of guardian, nor could they have applied the money to the payment of any debt due from Compton personally to them or to any other person. The fact that the certificate of deposit, with the stocks mentioned, was placed in the hands of Moore and Marx to be preserved for the estate so long as they were upon the bond, did not affect the title of the estate to the money, but, on the contrary, evinces a purpose to preserve it for the benefit of the estate, and in their hands as such securities the money was in law in the possession of the estate and belonged to the estate. Johnson v. Jones, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 10, 68 S. W. 14." This is in accordance with the rule which obtains generally, and which is thus stated in vol. 2, § 1612a, Daniel on Negotiable Instruments: "If a deposit be made in bank to the credit of a certain person as agent or trustee, the use of such terms would charge the bank with notice that the funds were there in a fiduciary relation. It would have no lien upon them for the private debts of the depositor, and, if it permitted them to be used for his private purposes in transactions with the bank, it would be bound." The same doctrine is recognized by 1 Perry on Trusts, 4th ed. p. 289, where it is said: "But if a purchaser takes securities from a trustee, with the word 'trustee' upon their face, in payment of a private debt due from the trustee, the sale may be avoided by the cestui que trust, or the purchaser may be held as a trustee." In support of the text the author refers to the leading case of Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382, 97 Am. Dec. 107, 1 Am. Rep. 115, where it was held that if a certificate of stock expressed in the name of "A B, trustee," is by him pledged to secure his own debt, the pledgee is by the terms of the certificate put on inquiry as to the character and limitations of the trust, and, if he accepts the pledge without inquiry, does so at his peril. The rule is thus expressed in 7 Cyc. p. 951: "Expression of Fiduciary Relationship in Signature or Indorsement.—The expression of a fiduciary character of a holder or transferrer on the face of a negotiable instrument is notice to the purchaser of a probable limited or restricted authority to negotiate the same. This is so where paper is signed or indorsed by an agent as such, especially where the paper is made payable to him as agent, or where it appears on the face of the paper by the indorsement to the holder, or by other papers or orders accompanying the note, that the transferrer has the instrument as trustee or guardian or in some other official capacity, although it has been held that where it is not shown either by the note or otherwise, that a fiduciary relationship exists, except by a word or phrase descriptive of the person, such terms should be considered as descriptio personæ, and will not constitute notice to the purchaser of a probable limited authority to make the transfer." It will be noted that the rule of descriptio personæ seems limited to Missouri. A very clear statement of the law is contained in 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 2d ed. p. 1129, where the author says: "The circumstances sufficient to affect a purchaser with constructive notice are scarcely susceptible of classification, since each case is recognized as determined by its own fact. It is, however, generally admitted that where the instrument of transfer or a paper which constitutes evidence of property, such as a check, note, or stock certificate, indicates on its face that the property transferred is held in trust, a purchaser or pledgee takes with notice of the trust. Use of word 'trustee.' Ordinarily the words 'trustee' or 'in trust' or 'guardian,' contained in a deed, mortgage, assignment, or indorsement, are deemed sufficient to put a transferee on inquiry. It has, however, been held that such words alone are not sufficient to give notice that a breach of trust is about to be committed, and that it is necessary for the purchaser to inquire whether the circumstances of the case constitute reasonable ground to conclude that a fraud is contemplated."

Indeed, the law seems well settled, both in England and America, in accordance with the holding of this court in Moore v. Hanscom, supra. But it is contended that the doctrine of the law merchant in respect to negotiable instruments has in the case a controlling effect. That Adoue & Lobit were by law compelled to pay the certificate when presented by Compton, or if presented by another with his proper indorsement, and that, as such payment could be enforced, they were authorized in paying same, should be protected in so doing, and would not be liable for a subsequent misappropriation of the fund by Compton. This general rule is recognized in the decisions which hold that a bank cannot apply such trust fund to the payment of the personal debts of the trustee or guardian, or permit its diversion to the personal use of such guardian. Thus, in Duckett v. National Mechanics' Bank, 86 Md. 400, 39 L.R.A. 84, 63 Am. St. Rep. 513, 38 Atl. 983, it was said: "It is immaterial, so far as respects the duty of the bank to the depositor, in what capacity the depositor holds or possesses the fund which he places on deposit. The obligation of the bank is simply to keep the fund safely, and to return it to the proper person, or to pay it to his order. If it be deposited by one as trustee, the depositor, as trustee, has the right to withdraw it, and the bank, in the absence of knowledge or notice to the contrary, would be bound to assume that the trustee would appropriate the money, when drawn, to a proper use. Any other rule would throw upon a bank the duty of inquiring as to the appropriation made of every fund deposited by a trustee or other like fiduciary; and the imposition of such a duty would practically put an end to the banking business, because no bank could possibly conduct business if, without fault on its part, it were held accountable for the misconduct or malversation of its depositors who occupy some fiduciary relation to the fund placed by them with the bank. In the absence of notice or knowledge, a bank cannot question the right of its customer to withdraw funds, nor refuse (except in the instances already noted) to honor his demands by check, and therefore, even though the deposit be to the customer's credit in trust, the bank is under no obligation to look after the appropriation of the trust funds when withdrawn, or to protect the trust by setting up a jus tertii against a demand. But if the bank has notice or knowledge that a breach of trust is being committed by an improper withdrawal of funds, or if it participates in the profits or fruits of the fraud, then it will be undoubtedly liable. In support of these general principles, if support they need at all, we may refer to Munnerlyn v. Augusta Sav. Bank, 88 Ga. 333, 30 Am. St. Rep. 159, 14 S. E. 554; State Nat. Bank v. Reilly, 124 Ill. 464, 14 S. E. 657; Essex County v. Newark City Nat. Bank, 48 N. J. Eq. 51, 21 Atl. 185, all

And then, in full recognition of the general rule contended for by defendants in error, the same court further says: "Precisely for the reasons that the bank is not responsible for the misappropriation of the proceeds of the first check, it is liable to the new trustees for the misapplication by Clagett of the funds collected by it on the second check. The second or Duckett check in terms directed the cashier of the Mechanics' Bank 'to deposit' the $2,024.30 'to the credit of Henry W. Clagett, trustee.' This was an explicit notification to the bank that Clagett was not the actual owner of the money. Bundy v. Monticello, 84 Ind. 119; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 832. It was an equally explicit instruction to the bank not to place the funds to the credit of Clagett's personal account. It was consequently more than a mere memorandum made for the convenience of the drawer of the check. Knowing that the money was not Clagett's, but that it was payable to him, and to be deposited to his credit as trustee, the bank had no authority to place it to his individual credit (American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Loretta Gold & S. Min. Co. 165 Ill. 109, 56 Am. St. Rep. 233, 46 N. E. 202); and, if loss ensued by reason of Clagett drawing the fund out by checks on his personal account, the bank is liable to make restitution to the trust estate. The bank, in the eye of the law, participated in the breach of trust of which Clagett was guilty. In fact, the bank took the first step that ended in the spoliation of the trust. Its act in placing distinctly marked trust funds to the personal credit of Clagett was obviously wrongful, and it must bear the resulting consequences." So that, to the suggestion of the court of civil appeals that a bank which pays trust funds on the order of a guardian, in the customary way in which such business is conducted, "should not be held liable for the misappropriation by the guardian of the funds so paid by the bank," the answer is obvious that such rule can have no application where the bank, visited as it was, as a matter of law, with the trust nature of the funds in its possession, participated actively in the transaction with the guardian in paying a large portion of the fund to itself in payment of the guardian's personal debt, thus securing a personal benefit to itself, and aiding in placing the remainder of such trust funds to the personal credit of such guardian so that same could be, as in fact they were, immediately misapplied by him. Again it is said that, "they (Adoue & Lobit) could not, on surrender of the certificate properly indorsed, have refused to pay him the money therein called for, and they would not be required to see that the money so paid was not misappropriated by him. It seems to us that this conclusion overlooks the fact that in the transaction here the payment and the misappropriation were not only contemporaneous, but constituted part and parcel of the same act, and that the misappropriation was in the act of payment of Compton's debt to the bank."

Here, by express representation and by designation in the certificate, the fund in question was made and stamped with the fixed character of part of his ward's estate. In Moore v. Hanscom plaintiff in error was held liable on Compton's bond on the theory and express holding that there had, by the acts in question, been a complete restitution by the guardian, and that such money was the money of the ward. This being true, and since as a matter of law Adoue & Lobit were visited with notice of the nature and trust character of the fund, it follows that, to the extent necessary to reimburse the bonding company, it is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of the cestui que trust, and all the facts appearing in the record, it results that the judgments of the District Court and of the Court of Civil Appeals should be and the same are hereby reversed, and judgment is now and here rendered in favor of the plaintiff in error, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, against the defendants in error, Adoue & Lobit, for the sum of $14,361.60 (that being a sum sufficient to indemnify plaintiff in error for the amount paid out by it as surety aforesaid), with interest from March 14, 1908, together with all cost incurred in this and the other courts.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN, & SOUTHERN RAILWAY, Appt.,

v.

LINDSAY JONES, by Next Friend.

(96 Ark. 558, 132 S. W. 636.)

Master — freight conductor — employment of assistants.

1. In the absence of a sudden or unexpected emergency, the conductor of a freight train has no implied authority to enter into a contract to carry a person to a certain place in consideration of the rendition of service in handling freight.

Carrier — assistant to crew — volunteer.

2. One taking passage upon a freight train under an agreement with the conductor to render services for his transportation is a mere volunteer, and assumes the risk of injury incident to the undertaking.

Same — custom — binding effect.

3. To bind a railroad company by a custom of conductors to carry persons on their trains in consideration of the rendition of services, it must be shown to have been known by the officers who conduct the affairs of the company, or to have been so general and long continued that they must be presumed to have had notice of it.

Note. — Liability of railroad company for injury to person wrongfully on train by collusion with a train employee.

The cases collected in this note are limited strictly to those where the person is on the train by virtue of an agreement with the train employees, and do not include cases where the person has a ticket, but is permitted to ride on an improper train.

As to degree of care owed to free passenger rightfully on carrier's conveyance, in absence of stipulation upon the subject, see note to Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Lawson, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 721.

As to duty of carrier to one who enters its cars upon his own business, and not as a passenger, see notes to Peterson v. South & Western R. Co. 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1240, and McElvane v. Central R. Co. 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 715.

As to duty and liability of street railway company to newsboys who board cars to sell papers, see note to Lebov v. Consolidated R. Co. 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 265.

A conductor of a railroad train has no implied authority to invite persons to ride without the payment of fare, and one so riding is not entitled to the rights of a passenger. Likewise persons riding upon the invitations of employees not having the control of the train, or any apparent authority to grant permission to ride thereon, such as brakemen, engineers, baggage men, yard masters, etc., are not entitled to the rights of passengers. 6 Cyc. 541; 33 Cyc. 817.

Riding on passenger train.

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Books, 57 Pa. 346, 98 Am. Dec. 229, it was said that one riding on a passenger car is presumed to be there lawfully as a passenger, and the onus is upon the carrier to prove affirmatively that he was a trespasser.

In Stalcup v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 16 Ind. App. 584, 45 N. E. 802, it was held that one riding upon a train by the invitation of the conductor, and without pay- 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for White County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries received by him while attempting to board one of defendant's freight trains. Reversed.

Statement by Hart, J.:

Lindsay Jones by N. A. Ford, his mother and next friend, brought this suit against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company to recover damages for injuries received by him while attempting to board one of defendant's local freight trains.

Lindsay Jones testified in his own behalf, and stated the circumstances connected with the happening of the accident, ing fare, was not entitled to the rights of a passenger, so as to recover for injuries received, in the absence of a showing that the conductor was empowered with authority to permit him to so ride.

And in Higgins v. Cherokee R. Co. 73 Ga. 149, it was said that one riding upon a passenger train by the invitation of the conductor, without paying fare, could not claim the rights of a passenger in case of injury.

And so in Reary v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 40 La. Ann. 32, 8 Am. St. Rep. 497, 3 So. 390, it was held that the railroad company was not liable for an injury to a child who boarded a passenger train by the permission of the baggage master, who had no authority or control over the train.

So, a person who knowingly induces the conductor to permit him to ride without paying fare, contrary to the rules of the company, combines with the conductor to defraud the railroad company, which will preclude a recovery for personal injuries caused by mere negligence. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 245; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 292. To the same effect is McVeety v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 45 Minn. 268, 11 L.R.A. 174, 22 Am. St. Rep. 728, 47 N. W. 809 (passenger riding in the caboose attached to a freight train).

And such conduct on the part of the husband, inducing the conductor to permit the wife to ride without paying fare, will preclude the wife from recovering for injuries caused by mere negligence of the railroad company, even though she had no knowledge that they were riding in violation of the rules of the company, since her husband was her agent, and what he knew in reference to the matter is the same as if it had actually come to her knowledge. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 292.

One who, having money with him with which he could pay his fare, falsely and fraudulently represents to the conductor that he is without means, and thereby induces the conductor to permit him to remain on the train without paying his fare.

substantially, as follows: He was a white person and was nineteen years old when he was injured. He had been at Bald Knob, a station on defendant's line of railroad in Arkansas, hunting work. He ran out of money, and failing to obtain employment, he decided to return home. Higginson was the station on defendant's line of road nearest his home. He asked the conductor of one of defendant's local freight trains if he would let him ride and work his way to Higginson. The conductor answered: "I will see about it directly," and directly came back and said: "Get on; you can work your way." The first stop was made at Judsonia, and he helped load and unload some freight. The conductor was standing around while the freight was unloaded. The next stop was at Kensett. Jones worked there, helping to load and unload the freight. While he was carrying a piece of freight from one of the cars to the freight house, the train, without notice or warning of any kind, was put in motion. Jones, after depositing the piece of freight in the freight room, turned around to get on the departing train. The train was running and Jones reached up to get the handle of the front end of the caboose to get on it. His foot slipped and fell under the wheels of the caboose. It was mashed so badly that it was necessary to amputate it. On the part of the defendant, it was shown that the conductor had no authority to employ anyone to assist the train crew in the operation of the takes upon himself all risk, and, if injured by accident happening to the train not due to recklessness or wilfulness on the part of the company, cannot recover. Condran v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 28 L.R.A. 749, 14 C. C. A. 506, 32 U. S. App. 182, 67 Fed. 522

One who pays a brakeman on a passenger train a sum of money to be carried to a certain point, and is told to ride upon the platform of the baggage car, and get off the train at all stops, and keep out of sight, and who follows up such instructions, is not entitled to the rights of a passenger, since it must be presumed that the directions to ride upon the platform and keep out of sight informed him, even if he would not otherwise have known it, that he was not received or considered as a passenger by the carrier or its authorized agents. Mendenhall v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 66 Kan. 438, 61 L.R.A. 120, 97 Am. St. Rep. 380, 71 Pac. 846.

Allegations that a minor, fifteen years of age, did not know that he was doing wrong in making such an arrangement as that referred to in the preceding paragraph, and did not know that he was exposing himself to any great danger in following up such directions, are insufficient to take the case out of the rule stated, or to relieve the minor from responsibility for his own negligence, where it is not alleged that he had not ordinary intelligence for his age, or lacked capacity to understand the nature of the transaction, or that he believed that the brakeman took the money in behalf of the company, or that he did not know that the reason he was told to ride upon the platform and keep out of sight was in order that the conductor should not see him. Ibid.

One riding on the platform of the express car of a passenger train, without invitation and against the rules of the company, is a trespasser, and may rightfully be ejected by the conductor, though he has paid the amount of the regular fare to the brakeman, since he had no right to suppose that such employee could bind the company with such an arrangement. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scott (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Weaver) 108 Ky. 392, 50 L.R.A. 381, 56 S. W. 674, it was held that one traveling on a train by courtesy of the conductor, without paying fare, is not deprived of the character and rights of a passenger by the fact that the conductor, in carrying him free, is violating a rule of the company, especially where there is no proof of a design to defraud the company.

And in Chattanooga Rapid Transit Co. v. Venable, 105 Tenn. 460, 51 L.R.A. 886, 58 S. W. 861, it was held that a night watchman at a railroad depot, who boards a train near his home to ride to the depot and report his readiness to return to duty the coming night, after being off duty a few days, has the rights of a passenger in case he is injured by the carrier's negligence, although he is riding in violation of a rule of the company, without a pass or payment of fare, but with the implied permission of the conductor, who has neglected to enforce the rule.

Riding on street car.

One on a street car with the knowledge and permission of the person in charge thereof is a passenger, although he has paid no fare, and is entitled to the same care and protection as if he had paid his fare. Muehlhausen v. St. Louis R. Co. 91 Mo. 332, 2 S. W. 316.

A street railway company is liable for negligent operation of its car to one riding upon the front platform without paying fare at the invitation of the driver, where there is no evidence of collusion with him to defraud the company, since such action by the driver was within the general scope of his employment, and it was immaterial that he was acting contrary to his instructions. Wilton v. Middlesex R. Co. 107 Mass. 108, 9 Am. Rep. 11 (action by minor); Wilton v. Middlesex R. Co. 125 Mass. 130 (action by parents).

To the same effect is Little Rock Traction & Electric Co. v. Nelson, 66 Ark 494, train, or in loading or unloading freight. The conductor, on behalf of the defendant, testified that he did not contract with the plaintiff to carry him from Bald Knob to Higginson in consideration of any services performed by him. He did testify to the fact that he saw the plaintiff on the train and that he intended to collect his fare later, but that he overlooked or neglected to take up his fare. On cross-examination, in response to the question: "Isn't it a fact that people are carried free by the conductors on the local freight trains up and down the Iron Mountain Road to assist the crew in the loading and unloading of freight at the stations?" he answered, "Colored men only."

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and from the judgment the defendant has duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

Plaintiff's position is no better than that of a trespasser.

O'Donnell v. Kansas City, St. L. & C. R. Co. 197 Mo. 110, 114 Am. St. Rep. 753, 95 S. W. 196; Doyle v. Kansas City, St. L. & C. R. Co. — Mo. —, 95 S. W. 200.

The conductor had no authority to create the relationship of carrier and passenger.

Hot Springs R. Co. v. Dial, 58 Ark. 318, 24 S. W. 500; Clark v. Colorado & N. W. R. Co. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 988, 91 C. C. A.

52 S. W. 7, holding a boy ten years of age riding upon a street car without paying fare, at invitation of a motorman in charge, who has authority to receive and let off passengers, not a trespasser, since the invitation of the motorman is an act within the general scope of his employment, and when the boy accepts it innocently, the company owes to him the diligence due to a passenger of his age and discretion.

And so also in the following cases the railway company has been held liable for negligent injury to children while riding upon the cars without paying fare, upon the invitation of those in charge: Buck v. People's Street R. & Electric Light & P. Co. 108 Mo. 179, 18 S. W. 1090, affirming 46 Mo. App. 555; Evansville Street R. Co. v. Meadows, 13 Ind. App. 155, 41 N. E. 398 (child riding by the invitation of the driver); Brennan v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 45 Conn. 284, 29 Am. Rep. 679; Danbeck v. New Jersey Traction Co. 57 N. J. L. 463, 31 Atl. 1038.

Likewise the railroad company was liable for an injury to a boy due to the negligence of the motorman in compelling him to leave the car while it was in motion, though in giving the permission to enter the car in return for a service to the motorman in turning the trolley, he was acting without authority from the master, since the negligent conduct which caused the injury was done while he was acting within his authority in managing and moving the car. Denison & S. R. Co. v. Carter, 98 Tex. 196, 107 Am. St. Rep. 626, 82 S. W. 782.

And in Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. v. Biddle, 1 Monaghan (Pa.) 553, 16 Atl. 488, it was held that the railway company was liable for the death of a boy due to the conduct of the conductor in compelling him to jump off while the car was in motion, though he was a trespasser and was riding by the invitation of another boy who was driving the car. (Biddle v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 112 Pa. 551, 4 Atl. 485, was the same case on a former appeal, which held that it was error for the trial court to enter a compulsory nonsuit.)

Metropolitan Street R. Co. 122 Mo. App. 154, 98 S. W. 1091; Hestonville Pass. R. Co. v. Grey, 1 Walk. (Pa.) 513.

In Finley v. Hudson Electric R. Co. 64 Hun, 373, 19 N. Y. Supp. 621, it was held that a boy riding on an electric car in violation of the rules of the company, without paying fare, but in return for his services in opening a switch at the request of the motorman who was in charge of the car, and also acting as conductor, is not entitled to the rights of a passenger, as the motorman was not acting within the line of his duty, nor in the furtherance of the master's interest or benefit.

Riding on freight trains.

In the absence of any rule or practice permitting freight trains to carry passengers, the presumption is that one riding for his own convenience on a freight train of a common carrier, not designed for the transportation of passengers, is unlawfully there, and is a trespasser. for injuries sustained by being thrown from the top of a freight car, due to the negligence of the train employees while switching the cars, where it did not appear that those in charge of the train had authority to employ assistants in its management, that there was an emergency for his employment, or that there was a custom or rule of the company that persons might pay their way by working on the train, since at most such person was upon the train by the sufferance of the conductor and brakeman, and assumed the risk to dangers to which he thus became exposed.

So, in Stalcup v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 16 Ind. App. 584, 45 N. E. 802, it was held that an averment that plaintiff was working for the defendant, loading and unloading freight and doing the general work of a brakeman, with the permission of the conductor, was insufficient to show that he was an employee and entitled to protection as such, in the absence of an averment that the conductor or those operating the train were authorized to employ him, or that an emergency or necessity existed for his employment.

A person has no right to assume that a conductor of a freight train was not violating his duty by allowing him to ride in the caboose without paying fare, even though he had no knowledge of the rule prohibiting conductors of freight trains from carrying passengers, especially where he does not enter the car at a passenger station or any place apparently designed for the reception of passengers, so as to entitle him to the rights of a passenger in case of injury. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Best, 169 Ill. 301, 48 N. E. 684.

In Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 382, 15 Am. Rep. 513, it was said that no act of a conductor of a freight train will bind the company as to carrying passengers, unless the company in some way assents to it.

Accordingly, it has been held that one riding upon a freight train without paying fare, by the invitation of the conductor, is not a passenger, and cannot recover for injuries due to negligent operation, since he could not have supposed that the conductor was acting within the general scope of his employment, or that, independently of the rules of the company, the conductor had any authority to extend such an invitation, as the ordinary business of conducting and managing a freight train does not involve any right to invite persons to ride upon such trains or to accept them as passengers. Powers v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 188, 26 N. E. 446; to the same effect are Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Cox, 66 Ohio St. 276, 90 Am. St. Rep. 583, 64 N. E. 119; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 169 Ill. 301, 48 N. E. 684; Simmons v. Oregon R. Co. 41 Or. 151, 69 Pac. 440, 1022; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Reed, 76 Ark. 106, 113 Am. St. Rep. 78, 88 S. W. 836.

A rule of a railroad prohibiting the carrying of passengers without a pass on freight trains applies to a former employee riding by the invitation of the conductor. Powers v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 188, 26 N. E. 446.

So, one riding on the caboose of a freight train, upon the invitation and suggestion of the conductor, for the purpose of seeking employment as a brakeman on the road, is not entitled to the protection of a passenger, where it is contrary to the rules of the company, and there is nothing in the attending circumstances, either in the condition of the caboose as fitted up for the transportation of passengers or the authority of a freight conductor, to lead one to the conclusion that the relation of carrier and passenger would be thereby created. Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 382, 15 Am. Rep. 513.

And one who, knowing that a conductor has no authority to grant free transportation, enters and rides upon his train with a deliberate intention not to pay his fare, under an agreement or under a tacit understanding with the conductor that he shall ride free, commits a fraud upon the railroad company, and is not a passenger, but is a mere trespasser, to whom the only duty of the company is to abstain from wilful or reckless injury. Purple v. Union P. R. Co. 57 L.R.A. 700, 51 C. C. A. 564, 114 Fed. 123.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the contention of the plaintiff that he made a contract with the conductor of one of defendant's local freight trains to carry him from Bald Knob to Higginson, in consideration of services to be performed by him in assisting the train crew in loading and unloading freight.

The undisputed evidence shows that the conductor did not have express authority to make such contract. Did he have implied authority to make it? The general rule is that the agent has the implied authority to do all things which are reasonably necessary to effectuate the main purpose for which he is employed.

Mr. Elliott says that the authority of the conductor ordinarily extends to the control of the movements of his trains and to the immediate direction of the movements of the employees engaged in operating the train, and does not extend to making contracts on behalf of the railway company. 1 Elliott, Railroads, § 302. Continuing, the author says: "As we have said, the conductor has no general authority to make contracts on behalf of the company, but he may in rare cases of necessity, when circumstances demand it, bind the company by such contracts as are clearly necessary to enable him to carry out his prescribed duties. In order that contracts made by him shall be obligatory upon the company, they must be made to enable him to perform the duties required of him, and must

To the same effect are Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hailey, 94 Tenn. 383, 27 L.R.A. 549, 29 S. W. 367; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 245; and McVeety v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 45 Minn. 268, 11 L.R.A. 174, 22 Am. St. Rep. 728, 47 N. W. 809, which is cited with approval in Greenfield v. Detroit & M. R. Co. 133 Mich. 557, 95 N. W. 546.

Likewise a person attempting in bad faith to defraud the company by riding free or for less than full fare, even with the consent of the conductor of the train, is a trespasser, to whom the company is not responsible for injuries not wantonly or wilfully inflicted. Kruse v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 97 Ark. 137, 133 S. W. 841.

The rule that one riding upon a train by fraud or stealth, without payment of fare, cannot recover for injuries not due to recklessness or wilfulness of the company, is not modified by a statute making every railroad company liable for all damages sustained by any person in consequence of the neglect of agents, or by mismanagement of the engineers or other employees. Condran v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 28 L.R.A. 749, 14 C. C. A. 506, 32 U. S. App. 182, 67 Fed. 522.

On the question as to right of wrongdoer to take advantage of general statutory imposition of damages for negligent injuries, see note appended to above case, in 28 L.R.A. 749.

One who, while trespassing upon a freight train, was granted permission by the conductor to ride to a certain place if he would throw the switch at that place, upon returning to the train without permission of the conductor after throwing the switch, again became a trespasser, to whom the railroad company owed no duty except to exercise reasonable care for his protection after his peril was discovered. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Jackson, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 630, 58 S. W. 526.

A railroad company is not liable for an assault upon a person riding upon a freight train by permission of the conductor, unless committed by an employee in the scope of his employment. Smith v. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. 124 Ind. 394, 24 N. E. 753.

But in Wagner v. Missouri P. R. Co. 97 Mo. 512, 3 L.R.A. 156, 10 S. W. 486, it was held that one allowed to ride on a special freight train, who has no notice of any want of authority on the part of the conductor to grant the permission, whether he pays fare or not, in the absence of collusion between him and the conductor to defraud the company of its fare, becomes a passenger, and as such is entitled to have the train on which he travels managed with the care that is due from a common carrier to passengers on a train of that character. To the same effect is Everett v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. 9 Utah, 340, 34 Pac. 289.

And it has been held that it is within the authority of the conductor of a freight train, having entire charge thereof, notwithstanding he is forbidden to carry passengers thereon, to permit a person to ride on such train, even without the payment of fare, and that the company will be liable for injuries resulting to such a person from lack of ordinary care on the part of its employees. Whitehead v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 99 Mo. 263, 6 L.R.A. 409, 11 S. W. 751.

—by permission of brakeman.

A brakeman of a freight train has no implied authority to bind the company by contracts of passage, so as to render the railroad company liable as a carrier of passengers. Candiff v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 477, 7 So. 601.

Accordingly, it has been held that a person riding on a freight train under an agreement with the brakeman to render assistance in the loading and unloading freight is a trespasser, since the brakeman was not acting within the scope of his authority, and the agreement was for a consideration personal to the brakeman, to induce him to violate his duty. O'Donnell v. Kansas City, St. L. & C. R. Co. 197 Mo. 110, 114 Am. St. Rep. 753, 95 S. W. 196.

So, the railroad company is not liable not relate to collateral matters, nor be outside of the line of the duty assigned him. Thus, he may, where other provision has not been made, employ mechanics to repair a break of the cars or machinery which must be repaired before the train can proceed to its destination, and may engage men and teams to render the roadway or bridges secure for the passage of his train, when weakened or partially swept away by unforeseen causes; but in such cases the authority to contract does not exist, unless there is necessity for immediate action. It is the necessity which confers authority, not simply the position of conductor." Ibid.

In the case of Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 382, 15 Am. Rep. 513, for an injury to a boy while attempting to comply with the order of the brakeman to perform certain services in consideration of the privilege of riding upon the train, where the conductor had exclusive control of the train and the persons upon it, since the control assumed by the brakeman and his directions were not within the scope of his employment. Sherman v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 72 Mo. 62, 37 Am. Rep. 423.

And so, a boy who goes upon the caboose of a freight train scheduled to carry passengers at the direction of the brakeman, under an agreement with him that he could ride in consideration of helping to unload freight from the train, is a trespasser, although he was ignorant of the manner of operating and managing railroad trains; and the conductor may lawfully expel such boy from the train. Folley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 16 Okla. 32, 84 Pac. 1090.

But the railroad company is liable for injuries due to the act of the conductor, inducing such a person to alight while the train was moving rapidly, by threats of violence, since such conduct under the circumstances constitutes wanton and wilful carelessness. Ibid.

In Galaviz v. International & G. N. R. Co. 15 Tex. Civ. App. 61, 38 S. W. 234, it was held that the railroad company was not liable to a trespasser for injuries sustained by being expelled from a moving freight train upon which he was riding in violation of the rules of the company, though by the permission of the brakeman, who afterwards compelled him to get off, in the absence of a showing that the brakeman was acting within the apparent scope of his authority, which was necessary to render the company liable for his wrongful conduct.

In Brevig v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 64 Minn. 168, 66 N. W. 401, it was held that while a freight train brakeman has implied authority to eject trespassers from a freight train, yet, where a person bribed such a brakeman to permit him to ride in a freight car, the brakeman and such person thereby became joint trespassers, and the brakeman's implied authority to represent it is said: "There is nothing in the business of a conductor which could lead to the conclusion that he had authority to make contracts with persons to act as brakemen. His apparent duties are to carry forward a train after it is organized. The business of organizing it is in its nature wholly distinct. It is, in fact, committed to a 'train despatcher.'" In Cooper v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 136 Ind. 366, 36 N. E. 272, the court said: "While the conductor and brakeman were in charge of the train, it does not appear that they had any authority to employ assistance in its management. No emergency is shown for the employment of appellant. . . . No custom, rule, or regulation of the appellee company is shown by which appellant might his employer in ejecting such person thereby ceased, so that, unless it appeared that the brakeman had received subsequent express authority to eject such person, his act of doing so in an improper manner was simply the assault of one joint trespasser upon another, for which the railroad company was not liable.

One riding upon a freight train with knowledge that he is violating the rules of the company, and without the knowledge or consent of the conductor, but under an unauthorized and collusive arrangement with the brakeman, to whom he paid about one third of the regular fare, is a trespasser, to whom the railroad company owes no duty except to abstain from wanton or wilful injury. Sands v. Southern R. Co. 108 Tenn. 1, 64 S. W. 478.

So, one riding upon a flat car of a freight train without the knowledge of the conductor, but under the direction of the brakeman, who received and appropriated his fare, is not a passenger, since it cannot be presumed that the brakeman had authority to make a contract of carriage, or that a traveler could acquire the rights of a passenger by riding on such an unusual car. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Huff, 98 Tex. 110, 81 S. W. 525, reversing —Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 249.

Nor can the inference arise that the brakeman had authority to contract to carry passengers merely because the railroad company had knowledge of such conduct, as the company may have been exerting all reasonable means to enforce the rules while the practice was being carried on, which was all that could be required. Ibid.

No liability is incurred by a railroad company for injury sustained by one by being thrown from a portion of a freight train by a sudden movement of the cars while being switched in the yards, although he boarded the train at the invitation of a switch brakeman, who signaled the engineer to start as plaintiff attempted to get on, since he was neither a passenger nor licensee, but a trespasser, as the brakeman had no authority to bind the company by any agreement to carry plaintiff, and where, although pay his way by working on the train, assisting the brakeman or other employee. . . . At most, the appellant was upon the train by the sufferance of the conductor and brakeman, who were themselves without authority to so receive him. Any dangers to which he thus became exposed were wholly at his own risk. The company could become liable only for wilful injury to him." As bearing upon the question and recognizing this principle, we also cite the following: Church v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 50 Minn. 218, 16 L.R.A. 861, 52 N. W. 647; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ginley, 100 Tenn. 472, 45 S. W. 348; Everhart v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 78 Ind. 292, 41 Am. Rep. 567; Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 84 Ga. 320, 20 Am. St. Rep.

the brakeman may have discovered plaintiff's peril when he fell or after the train had started, he was without power to stop the train to prevent the injury. Skirvin v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1208, 100 S. W. 308.

—by permission of engineer, fireman, or other employee.

In Burke v. Ellis, 105 Tenn. 702, 58 S. W. 855, it was held negligence per se for the servants in charge of a train to permit a child seven years of age to climb on and ride upon an open car loaded with loose earth, so as to render the railroad company liable for injuries sustained by it by being thrown off by the sliding of the earth when the train was in motion.

There was proof in the above case tending to show that the child was not only permitted, but invited, to ride by the railroad employees, and with the knowledge of the superintendent.

And in Ecliff v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 64 Mich. 196, 31 N. W. 180, it was held that a boy twelve years of age riding on a freight train with the knowledge or implied invitation of the employees cannot be treated as a trespasser, so as to preclude him from recovering for injuries sustained by a collision due to the negligence of the railroad company, if he was free from contributory negligence.

But in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Casey, 9 Ill. App. 632, it was held that a railroad company is not liable for the death of a boy thirteen years of age, which was caused by being struck by a platform while he was hanging on the side of a moving freight car which he had boarded by permission of the engineer, though it was alleged that the platform was improperly constructed and in dangerous proximity to the railroad track, and that the railroad company was negligent in giving the boy permission to board the moving freight train, on the ground that the giving of such permission by the engineer was an act not within the actual or apparent scope of his authority, for which his employer could be held liable. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This principle was recognized and applied by this court in the case of Hot Springs R. Co. v. Dial, 58 Ark. 318, 24 S. W. 500. The court held (quoting syllabus): "Where a boy fifteen years of age, at the request of the conductor of a freight train, undertakes to throw off the brake on a car, and is injured by striking his head on an iron bridge, he cannot recover from the railroad company on account of its negligence in failing to warn him of the danger, if the conductor had no express or apparent authority to employ him, and there was no exigency which called for the exercise of implied authority."

And so, in Snyder v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 413, it was held that a railroad company is not liable for injuries received by a child while attempting to get on the cars in consequence of an invitation extended to him by the servants in charge of the car, where it does not appear that they were engaged in carrying passengers, or had any authority to permit persons to ride on the cars, with or without compensation, or that the invitation or permission was in furtherance of the interests of the railroad company.

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Thornton, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 778, 58 S. W. 796, it was held that a railroad company owed no duty to a boy seventeen years of age who was riding on a freight train at the invitation of the fireman, and without paying fare, to stop the train to permit him to get off, or to prevent him from jumping from the moving train after the agents in charge knew or had reasonable grounds to believe he was about to jump while the train was in motion, since, when he boarded the train and rode without paying fare, he accepted the advantage with the disadvantage that he would ride to the next regular stop.

And it has been held that the railroad company is not liable for the death of a person entirely unfamiliar with trains and railroads, which was caused by attempting to alight from a rapidly moving freight train, at the suggestion of an employee, because of the failure to stop the train, although he was assured by the employees who permitted him to ride as a matter of accommodation that the train would stop at that point, and the conductor had been informed of his presence and purpose of boarding the train. Peak v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2157, 66 S. W. 995.

Likewise one riding on a freight train upon the invitation of an employee not connected in anyway with the running of the train is not a passenger, so as to render the railroad company liable for injuries caused by negligent operation of the train. Thompson v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 160 Ala. 590, 49 So. 340.

And one riding on a train devoted exclu-

It is not claimed that there was any sudden or unexpected emergency which made it necessary, for the proper operation or safety of the train, for the conductor to employ the plaintiff. There is no evidence that the injury was wanton or wilful.

Applying the general principles above announced to the facts of this case as testified to by the plaintiff himself, and upon which he bases his right of recovery, it is apparent that he is neither a passenger nor employee. He bases his right to recover wholly upon the contract made with the conductor. He testified that he was performing the services usually performed by brakemen while making the trip. He could not be engaged in the immediate and direct duties of a servant, and at the same time be considered a passenger. He was not an employee because the conductor had no authority, express or implied, to make the contract of employment. He was a mere volunteer, and as such assumed the sively to the transportation of lumber without invitation of an authorized agent, and without paying fare, is a trespasser, to whom the railroad company is not liable for an injury sustained by a collision between two trains due to negligent operation. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Meacham, 91 Tenn. 428, 19 S. W. 232.

So, one riding on a logging train by invitation of those in charge assumes the risk. Johnson v. Louisiana R. & Nav. Co. — La. —, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 887, 56 So. 301.

And a person riding on a stone car without paying fare is not a passenger, to whom the carrier is liable for injuries received by derailment. Menaugh v. Bedford Belt R. Co. 157 Ind. 20, 60 N. E. 694.

Riding upon locomotive.

The presumption is that one riding on a locomotive engine is not rightfully there, whether he paid fare or not. Robertson v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 91.

A person riding on the locomotive of a freight train without the conductor's knowledge or consent, by agreement with the fireman to shovel coal for the privilege of riding, is not a passenger, and the railroad company is not liable for his death caused by jumping from the train while moving at a dangerous speed, at the suggestion of the fireman of the danger of arrest, should he be found upon the train when it was stopped, where it did not appear that he was told to get off at the place he jumped, but was only told to get off before the train stopped. Woolsey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 39 Neb. 798, 25 L.R.A. 79, 58 N. W. 444.

But in Harris v. Southern R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 559, 76 S. W. 151, it was held that the railroad company was liable to a boy for an injury sustained by jumping from a moving locomotive at the direction of the engineer or fireman, where he boarded the engine at their direction or invitation to shovel coal for their convenience while they were switching and making up the train, unless at the time he attempted to alight the speed of the train made the danger to him so imminent and obvious that an ordinarily prudent person of his age and discretion would not have incurred the risk.

Neither the conductor nor the engineer of a train, nor the master mechanic of a railroad, has the implied authority to invite a person to ride in the cab of a locomotive without paying fare. Clark v. Colorado & N. W. R. Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 988, 91 C. C. A. 358, 165 Fed. 408.

Accordingly, one who, without paying fare, voluntarily attempts to ride in the cab of a locomotive at the invitation of those in charge of the train, assumes the known hazards incident to such exposed position, and cannot hold the railroad company liable for injuries caused by the collision of the cab with a car negligently left on a side track so as not to clear the main track, where the negligence was not wanton, and no injury occurred to anyone else on the train. Ibid.

One who induced the engineer to permit him to ride upon the engine of a passenger train without knowledge of the conductor or paying fare, after being advised that it was against the rules of the railroad company, is a wrongdoer, and cannot recover damages for injuries sustained by negligent operation. Robertson v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 91.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries caused by the derailment of a switch engine, to one riding upon it by the invitation of a brakeman, while engaged in switching cars, since he was not acting within the scope of his employment, nor authorized to invite or receive persons on the engine. Stringer v. Missouri P. R. Co. 96 Mo. 299, 9 S. W. 905.

One riding on the engine attached to a passenger train, by the invitation of the engineer and with the knowledge of, and without the objection of, the conductor, is not a passenger, since the mere silent acquiescence of the conductor in his riding on the engine does not make the person a passenger, or charge the carrier with that high degree of care toward him which it owes to one whom it has accepted and agreed to transport as a passenger. Radley v. Columbia R. Co. 44 Or. 332, 75 Pac. 212, 1 Ann. Cas. 447.

And the rule that a passenger does not lose his status as such by assuming a dangerous position on the train, assigned to him by the direction or consent of the employees in charge thereof, does not apply to such a case, since by voluntarily boarding the engine in the first instance, a place obviously not designed for the carriage of passengers, such person never became a passenger. Ibid.

risks of the situation in which he placed himself.

There was an attempt made to prove by the cross-examination of the conductor the existence of a custom whereby persons were permitted to ride upon local freight trains in consideration of services performed by them in loading and unloading freight. The conductor says this applied to colored men only. But in order to make the company liable, there must be proof not only of the custom, but that it was actually known by the officials who conducted the affairs of the railway company, or that it was so general and of such long continuance that it must be fairly inferred that it was known and assented to by them. Houston, C. A. & N. R. Co. v. Bolling, 59 Ark. 395, 27 L.R.A. 190, 43 Am. St. Rep. 38, 27 S. W. 492. It might be inferred from the evidence of the conductor in this case that he allowed plaintiff to ride without collecting his fare; that he, the conductor, intended later to collect it, but

So the fact that one intending to become a passenger came to the station late, and was told by the engineer that the train was about to start, and to get on the engine, does not make the relation between the railroad company and such person that of carrier and passenger, where the train was in charge of the conductor, and the engineer had no authority to direct persons to ride at any particular place. Ibid.

So, in the following cases it has been held that one riding upon the engine by the invitation of the engineer, and without paying fare, is a trespasser, to whom the railroad owes the duty to refrain from wanton or wilful injury, and to use ordinary care after discovering his danger: Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Michie, 83 Ill. 427; Barkley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 37 Ill. App. 293; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Cooper, 88 Tex. 607, 32 S. W. 517; Claiborne v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 21 Tex. Civ. App. 648, 53 S. W. 837, 57 S. W. 336; Nightingale v. Union Colliery Co. 9 B. C. 453, affirmed in 35 Can. S. C. 65.

And in the following cases the same rule has been announced where the person was riding upon the engine by the permission of the conductor: Morris v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 131 Ga. 475, 62 S. E. 579; Files v. Boston & A. R. Co. 149 Mass. 204, 14 Am. St. Rep. 411, 21 N. E. 311; Wilcox v. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 487, 33 S. W. 379; Virginia Midland R. Co. v. Roach, 83 Va. 375, 5 S. E. 175.

Riding on work train.

The presumption is that one not an employee riding on a work or material train is wrongfully there; and if he is there by the permission of the servants in charge of the train, the presumption is against their authority to invite or permit persons to ride on such trains. Burns v. Southern R. Co. 63 S. C. 46, 40 S. E. 1018; Purple v. Union P. R. Co. 57 L.R.A. 700, 51 C. C. A. 564, 114 Fed. 123.

Accordingly, a boy not an employee, who is riding on a work or material train by the permission of the conductor and engineer, is a trespasser, and the only duty owed to him by the railroad company is not wantonly or wilfully to injure him. Burns v. Southern R. Co. 63 S. C. 46, 40 S. E. 1018.

the negligence of its employees in operating one of its trains, which caused the death of one riding in the caboose of its work train by permission of the employees in charge of the train, where deceased knew it was in violation of the rules of the company, and there was nothing to show that the rule had been abrogated, that the company knew that its employees had been in the habit of carrying the deceased, or that deceased was rightfully on the train. Pennsylvania Co. v. Coyer, 163 Ind. 631, 72 N. E. 875.

And a person riding for his own convenience and comfort, by the acquiescence of the superintendent on a car, which he knew was for the use of employees of the railroad only, was at most a mere licensee, and assumed all risk of carriage, except such as might result from wanton or intentional wrong. McCauley v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. 93 Ala. 356, 9 So. 611.

But where it is customary to carry passengers on construction or work trains, persons who have no knowledge of the rules of the company to the contrary have a right to assume that permission granted by the conductor to ride on such trains is within the scope of his authority as manager of the train. St. Joseph & W. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 35 Kan. 185, 10 Pac. 461; Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Frazer, 55 Kan. 582, 40 Pac. 923.

Accordingly, it has been held that a railroad company is liable for the death of a boy in consequence of a collision caused by the negligence of its employees while he was riding in the caboose attached to a work or construction train, by the permission of the conductor, and without paying fare, where he had no knowledge of the company's instructions to the conductor not to carry passengers upon the construction train, and it appeared that passengers were frequently carried on that and other construction trains. St. Joseph & W. R. Co. v. Wheeler, supra.

Riding on hand car.

The presumption is that one riding on a hand car is not legally a passenger. Willis v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 120 N. C. 508, 26 S. E. 784.

The permission of a section master, whose duty was to keep the road and bridges in repair, to allow one to ride gratuitously upon a hand car in his control, but which was used exclusively to carry workmen and tools that he overlooked it, or neglected to collect it, owing to his mind being occupied with other duties. But whatever would be the rights of a person riding gratuitously in a coach provided for passengers, by permission of the conductor, without any evidence of his right to do so, such as a pass, that question has passed out of the case; for plaintiff was not injured while on the train, but according to his own testimony, he had left the train and was injured while attempting to re-enter it and be carried according to the terms of the contract which we have held the conductor had no authority, either express or implied, to make.

It follows that the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant as requested by it, and for the error in not doing so, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause will be dismissed.

Kirby, J., dissents.

to and from work, does not thereby establish the relation of passenger and carrier between such person and the railroad company, so as to render the company liable for injuries sustained by a collision with a train, due to negligent operation, since the section master had general authority only as was incidental to the business in which he was engaged, and notice of his limited authority will be implied from the division of the business of the railroad company by operating separate trains for the carriage of passengers, freight, and workmen. Ibid.

To the same effect are International & G. N. R. Co. v. Cock, 68 Tex. 713, 2 Am. St. Rep. 521, 5 S. W. 635; Rathbone v. Oregon R. Co. 40 Or. 225, 66 Pac. 909; Hoar v. Maine C. R. Co. 70 Me. 65, 35 Am. Rep. 299.

And a railroad company is not liable for an injury to a child riding on a hand car on invitation of its employees, contrary to the rules, and not in accordance with any custom acquiesced in by the officers, of the company. Houston, C. A. & N. R. Co. v. Bolling, 69 Ark. 395, 27 L.R.A. 190, 43 Am. St. Rep. 38, 27 S. W. 492; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Robinson, 95 Ark. 39, 128 S. W. 60; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Duer, 21 Ohio C. C. 512, 11 Ohio C. D. 761; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dawkins, 77 Tex. 228, 13 S. W. 982.

But in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Rodgers, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 35 S. W. 412, it was held that a railroad company is liable for injuries to a boy, due to the negligent operation of a hand car upon which he was riding by the invitation of the employees in charge, though in violation of the rules of the company, upon the ground that the servants did not fulfill the master's duty to the public to avoid injury to children when operating dangerous machinery of such a character as may reasonably be supposed to allure them into danger, and that it cannot discharge such duty or avoid the consequences of its breach by the adoption of rules and regulations. The court said that the question in such a case was not whether the servant, in inviting the child unto dangerous machinery, was acting in the scope of his employment, but was whether the master, through him, discharged his duty.

And in the following cases the railroad company has been held liable for an injury to a child while riding on a hand car in violation of the rules of the company, but upon the invitation of those in charge: Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Rodgers, 89 Tex. 675, 36 S. W. 243, — Tex. Civ. App. —; Davidson v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 41 W. Va. 407, 23 S. E. 593.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Rodgers, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 39 S. W. 383, it was held that the railroad company was liable for injuries to a boy twelve years of age who was riding on a hand car at the suggestion of the employees in charge, in violation of the rules of the company, where the boy was without mental capacity to understand the danger of riding on such a car, whether the employees knew of the incapacity or not.

But it was said that if the jury should find that the boy was possessed of such intelligence that he ought to have appreciated the danger of his position on the car, then he could not recover for injuries sustained while riding on the car, no matter whether the employees had authority or not to invite him upon the car. Ibid.

In Dougherty v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 137 Iowa, 257, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 590, 126 Am. St. Rep. 282, 114 N. W. 902, it was held, however, that a railroad company is not liable for the unauthorized act of its section foreman and other employees in permitting a seven-year-old boy to ride with them in a dangerous position on a hand car from which he is negligently allowed to fall and get hurt; that the rule rendering a master liable for the acts of his servant in the use of a dangerous agency of which he is placed in charge does not apply to render him liable for injury to a boy invited by the servant to ride upon a hand car, which is due, not to the dangerous character of the car, but to the personal negligence of those in charge of it.

The railroad company is liable for injuries caused by the negligence of its employees to one traveling upon a hand car by the invitation of the agent in charge, and without paying fare, where it appears that hand cars were sometimes used by the railroad company for the transportation of passengers, and there were no regulations prohibiting traveling upon them, and there is nothing to show that the agent was not authorized to give the railroad company's consent thereto. Prince v. International & G. N. R. Co. 64 Tex. 144.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIRST CIRCUIT.

PAULINE A. SMITH, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BOSTON ELEVATED RAILWAY COMPANY.

(106 C. C. A. 497, 184 Fed. 387.)

Evidence — sufficient to support judgment — change of plaintiff's testimony.

A judgment in favor of plaintiff cannot, in the absence of any explanation of the inconsistency, be based on evidence given by him which is materially inconsistent with his testimony on a former trial, upon a matter within his personal knowledge, and which supplies a weakness in the case as first made.

Note. — Effect of party's changing testimony on second trial, to supply defects in the case made on the first trial.

In Edall v. New England R. Co. 40 App. Div. 617, 57 N. Y. Supp. 914, it was held that a verdict for a plaintiff was against the weight of the evidence where plaintiff's testimony on the second trial was directly contradictory of his testimony on the previous trial, and also was directly contradicted by evidence for the defendant, and there was no satisfactory explanation of such contradiction. In this case, which was an action for personal injuries resulting while coupling cars, the plaintiff had testified at the first trial that the drawheads of the cars came together. Upon review the court said that there was no cause to complain, because the cars had acted exactly as they would be expected to act, and a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed. On the second trial plaintiff testified that one drawhead passed under the drawhead on the other car, so that the bumpers came together unexpectedly and caused the injury. Judgment was reversed and new trial ordered.

In McCarty v. Interurban Street R. Co. 47 Misc. 345, 93 N. Y. Supp. 548, a judgment for the plaintiff had been reversed for the reason that there was no evidence that the plaintiff had given any signal to the conductor, or that the conductor knew or had reason to know that the plaintiff intended to alight; and for the reason that the plaintiff had wholly failed to show notice to the conductor either in the particular manner alleged in the complaint or in any other manner; on the second trial the plaintiff testified that the conductor was apprised of her desire to alight, and that he informed her upon attempting to alight at another street that that was not the street she desired. In speaking of this evidence the court says that it was apparently given with the sole desire to fit the facts to suit the case regardless of truth or consistency, and fur-

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Colt and Putnam, Circuit Judges, and Brown, District Judge.

Mr. Julian C. Woodman for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. M. F. Dickinson and Walter Bates Farr for defendant in error.

Brown, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error brought after the direction of a verdict for the defendant on the second jury trial of an action of tort for personal injuries.

ther that no satisfactory explanation of the omission to bring out the important proof necessary for the maintenance of the plaintiff's case on the first trial, and of her reawakened recollection, was made, nor were any reasons consistent with a desire to state fairly the facts with reference to other changes in testimony given. A judgment for the plaintiff was reversed and a new trial ordered.

So, in Adams v. New York City R. Co. 125 App. Div. 551, 109 N. Y. Supp. 1019, a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed and a new trial ordered, where on the first trial the judgment had been reversed on account of the failure of proof that the car gave a sudden or violent jerk or lurch forward, sufficient to throw the plaintiff to the ground while he himself was exercising due care, and on this question the location of the car at the time of the accident, as testified to by the plaintiff, was regarded as important, and on the second trial the plaintiff placed the location of the accident at a different place, so as to obviate the above weakness. Another witness also changed his testimony, and the court seems to make no distinction, saying that credibility of the witnesses in the first instance is for the jury, but that testimony upon a vital point in a case materially changed to obviate objections pointed out by the court on a former appeal, unless a sufficient and legitimate explanation is given, is discredited testimony.

In Fisher v. Central Vermont R. Co. 118 App. Div. 446, 103 N. Y. Supp. 513, a judgment for the plaintiff had been reversed on the ground of contributory negligence, at the second trial the plaintiff changed the facts on which the court had based its finding of contributory negligence so as to show that he had not been negligent; there was no satisfactory explanation of this change, and no corroboration. The court says that these two conflicting statements should be clearly placed in juxtaposition before the minds of the jury and their attention should pointedly be called to their apparent contradic-

A verdict for the plaintiff at the first trial was set aside for reasons set forth in our opinion of March 16, 1909. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 890, 94 C. C. A. 84, 168 Fed. 628. At the second trial, though the plaintiff made changes in her testimony, a verdict was directed for the defendant.

At the first trial it appeared that the plaintiff fell while entering the defendant's car. At the argument before us on the former writ of error, it was contended that the testimony showed negligence of the defendant in two particulars: That the car was started with unusual violence, and that the conductor was guilty of negligence in starting the car too soon.

The charge of negligence in starting the car too soon was based upon the contention that the plaintiff "was just in that unstable equilibrium which would make a start very dangerous for a woman in her situation, and that the conductor knew it or recklessly took the chances."

Upon the hearing of the present writ of error, it was contended in her behalf: "She was holding her umbrella and small hand bag and skirt in her left hand, and had a good hold on the side of the framework of the doorway with her right hand, and was leaning hard against it with her shoulder."

While the present record hardly justifies this version of the plaintiff's testimony, it does contain testimony of the plaintiff to the effect that her right hand and right shoulder were braced against the facing of the door.

Having found in our previous opinion that, under the authorities cited, the car was not started prematurely though the plaintiff was not braced against the door, it follows that the changed testimony to the effect that she was braced can have no effect to modify our opinion as to the insufficiency of the testimony to show negligence in giving the starting signal too soon. As the present testimony upon this point is less favorable to the plaintiff than her previous testimony, our former opinion is conclusive upon this question.

As to the charge that the car was started with unusual violence, the changed tion and to the circumstances under which they were respectively given, and in such a manner that the question thus presented is not minimized or obscured by other questions in the case, so that the verdict of the jury, if in plaintiff's favor, may clearly and beyond peradventure carry with it the expression of their belief that the latest statement of the plaintiff is the true one, notwithstanding the apparent probabilities to the contrary. Judgment for the plaintiff was reversed and a new trial ordered.

So, in Scherl v. Flam, 133 App. Div. 274, 117 N. Y. Supp. 654, it is stated that a party who has recovered judgment on a written contract, which has been reversed because the contract is void, should not be suffered to succeed on a new trial by swearing to an oral agreement differing from the written agreement in a respect essential to meet the decision on appeal. The judgment in favor of the plaintiff in this case, however, seems to have been reversed on other grounds, and the question annotated was not raised in a subsequent appeal of the same case in 136 App. Div. 753, 121 N. Y. Supp. 522.

In Hamilton v. Frothingham, 71 Mich. 619, 40 N. W. 15, it was held that a real estate agent who has sought a recovery on a contract by which he was to have all over a certain amount for the sale of property cannot, after the reviewing court has indicated a doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain such a contract, under the same bill of particulars, claim under a contract to pay a certain stated sum.

But in Pacific Coast Biscuit Co. v. Dugger, 42 Or. 513, 70 Pac. 523, it was held that the fact that a party on the second trial testified materially different from his testimony on the first trial only affected the credibility, and that it was for 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the jury to say as to the truth of the statements, and a judgment for the defendant was affirmed. In this action, which was against an alleged principal for goods purchased by her alleged agent, the principal testified that the agency was limited and did not warrant the purchase in question. On the appeal the appellate court held that the agency in question was general and the purchase within the scope of the apparent authority. On the new trial the alleged principal testified that the transaction was a mortgage. On this point the court says that testimony given by a witness varying from that given theretofore, at the retrial of a cause, is not equivalent to assuming inconsistent positions, though such testimony should contradict that previously given, for the former, while not true, may have been based upon a mistake of fact, which the witness on the second trial ought to have been permitted to correct.

The facts in Chance v. Southern R. Co. — Ga. App. —, 73 S. E. 1076, do not clearly appear. The action was one for damages against a railroad company for scaring the plaintiff's mule and causing it to run away, thereby injuring the plaintiff. The plaintiff's testimony on the first trial showed nothing that was not usual and necessary in the management of the locomotive, and for this reason a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed (7 Ga. App. 650, 67 S. E. 836). On the second appeal a nonsuit was held improper as the evidence on the new trial was substantially different, and was such that the jury might find that the noise made by the engine was both unusual and unnecessary. Nothing is said in the case as to the testimony being that of the plaintiff on the second trial, or that it was given to bolster up his case.

testimony is apparently directed to meet that part of our former opinion which said that her position was such that any ordinary jerk of the car in starting would be likely to throw her down, and that the plaintiff's testimony as to the manner in which she fell was consistent with the ordinary jerk of the car in starting, and inconsistent with any sudden or violent jerk.

It is now urged that, although the plaintiff was holding on to the side of the framework of the door, and bracing herself against it with her shoulder, the start was so violent as to throw her down. The following Massachusetts cases are cited: Nolan v. Newton Street R. Co. Banker & Tradesman (1910) 206 Mass. 384, 92 N. E. 505; Lacour v. Springfield Street R. Co. 200 Mass. 34, 85 N. E. 868; Black v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 206 Mass. 80, 91 N. E. 891; Cutts v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 202 Mass. 450, 89 N. E. 21.

In the former trial the plaintiff's whole testimony, as well as the argument of counsel thereon, shows that she was not braced. Her former statement, "I tried to reach forward to catch the door or something to hold myself, but I couldn't," is directly inconsistent with the statement that "I held on to the side of the door and leaned against it, and I leaned hard against it with my shoulder."

Upon a consideration of her testimony in the two trials, it is apparent that there is a complete departure from the original claim that the plaintiff was in such unstable equilibrium that it was negligent to give a starting signal, to the present claim that she was so well braced and had such a good hold that only a violent jerk of the car of an unusual character could have caused her to fall.

We have before us two inconsistent versions given by the plaintiff of the same occurrence.

As the inconsistency is in the testimony of a party, a stricter rule is applicable than where the inconsistency is in the testimony of an ordinary witness. Previous inconsistent statements of a witness other than a party ordinarily go merely to the credit of the witness, and upon a second trial it may be left to a jury to decide which of the inconsistent statements is to be credited. The sworn testimony of a party, who has control of his case, with power to bind himself conclusively by pleadings, stipulations, or admissions, as to facts resting upon his own knowledge, is of such solemn character that, in the absence of a clear showing of mistake, inadvertency, or oversight, it should ordinarily be regarded as precluding him from seeking to establish before another jury an inconsistent state of facts. While it is true that upon a second trial the plaintiff's case may be changed or strengthened by new testimony, yet the right of a plaintiff at a second trial, to make by his own testimony a complete departure from the case presented at the first trial, is not unlimited.

A plaintiff, we think, after having sworn to facts resting in his own observation and knowledge before one jury, should not be permitted to swear to facts directly inconsistent, and to obtain from a second jury a verdict in his favor which will involve the conclusion that his testimony at the first trial was knowingly false. A party testifying under oath is more than a mere witness. He is an actor seeking the intervention of the judicial power in his behalf, and thus subject to the rule allegans contraria non est audiendus, which, as stated in Broom's Legal Maxims, p. 130, "expresses in technical language the trite saying of Lord Kenyon that a man should not be permitted to 'blow hot and cold' with reference to the same transaction, or insist at different times, on the truth of each of two conflicting allegations according to the promptings of his private interest." This principle is illustrated in Harriman v. Northern Securities Co. 197 U. S. 244-294, 49 L. ed. 739-763, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Davis v. Wakelee, 156 U. S. 680, 689, et seq. 39 L. ed. 578, 584, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555; Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312-334, 37 L. ed. 1093-1102, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 99; National S. S. Co. v. Tugman, 143 U. S. 28-32, 36 L. ed. 63, 64, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 361; Pope v. Allis, 115 U. S. 370, 29 L. ed. 393, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 69; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 267, 24 L. ed. 695.

In the present case, the plaintiff, upon the former writ of error, had a full hearing upon the question of her legal rights upon the state of facts upon which she rested, before a jury and before this court. If, after an adverse decision of this court, she is at liberty to change her own testimony at will, then there is no practical limit to litigation. In Hamilton v. Frothingham, 71 Mich. 616, 40 N. W. 15, it was said: "The plaintiff cannot be permitted to take a position now wholly inconsistent with that taken on the former trials. The contract now claimed under is wholly inconsistent with that claimed upon the former trials. If this contract was made, then the one upon which the former recovery was had did not exist, and no recovery could have been had thereunder. If the contract was to pay all over $8,000, then an express contract to pay a certain and specific sum did not exist."

"If such inconsistent positions were allowed to be taken in courts of justice, there would be no end to litigation. Parties finding that contracts upon which they have relied for recovery cannot be upheld in the courts are not permitted under the same pleadings and bills of particulars to retry their case upon an entirely different contract, and one entirely contradictory to the one first claimed under, even for the purpose of meeting the opinion of this court, and squaring their case with it."

As the plaintiff was not corroborated, and as she was discredited by her former inconsistent testimony, we are of the opinion that, in the absence of any substantial explanation of this inconsistency, the trial judge was justified in concluding that, if the plaintiff should have a verdict, it would be his duty to set it aside, and therefore in directing a verdict for the defendant.

We have considered, of course, whether the testimony at the two trials is reconcilable upon the view that the changes were merely in supplying details inadvertently omitted upon the first trial, but are unable to avoid the conclusion that the statements are directly inconsistent and cannot be reconciled.

Recognizing the rule that upon a new trial a party should be afforded a large and liberal opportunity for supplying omissions and for explanations, this does not avail the plaintiff in error, since the most liberal application of this rule cannot justify the present substitution of a new and inconsistent case by the uncorroborated testimony of a party.

Upon the whole it seems apparent that at the second trial the plaintiff's testimony was directed to meeting the statement in our former opinion that the plaintiff was in such a position "that any ordinary jerk of the car in starting would be likely to throw her down, unless she braced herself in some way against the side of the door," by showing that she did this by bracing her shoulder heavily against the door, and also by showing that she had a good hold with her hand, thus bringing herself within those cases above cited, in which it was held that the fact that a good hand-hold was broken is evidence of a violent and negligent starting of the car.

The plaintiff also assigns error in the exclusion of expert testimony, but, as each of the questions excluded was predicated upon the plaintiff's changed testimony, and upon an assumption that the plaintiff was braced or leaning against the frame of the door when the car started, we need not consider them, since our finding that the plaintiff is precluded from asserting these 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) facts cuts under all questions which assume the existence of these facts.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed, and the defendant in error recovers its costs of appeal.

SEATTLE BREWING & MALTING COMPANY, Appt.

(66 Wash. 248, 119 Pac. 739.)

Landlord and tenant — saloon — adoption of prohibition — effect.

A lease of property permitting its use for saloon business in accordance with law is not nullified by the adoption of a statute forbidding further sales of liquor in the locality.

(December 16, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King county in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William A. Greene and George McKay for appellant.

Messrs. Thomas Smith and J. L. Corrigan, for respondents:

Where premises are leased for the purpose of being used for the sale of liquor, and before the expiration of the time fixed in the lease, the sale of liquor is prohibited by law, such prohibition does not relieve the tenant from his obligation to pay rent, in the absence of an agreement contained in the lease itself.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover two months rent, claimed to be due to the plaintiffs from the defendant under a lease to it of a lot and building in Mt. Vernon. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, the defendant has appealed.

The questions here presented arise upon appellant's affirmative defense, the demurrer thereto of the respondents, and the sustaining of that demurrer by the trial court. The affirmative defense thus excluded was, in substance, as follows: The term of the lease is five years, being from November 9, 1907, to November 9, 1912, at an agreed monthly rental of $100. The only provision of the lease relating to the use of the premises by appellant, is the following: "It is further understood and agreed that the said party of the second part may, during the life of this lease, carry on and conduct a retail saloon business in the building now on the north part of said lot four, provided that the conducting of said business is done in conformity with all ordinances of the city of Mt. Vernon, now in force or that may hereafter be enacted, as well as all laws of the state of Washington now in force or that may hereafter be enacted." Under the local option law of 1909, Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 6292-6314, there was submitted to the electors of the city of Mt. Vernon, in November, 1910, the question of whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors should be licensed in that city. Thereupon the electors voted against such licensing, thereby rendering the sale of intoxicating liquors unlawful in that city thereafter. The rent sued for accrued thereafter. Appellant abandoned the premises, and tendered possession thereof to respondents, after the accruing of these rent instalments sued upon.

It is contended that the trial court erred in holding that these facts did not constitute a defense to respondent's claim of rent due under the lease. It is argued that, the purpose for which the premises were leased becoming unlawful upon the result of the local option election being ascertained, the lease contract thereby ceased to be binding upon appellant. It seems to us that this argument is rested upon an erroneous view of the effect of the language of the lease, relating to the use of the premises by appellant. It is apparently assumed by counsel for appellant that the provisions of the lease above quoted restricts the use of the premises to saloon business. We think that provision does not have such an effect. It is only permissive in that respect, and clearly does not prevent appellant from using the premises for any lawful purpose. The decisions of the courts appear to be harmonious in support of the view that, under such circumstances as are disclosed by this defense, the lessee cannot regard the lease as terminated by the changed legal status of the liquor traffic, and thus avoid payment of the rent agreed upon by the terms of the lease. The following appear to be directly in point, involving leases where the use of the premises for saloon purposes was merely permissive, as in this lease. Kerley v. Mayer, 10 Misc. 718, 31 N. Y. Supp. 818, affirmed by the Court of Appeals in 155 N. Y. 636, 49 N. E. 1099; O'Byrne v. Henley, 161 Ala. 620, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 496, 50 So. 83; San Antonio Brewing Asso. v. Brents, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 443, 88 S. W. 368. In the following cases the courts express the view that the lessee would be held liable for the payment of the rent under such circumstances as we have here, even though, by the terms of the lease, the use of the premises be restricted to the saloon business. J. J. Goodrum Tobacco Co. v. Potts-Thompson Liquor Co. 133 Ga. 776, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 498, 66 S. E. 1081; Houston Ice & Brewing Co. v. Keenan, 99 Tex. 79, 88 S. W. 197; Hecht v. Acme Coal Co. — Wyo. —, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 773, 113 Pac. 788. The last-cited case, decided in February, 1911, contains an exhaustive review of the law upon the subject.

Counsel for appellant rely upon Heart v. East Tennessee Brewing Co. 121 Tenn. 69, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 964, 130 Am. St. Rep. 753, 113 S. W. 364. This is the only decision coming to our notice which seems to be not wholly in harmony with those above cited. It is not plain from the language of that decision just what the provisions of the lease were as to the use of the premises by the lessee, but it may be inferred from the language of the court that it regarded the lease as restricting the use of the premises to saloon purposes. If we are correct in this assumption, that decision would not necessarily be out of harmony with an affirmance of this judgment, since we conclude that this lease did not so restrict the use of the premises, but that its provisions in that respect were merely permissive. That decision, however, does not seem to be in accord with the weight of authority upon this subject, even though it may be distinguishable from the case before us. The result reached by this court in Oldfield v. Angeles Brewing & Malting Co. 62 Wash. 260, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 426, 113 Pac. 630, is in harmony with the result reached by the trial court in this case, though this exact question was not there involved. We are of the opinion that the learned trial court was not in error in declining to entertain appellant's affirmative defense.

The judgment is affirmed.

Lorigan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal was ordered here for further consideration after judgment rendered by the district court of appeal for the third appellate district, affirming the judgment of conviction and the order of the trial court denying a motion for a new trial, from both of which the defendant appealed.

Defendant was accused and convicted of the crime of arson, and during his trial a purported confession made by him was admitted in evidence, and the principal point on this appeal is as to the correctness of the ruling of the court in that respect.

The crime of which the defendant was accused was the felonious burning, on February 5, 1908, of the "Summit House Hotel," situated on the road leading from the town of Jackson to the town of Sutter Creek, Amador county. It appears that this property was, for several years and at the date of its destruction, owned by one G. B. Vicini, who, in April, 1905, leased it at a monthly rental of $60, and for a term of six years, to C. Lepori and L. C. Bertin, who then, and at the time of the fire, were engaged in business in San Francisco under the firm style of Bertin & Lepori. These lessees placed this defendant and a man named Faracone in possession of the property, who thereafter conducted it as a hotel and saloon. In July, 1906, defendant executed a chattel mortgage covering all the hotel and kitchen furniture, bar fixtures, etc., in the hotel and saloon, in favor of said Bertin & Lepori, to secure a promissory note for $500 executed by defendant to them. In March, 1907, defendant took out two policies of insurance on the personal property in the hotel for $1,000 each, one of which, however, expired by its terms before the fire. Thereafter defendant sold his interest in the hotel and saloon business to one Rossi, who alone seems to have thereafter conducted it until a few days before the fire, when he abandoned the business, closed the hotel, and left that part of the country. A few days afterward, and while the hotel premises were vacant, they were destroyed by fire. The defendant for several months before the fire had been living in San Francisco, but, a few days before it occurred, had been seen in the vicinity of the Summit House, once in company with Lepori of the firm, heretofore mentioned, lessees of the hotel; another time with one Manzo, a resident of San Francisco; and some eleven months prior to the fire, defendant had endeavored, but unsuccessfully, to prevail on one James Bryant to burn the hotel, offering him $200 to do so.

There was considerable other evidence in the case—conduct on the part of the defendant and circumstantial evidence—relied on by the people to establish the guilt of the defendant, but no positive evidence except his alleged confession directly connecting him with the commission of the crime. We make no further reference to the evidence because our purpose has been to only state such of it as will make intelligible the matters to which the confession of defendant is claimed to have been addressed, and the condition and circumstances under which it was made.

It was not claimed by the people that the defendant himself actually set the hotel on fire. The theory was that the defendant, at the instigation of Lepori, engaged a man named Manzo to go from San Francisco to burn it, and that he actually did so; the motive prompting Lepori being that, by the destruction of the property, the firm of which he was a member would be relieved from further payments on their lease, which still had three years to run and was an unprofitable investment, and the motive of defendant was to secure the insurance money on his personal property situated in the hotel.

Now as to the conditions and circumstances under which the confession of defendant was made:

On February 8, 1908, three days after the hotel was burned down, the defendant, who had left San Francisco for Jackson, Amador county, was arrested by the sheriff of that county at Martell, a railroad station a short distance from Jackson, and taken to the county jail. The next evening, Sunday, February 9th, he was brought from the county jail to the office of the district attorney of the county, where were present the district attorney, the sheriff of the county, a deputy sheriff, the official stenographer of the superior court, and a constable of Amador county, the latter being present at the request of the district attorney, to act as interpreter, the defendant being an Italian, who, though able to speak the English language, did so brokenly. This interview in the district attorney's office lasted, at least two hours and a half, although some of the parties present testified that it lasted nearly five hours. It resulted, after defendant had been interrogated by both the district attorney and the sheriff, in what purported to be a confession of the defendant. The statement made by him was dictated to the stenographic reporter, who transcribed it at once. It was this statement which was admitted in evidence as the confession of defendant, and in which he admitted having taken part in the burning of the building, having, at the instigation and request of Lepori, em-

On the preliminary showing the sheriff, district attorney, and the deputy sheriff testified generally that no promises were held out to defendant, or any threats or intimidation or other improper means used, to procure him to make the confession. As to what took place at the interview the district attorney testified: "I was in that meeting or investigation for a period of about two hours. Both Mr. Gregory and myself asked defendant, Borello, some questions. Of course he willingly made the statement, the whole statement, himself, and then we asked him as to little points and one thing and another that we wanted to find out, and that took up about two hours. . . ." Mr. Willis, the stenographer, who was present during all the interview which culminated in the making of the alleged confession, was not called by the prosecution at the preliminary showing, and his presence as a witness had not been required by it.

On the part of defendant, he himself testified, among other things, that both the sheriff and district attorney told him that it would be better for him if he would tell the truth about the burning of the hotel; also, that if he would do so, both he and his brother Marco (who was then under arrest also accused of burning the hotel) would be allowed to "go free," that the district attorney told him that he did not want to keep him in jail, but that he wanted to get Lepori. He stated further that the sheriff had told him that his brother Marco had made a full statement of the cause and origin of the fire, and that the sheriff stated other facts tending to convey the impression that, in this statement so claimed to have been made, his brother had implicated defendant in the crime, and that, if defendant would not tell the truth and sign a statement, his brother Marco could get fourteen years. Other matters were testified to by defendant and other witnesses on the preliminary showing tending to support the claim of defendant that his confession had not been procured from him freely and voluntarily. All these statements of defendant and the other witnesses in his behalf were specifically denied by the sheriff and district attorney.

The prosecution then offered the confession of the defendant in evidence, to which the defendant objected on the ground that it had not been shown to have been freely and voluntarily made. Before a ruling thereon, the defendant asked for a continuance in order to procure the testimony of Mr. Willis, the stenographer, who was present when the interview between the sheriff, district attorney, and the defendant was had, and the alleged confession was obtained. The court refused the continuance and said: "If you gentlemen want to argue upon the evidence that is in, you can do that, with the understanding that hereafter, if Mr. Willis comes, you can introduce his evidence. If the court should sustain your objection, there will be no necessity for the evidence of Mr. Willis. If the court should overrule your objection and admit the confession, you can have Mr. Willis hereafter in rebuttal on your case, and the court then can get the benefit of his evidence as well as the jury; and if necessary, after such a showing is made, the court can rule at that time, withdraw the confession from the jury, and instruct them not to entertain it. I think that is the only way out of it."

After argument, the court, over the objection of defendant, admitted the confession in evidence, which confession consisted of but three pages of the record, and amounted only to a declaration by defendant, as heretofore stated, that Lepori had engaged him to employ a man, to be paid by Lepori, to burn up the hotel, and that defendant employed such a man and the hotel was burned.

At a subsequent session of the court, the defendant, in the meantime, having procured the attendance of Mr. Willis, the official stenographer of the court (not then, however, reporting the trial of defendant), called him as a witness. While the testimony on the preliminary showing on the part of the prosecution was that, in the interview with the defendant on the 9th of February, the defendant made his statement freely and willingly, and that the sheriff and district attorney "then would ask him as to little points and one thing and another that we wanted to find out," the notes taken by the stenographer and from which he testified show very clearly just what took place, and how the interview with or investigation of the defendant was held as far as the notes speak on the subject. What the stenographer took down he had not been requested to do by anyone, but did it of his own volition. He testified that all the public officers heretofore named were present in the office of the district attorney with the defendant, and that the latter was questioned by both the district attorney and the sheriff directly, and also through the medium of an interpreter, and that they were all in the office of the district attorney engaged in that matter from about a quarter to 7 in the evening until half past 10 or 11 o'clock that night. All the conversation which was had between the officers, the interpreter, and the defendant was not taken down by the stenographer: but the greater and more important part of it was, and shall be referred to as the undisputed evidence in the case of what actually took place at the interview, and bearing on the question whether the confession was freely and voluntarily obtained from the defendant or not. Before doing so, it is to be said that, when this appeal was before the district court of appeal for determination, that court, as appears from its opinion, was strongly persuaded that if the confession of defendant had been obtained solely through the declarations of the sheriff, and his conduct and that of the district attorney on the evening of the 9th, as disclosed by the stenographer Willis, such confession would have been shown to have been improperly obtained, and inadmissible in evidence. That court was of the opinion, however, that the declarations of the defendant on the evening of the 9th of February, when the notes were taken and the confession signed by the defendant, were but repetitions of admissions of guilt which he had made to the officers, (the sheriff and district attorney) the night previous (February 8th), and, having voluntarily confessed the crime on the previous evening, the subsequent conduct of the sheriff and the district attorney on the night of February 9th, however threatening or otherwise reprehensible it might have been, could not be said to have anything to do with causing defendant to then admit his guilt, because he had already admitted it on the previous evening. But there is not a particle of evidence in the record that the defendant made any confession of guilt or stated any circumstances of an incriminatory nature on the evening of February 8th or at any other time than during the interview of February 9th. No such claim is made in the brief of respondent. Nowhere in the record is there even a suggestion that he had done anything of the kind excepting as might appear from some declarations of the sheriff and district attorney in questions they asked him on the evening of the 9th, and which imported that the defendant had made them the previous evening. But, in as far as any questions by the sheriff or district attorney stated or implied that defendant had made any incriminatory admissions on the evening previous to February 9th, such statement or assumption was untrue, and was a species of deception employed to embarrass, disconcert, and entrap the defendant, because it affirmatively appears from testimony directed specifically to the fact that the defendant made no admissions of guilt or statements of any incriminatory character at any time previous to the evening of the 9th of February. This is directly shown by the testimony of the sheriff and district attorney themselves, who explicitly state that on the evening of the 8th the defendant would not talk about the burning of the hotel, denied any knowledge about it; the district attorney testifying that, while he asked and the defendant answered some unimportant questions, the important ones which he asked him were not answered by the defendant at all.

Recurring now to the testimony of Willis as to the actual occurrences and the true situation and circumstances under which the alleged confession was obtained: Reasonable limits of an opinion preclude a detailed statement of all that occurred. It appears that on the afternoon of the 9th the district attorney had visited the defendant in jail; that the defendant made no statement to him, but said, "I will see you to-night;" and that it was on account of this statement that defendant was subsequently brought to the district attorney's office, where the various officers of the county heretofore referred to were assembled. If defendant intended by the expression, "I will see you to-night," to convey the impression that he would then make a confession to the officers of any connection with the offense charged, it is quite apparent that he abandoned any such intention before he was brought before them. It does not appear that he was then asked to make, nor did he make, any spontaneous statement of his connection with the burning of the building, but, on the contrary, the sheriff and district attorney at once proceeded to interrogate him respecting the matter, and this investigation on their part continued for a long period of time before he made any confession respecting his connection with the commission of the offense. His general attitude when he was brought in, and which continued during the examination and while he was being subjected to examination by the officers, is stated by the district attorney himself: "He would hem and haw about it. . . . When I say he hemmed and hawed, I mean he would not say anything. He was holding his head down a great deal. One minute he would want to tell and the next minute he did not want to tell. . . . The reason why he wanted to tell, I could not tell you. I would say it was because he was scared, and then he would want to tell and hem and haw about it, and finally came out and told the whole story. . . . Mr. Gregory (the sheriff) and I just kept on asking questions relating to the matter."

But it is these very questions put by the sheriff and district attorney, the continuous and searching examination to which the defendant was put by both of them, in an endeavor to wring out a confession when it was apparent that he was not disposed to make one, and their statements and conduct toward him, which showed that the confession was not freely and voluntarily made, but was the result of threats, intimidation, invective, accompanied with coarse profanity, mental coercion, and false statements used to procure it, the employment of which the law absolutely discountenances and prohibits.

The notes of Willis—the correctness of which are not questioned—show that the sheriff and district attorney, principally the former, in English, and through the medium of the Italian interpreter, interrogated the defendant persistently for upwards of an hour, if not for several hours; that they persisted in making repeated inquiries on the same matters to which the defendant gave them what in their judgment were unsatisfactory replies to such an extent as to elicit from the defendant through the interpreter this declaration to the sheriff, his interrogator: "He says he cannot say anything more than he knows. It looks as if you are not satisfied with what he says." Responded to by the sheriff with, "He says one thing and then he wants to take it back."

During the long inquisitorial ordeal through which he was put by the officers and before he had made any admission of guilt, he was told by the sheriff that he would have to tell all he knew and was accused by both the sheriff and district attorney of not telling the truth in the answers he was giving. The sheriff declared to him that he had absolute proof of his guilt and could convict him before a jury; charged him with another crime in connection with the crime of arson; declared that he could prove he had offered a man money to burn the hotel and could prove that fact whether it was so or not; stated that they had sufficient proof without any confession on his part to convict him; that his brother Marco had made statements in which he implicated the defendant in the burning of the hotel, and if his brother went back on it he would go to the penitentiary for 14 years; they asserted that he had made statements to them the night before of an incriminatory character, when in fact he had made no such statements at all; charged him with repudiating in his answers the statements declared to have been so previously made; and indulged in coarse profanity throughout their examination relative to the statements he was making, and to emphasize their disbelief in their truth.

Supplementing these references to the conduct of the officers during the examination with a few extracts from the notes of Willis: Almost at the beginning of his examination, when the defendant had stated, among other things, that he did not know the name of the man who it was assumed by the officers had actually burned the hotel, the district attorney declared: "Don't you think if I told you those things, then you would ask me what was the man's name, and I would say, 'I don't know,' you would tell me I was a damned liar. That is what you would say. You would tell any reasonable man under the sun; you can't tell any man that has got a damned ounce of sense, and tell them that state of facts, that you don't know a man's name, he would be a God damned fool if he believed you."

Following a large number of interrogatories by both the officers, based on purported statements made the night before by the defendant, which questions however elicited no answer from the defendant inculpating himself, he was further asked why he had said his brother Marco had gone to San Francisco with him, to which he answered, "It don't make any difference."

The district attorney then said:

I understand you now, that you don't want to tell the truth; that is the way I understand you.

A. I am telling the truth.

Q. You don't want to when you say it is none of your business, when your brother go to San Francisco. Suppose my brother and I go to San Francisco, and a man asked me whether I knew. You know damned well I would lie if I said I didn't know.

A. You ask my brother.

Q. Does he tell the truth? You don't. Can't you tell the truth?

A. Yes.

Q. Don't you know whether he went down with you? It is the God damndest proposition I ever heard of.

It also appears from a consideration of the notes of Willis that, after an unremitting, searching, and protracted questioning by the officers in regard to the burning of the hotel had failed to draw any admission from defendant of his connection with it, he was finally asked who had telegraphed to Lepori at San Francisco that the hotel had been burned. Defendant made no answer. Asked if he knew the name of the person who had done so, and, answering in the negative, the sheriff addressed him as follows: "I ain't going to let you go. I won't lie to you. I got too much proof. I am not going to let you go; that is all there is about it. You are going to stand trial as I told you last night, and you don't have to tell me anything if you don't want to; but, if you want to tell me anything, it must be free and voluntary. I want the truth. I want to know the truth. That is all I do want. Now, do you think that when I can prove that you offered a man $200—I can prove it whether it is so or not—that you offered a man $200 to burn that place, that you told him that you had got the coal oil, that you went down to Rose's and had the place insured, and you came back and told a man it was all right, and he told you that you were crazy? Now, I can prove that, and when I can prove that you came up here and shipped away the goods, and I can prove that you said Lepori told you to ship the goods away, and I can prove to you that you told other people that Lepori told you there was going to be a fire, and if your brother goes back on it, he will go to the penitentiary for fourteen years; I don't lie to anybody. I don't lie to anybody. I am telling you what he said. But he said that. I am not telling you all that your brother said. I am not going to tell you all your brother said. I will tell you right now I won't tell you all your brother said; but you did tell your brother that, and your brother swore that you told him that Lepori was going to have a man come up here to set that house afire. I can prove that by every man in this room. They all heard it, by God, every man in this room heard that. Now, I can prove that you went to work and you did ship this stuff as Lepori told you. I can prove that man came up here from San Francisco with you, and that you stayed here with him and stayed until your brother came up and you,—at the Summit House,—and when your brother came up here, then you took your brother into his bedroom, the first night, and told him this story. Now, you shipped this stuff away, and you shipped stuff that didn't belong to you,—not a God damned bit of it. That cash register didn't belong to you or Lepori. It belonged to Rossi. You said this that you sold it to Rossi; and you shipped the wine and you shipped the bedding and you shipped the mineral water, and, by God, it is selling goods that don't belong to you. That belongs to Rossi, and Rossi has got a bill of sale for that."

Here the district attorney intervened with: "When you went to San Francisco, you went with Rossi and your brother, and they got off at Galt for Sacramento. You told us that Lepori told you to pack that stuff, and that Lepori didn't own it any more than you did. You told us that Lepori told that when you went back to San Francisco. You went down to Lepori's store to tell him that you had shipped that stuff, and you was also going to tell him that the man that went up with you was at your brother's house. Do you suppose that when I can prove that—"

Here the sheriff, interrupting the district attorney proceeded: "Do you suppose now that when I can prove that to you that any jury in the world is going to let you go? You have got to show where you got all this news. That is all there is about it. You have already told us that Lepori told you, but that won't clear you. You asked me if you could go, and I told you no. I am telling you I can't turn you loose. Suppose I turned you loose with all that evidence against you, what would people say about me? Here is a God damned pretty sheriff and a God damned pretty district attorney, to have all this proof against a man and turn him loose."

... If he (defendant) wants to say anything, he can say it now, because if he don't I am going to strike out to-morrow morning, and I am going to round up this whole God damned bunch. I can't stay here for a week, and I am not going to do it. If he wants to say anything, he can say it now. I want to say to you right now, Borello, that if you don't want to say anything, you don't have to. If you don't want to make any statement, you don't have to, but if you do, it must be free and voluntary on your part, without any concessions, promises, rewards, or anything else. Now, if you want to do it, you can."

Immediately following these declarations by the sheriff and district attorney, the defendant, in response to further questions, stated that Lepori had instigated the burning of the hotel, and had asked him to employ a man to do it, Lepori agreeing to pay the man a hundred dollars if the destruction was successful; that the defendant employed one Dominico Morazi, or a man having some such similar name—defendant could not tell exactly—to do it; that he took him to the Summit House from San Francisco for that purpose, left him there, and the hotel was burned.

Additional excerpts from the notes of Willis might be given showing highly improper conduct on the part of the officers to procure a confession from defendant, but the above will suffice. In this connection it is to be observed that in the lengthy and forceful declaration of the sheriff to the defendant last above quoted, the sheriff did not specifically state to the defendant how far the statement of his brother implicated him in the burning of the hotel; but there can be no reasonable doubt but that the sheriff intended to convey the idea and have the defendant believe, as he naturally would, that his brother had made a statement to the sheriff directly implicating him in it. The defendant knew that his brother Marco was under arrest and had made a statement, but did not know what it contained. No other meaning or intention could be taken by defendant from the language of the sheriff when referring to the statement made by Marco: "I am not telling you all your brother said. I am not going to tell you all your brother said. I will tell you right now I won't tell you all your brother said; but you did tell your brother that, and your brother swore that you told him that Lepori was going to have a man up there and set that house on fire,"—except that its emphatically reiterated character was to suggestively and insinuatingly impress the defendant with the belief that his brother's statement had in fact implicated him.

No attempt was made on the part of the prosecution to question the accuracy of what is shown by the testimony of Willis to be the exact circumstances and method employed by the officers to procure the confession.

On this showing made, the defendant moved the court to set aside the order theretofore made admitting the confession in evidence, under the right reserved to him by the court to do so at the time the confession was originally admitted in evidence, and on the ground that it was not freely and voluntarily made, which motion the court denied. This was error. The court should have granted the motion. While, upon the preliminary showing made by the prosecution, and upon which the admission of the confession was made, it appeared in answers to general questions that the confession had been obtained freely and voluntarily, the uncontradicted testimony of the stenographer showed exactly how it was obtained, and by what method and conduct on the part of those who had testified to its free and voluntary character, and conclusively showed that it was not so made, but was obtained by a method inquisitorial in its nature and of the "third degree" in character; the assumption of a dominating and browbeating attitude of the officers toward the defendant, and the employment of deceptions, threats, and intimidations, emphasized with coarse profanity.

That a confession so extorted cannot be admitted in evidence is firmly established in the jurisprudence of this country. Bram v. United States, 168 U. S. 532, 42 L. ed.

568, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 183, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 547; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 Pac. 720.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; Henshaw, J.; Melvin, J.; Shaw, J.

Sloss, J.: I concur.

The methods employed to induce the defendant to confess were, I think, more extreme and unfair than those which were held by a majority of the court in the Loper Case to require the exclusion of the confession there obtained. It is impossible in the present case to avoid the conclusion that the confession was forced from the defendant by means of intimidation. Apart from anything else, there was a direct threat that defendant's brother would be subjected to a long term of imprisonment for perjury, if he did not so testify as to fasten upon the defendant the guilt of the crime with which he was charged. A confession resulting from the use of such means cannot, in any fair sense, be said to have been free and voluntary.

Messrs. Edward H. Thomas and Francis H. Stephens, for defendant in error:

Congress is justified in putting automobiles into a class by themselves for the

the power to require other objects or subjects to be taxed in such manner as might be consistent with the principles of taxation of the Constitution, does not deprive the legislature of power to authorize a municipality to pass an ordinance regulating the use of its streets by vehicles, and imposing a license tax on such vehicles for revenue purposes. Harder's Fire Proof Storage & Van Co. v. Chicago, 235 Ill. 58, 85 N. E. 245, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 536.

So, a legislative act requiring every resident or nonresident owner of an automobile to file a verified declaration that he is competent to drive a motor vehicle, and a statement containing his name and address and a description of his automobile, and providing for a registration fee of $1, is within the exercise of the police power of the state. Unwen v. State, 73 N. J. L. 529, 64 Atl. 163.

And such fee does not infringe the state or Federal Constitutions on the ground that it constitutes double or special taxation, purpose of subjecting them to a double tax not imposed upon other classes of personal property.

While the court will not infer an intention to impose a double tax, but rather will uphold that construction of a statute which relieves property from a double taxation, when the statute is susceptible of such a construction without forcing, still the power of the legislature in that respect is undoubted.

or infringes upon the privileges or immunities of any citizen of another state. Ibid.

And such act, being a legitimate exercise of the police power, is unaffected by the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution. Ibid.

And a special provision in the act relating to dealers, and imposing an increased fee upon them, does not create an injurious distinction, since the limited period covered by the license to dealers in respect to any one machine, and other circumstances, distinguish the dealer from the private owner. Ibid.

And there being nothing to show that the fee of $1 is in excess of the expense of registration and regulation, the fee is a license, and not a tax. Ibid.

This case was affirmed in 75 N. J. L. 500, 68 Atl. 110, where the court said that they concurred in the former decision, except that they did not consider it necessary to determine whether the registration fee of $1 was in the nature of a license fee, or simply a fee exacted as a reasonable charge for issuing the certificate and the registering of it, as in either case it was clearly not a tax upon property, but a valid exercise of the police power.

And a legislative act fixing a fee for registration at $3 for each motor vehicle having a rating of 30 horse power or more, and providing for a fee of $1 for a license to drive a car less than 30 horse power, and $2 for a license to drive cars over that, and providing that the money received for license fees, etc., should be paid to the state treasurer, to be appropriated for use in repairing or improving the roads of the state, is a valid exercise of the police power, and does not impose a tax for revenue, but merely fixes a reasonable fee for regulating and supervising motor vehicles. State, Cleary, Prosecutor, v. Johnston, 79 N. J. L. 49, 74 Atl. 538.

And the fact that the public treasury is augmented by such fees does not have the effect of making such fee a tax. Ibid.

But if such fees be regarded as license fees 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

imposed for revenue, the legislature has power to exact them. Ibid.

This case was relied upon in Kane v. Titus, — N. J. —, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 80 Atl. 453, where a statute imposing a registration fee in excess of the cost of registration was held to be a revenue measure, and within the power of the legislature.

And in this case the charging of an annual sum for the use of the highways by automobiles, instead of a mileage fee, was held a matter within the discretion of the state, the only limitation upon such power being that the amount charged should be reasonable. Ibid.

And it was held that a statute fixing registration fees according to the horse power of the machine used was not a property tax, and was not invalid because it was imposed without regard to the value of the property upon which it was laid, since such imposition was a license or privilege tax, which was properly based upon the destruction to the highway done by the machine used. Ibid.

And it was further held that the provisions of the act requiring residents and non-residents who used the highways to pay registration fees based upon the horse power of their automobiles, which fees were to be used to defray the expenses of maintaining the highway, did not constitute a discrimination against nonresidents, and did not contravene the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. #### Municipal ordinances.

A city cannot levy a license on automobiles except under authority from the legislature. Mobile v. Gentry, 170 Ala. 234, 54 So. 488.

A license may be imposed and a fee collected with a view to revenue only, and the fact that a license fee exacted from vehicles, including automobiles, is set aside as a special fund, to be used for improving and repairing the city streets, does not render an ordinance or the statute authorizing its passage unconstitutional. Hubbard, 44 Ala. 593.

Robb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error from the police court, and involves the validity of the so-called wheel-tax law of May 18, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 248).

In the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. at L. 693, chap. 250), making appropriations for the expenses for the government of the District of Columbia, provision was made for a secretary or acting secretary of the automobile board, and it was further provided that thereafter there should be "assessed and collected an annual wheel tax on all automobiles, or other motor vehicles, owned and operated in the District of Columbia, having seats for only two persons, the sum of $3; and on all such vehicles having seats for more than two persons, an additional tax of $2 for each additional seat." No provision was made for the enforcement of the collection of this tax. Consequently, in the next District appropriation act, May 18, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 248), the act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. at L. 617, chap. 1352), providing, inter alia, for local real estate, personal property, and license taxes, was amended by adding to § 7 of said act the following: "That hereafter there shall be assessed and collected an annual wheel tax on all automobiles or other motor vehicles owned or operated in the District of Columbia, having seats for only two persons, the sum of $3; and on all such vehicles having seats for more than two persons, an additional tax of $2 for each additional seat."

After the going into effect of said act of 1910, there was filed in the police court, under the authority of said act of July 1, 1902, an information charging the plaintiff in error, hereinafter called the defendant, with failing to pay the wheel tax of $5 on a certain two-seated, three-passenger automobile owned and operated by him. The defendant filed a motion to quash the information, the grounds of the motion being the alleged indefiniteness of said wheel-

And the fact that an ad valorem tax has already been paid upon vehicles, or that the owner of vehicles has paid an occupation tax, does not exempt him from paying a license for the use of the public streets, and the ordinance referred to in the above paragraph is not unconstitutional on the ground that it constitutes double taxation. Ibid.

A provision of a municipal act giving power "to regulate and license the use of carts, drays, wagons, coaches, omnibuses, and every description of carriages and vehicles kept for hire, and to license and regulate the use of the streets of the town or city by persons who use vehicles or solicit or transact business thereon," empowers a municipality to levy a license fee on users of automobiles for pleasure, as well as upon vehicles kept for hire and for business purposes. Mobile v. Gentry, supra.

Where the right of a city to license vehicles is conceded, and the charter expressly authorizes it to enact ordinances, and to enforce them by fine and imprisonment, the city has power to enact an ordinance providing for taxing vehicles used upon its streets, and providing for the use of tags thereon, and punishing a violation of the ordinance by fine or imprisonment. Kellaher v. Portland, 57 Or. 578, 110 Pac. 492, 112 Pac. 1076.

Although a city is given power to license vehicles, the classification must be on some reasonable basis, and all vehicles within the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

class sought to be taxed must be included. Ibid.

An ordinance taxing vehicles used on city streets is not discriminatory in that it expressly exempts from its operation vehicles used for pleasure, and also out of town vehicles. Ibid.

And an ordinance providing for the licensing of motor vehicles of two or more seats, which was valid when passed, cannot be rendered invalid, on the ground of unjust discrimination, by the subsequent introduction of motor vehicles of only one seat. Ayres v. Chicago, 239 Ill. 237, 87 N. E. 1073. The court said that if it was conceded that there were motor vehicles of but one seat in use when the above ordinance was passed, they were not prepared to say that this would render it invalid, since there may have been reasons known to the city council in regard to the character and use of the excluded vehicles for exempting them from the operation of the ordinance. Ibid.

But an ordinance licensing vehicles, which imposes a fee on vehicles drawn by horses which are used for business purposes, but omits from its terms automobiles used for like purposes, is void, since such classification is not made on a reasonable basis. Kellaher v. Portland, supra.

The word "automobile" in an ordinance regulating the licensing of vehicles is sufficiently broad to include auto trucks, so that the ordinance cannot be avoided because of a failure to include them. Ibid.

tax law; the alleged conflict between said law and the organic act of Congress of June 11, 1878 (20 Stat. at L. 102, chap. 180); because it includes for taxation all automobiles operated in the District, irrespective of whether they may be taxed as personal property elsewhere; because the payment of said wheel tax, it is asserted, may not be enforced by criminal proceedings; because said wheel-tax law, if an occupation tax, is an attempt to enforce collection of a second license tax for the privilege of operating an automobile on the streets; and because said wheel-tax law, the defendant asserts, is "so arbitrary, unequal, discriminating, and unusual, as to render it void."

We will first endeavor to determine the nature of the tax from the payment of which the defendant seeks to escape. Under the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. at L. 621, chap. 3615), the speed of automobiles in the District was regulated. In the following year, March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. at L. 1126, chap. 2510), provision was made for identification number tags. This was clearly a police regulation in aid of the prior act. The act under consideration bears no relation to these police measures,—it is a revenue-producing measure, and imposes a charge upon all automobiles owned or operated in this District.

A similar tax on carriages, authorized by

Where a state motor vehicle law provides that, with certain exceptions, local authorities shall have no power to pass any ordinance requiring of the owner of motor vehicles any license or permit to use the streets, and enacts that all ordinances in force are to be inoperative, and that all acts inconsistent with the motor vehicle law are repealed, a city has no power to enact an ordinance in pursuance of a prior statute authorizing it to enact an ordinance imposing a tax upon owners of automobiles, for the privilege of operating them along the city streets. Buffalo v. Lewis, 192 N. Y. 193, 84 N. E. 809.

And an ordinance prohibiting the use of the public streets to the owners of automobiles and other motor vehicles named, unless the owners of automobiles should pay the city an annual tax of $5, the tax to be applied to the fund for the repair of streets, imposes a license, and not a tax to raise revenue for the municipal expenses, and is in conflict with the state motor vehicle law. Ibid.

And where the state act regulating the licensing of automobiles and chauffeurs provides that "local authorities shall have no power to pass, enforce, or maintain any ordinance, rule, or regulation requiring from any owner or chauffeur to whom this article is applicable, any tax, fee, license, or permit for the use of the public highways, or excluding any such owner or chauffeur from the free use of such public highways" 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the act of June 5, 1794 (1 Stat. at L. 374, chap. 45), was sustained as an indirect tax or excise (Hylton v. United States, 3 Dall. 171, 1 L. ed. 556). A tax on expense, the court said, is an indirect tax, and a tax on a consumable commodity like a carriage is a tax on the expense of the owner.

In Patton v. Brady, 184 U. S. 608, 46 L. ed. 713, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493, a similar excise on tobacco manufactured for consumption was also sustained. In Thomas v. United States, 192 U. S. 363, 48 L. ed. 481, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305, a stamp tax on sales of shares of stock was sustained as an excise duty.

It is probable that Congress entertained the view that automobiles, theoretically, at least, are owned or operated by persons most able to bear the burdens of taxation; and that the operation of such vehicles is attended with increased expense to the municipality. Congress, therefore, acting as a local legislature for the District (Gibbons v. District of Columbia, 116 U. S. 407, 29 L. ed. 681, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427), followed the lead of state legislatures and distinguished automobiles as a proper class to bear an excise duty in addition to other taxes. There is nothing indefinite about the law. It distinguishes a class and imposes an excise thereon. Such classification "need not be either logically appropriate or

. . . and no ordinance, rule, or regulation contrary to, or in any wise inconsistent with, the provisions of this article, now in force or hereafter enacted, shall have any effect,"—a municipality cannot require licenses for vehicles and drivers in addition to the licenses issued by the state. Barrett v. New York, 189 Fed. 268.

But in Ayres v. Chicago, supra, it was held that the provision of a state motor vehicle act, that no owner of a motor vehicle who had obtained a certificate from the secretary of state, as provided for in the motor vehicle act, should be required to obtain any other license or permit to use or operate his vehicle, and that such owner should not be required to display upon his vehicle any other number than that furnished by the secretary of state, is not violated by a city ordinance requiring owners of motor vehicles to pay an annual license to the city on their machines, since the word "license," as used, meant tax, and the issuing of the license was merely the giving of a receipt by the city for the payment of the tax.

The general subject of license fees on vehicles for the use of streets is considered in the note to Tomlinson v. Indianapolis, 36 L.R.A. 413, and that note is supplemented by the note to Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Hot Springs, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1035, as to the particular phase of the subject presented by the question of the validity of license fees, as affected by discrimination between different classes of vehicles. J. T. W. scientifically accurate." It is enough if it is impartial within the class. District of Columbia v. Brooke, 214 U. S. 138, 53 L. ed. 941, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 560. That case is also a direct answer to the contention that payment of the tax may not be enforced by criminal prosecution.

This wheel-tax act being an excise measure, as above pointed out, is not inconsistent with the organic act of 1878; and if it was, it would not, for that reason, be invalid, since both acts emanating from Congress, the later would govern.

The contention that because the defendant has paid a personal-property tax upon the value of his automobile, Congress may not require him to pay this excise tax, must also fail. Property that has been charged with a general tax may also be charged with an excise, and either or both forms of taxation may be repeated or increased within the will of the legislature, subject, of course, to the limitation that such legislation must be reasonable. Patton v. Brady, supra.

The defendant further contends that this law is void because there is no justification for the subdivision of the class. He does not deny that the law is uniform within the subdivisions of the class, but he says there is no logical reason for grading the tax according to a progressive rate. This last vehicle affected. As we have seen, that was a question for Congress. Moreover, similar statutes have received judicial sanction. Harder's Fire-Proof Storage & Van Co. v. Chicago, 235 Ill. 58, 85 N. E. 245, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 536; Babbitt, Motor Vehicles, § 91; State v. Swagerty, 203 Mo. 517, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 601, 120 Am. St. Rep. 671, 102 S. W. 483, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 725; Opinion of Justices, 195 Mass. 607; Hylton v. United States, 3 Dall. 171, 1 L. ed. 556.

In Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, a Federal inheritance-tax law was sustained. That law discriminated between relatives, and again between relatives and strangers, granted exemptions, and imposed the tax according to a progressive rate. This last feature was attacked as repugnant to fundamental principles of equality. The court, without intimating any opinion as to its right to declare the law void for such a reason, disposed of the contention in these words: "The review which we have made exhibits the fact that taxes imposed with reference to the ability of the person upon whom the burden is placed to bear the same have been levied from the foundation of the government. So, also, some authoritative thinkers and a number of economic writers contend that a progressive tax is more just and equal than a proportional 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) one." The court was careful to add, however, that if a case should ever arise "where an arbitrary and confiscatory exaction is imposed bearing the guise of a progressive or any other form of tax, it will be time enough to consider whether the judicial power can afford a remedy by applying inherent and fundamental principles for the protection of the individual, even though there be no express authority in the Constitution to do so." In the same opinion Mr. Justice (now Mr. Chief Justice) White, at page 94, set forth a partial list of excise acts during Washington's administration. Almost all of those acts were open to the objection raised against the act under consideration. See also, Campbell v. California, 200 U. S. 87, 50 L. ed. 382, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182.

In the light of the foregoing, it is our conclusion that this wheel tax is within the power of Congress to enact, and that the judgment of the Police Court must be affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

STATE OF MAINE

v.

HENRY C. PARSHLEY.

(— Me. —, 81 Atl. 484.)

Intoxicating Liquors — Importation — constructive delivery — seizure.

Paying the express charges and signing the receipt book for intoxicating liquors imported from another state do not constitute a constructive delivery, so as to subject them to seizure under the state law, in view of the Wilson act, where the consignee stated that he was uncertain whether or not the liquors were his, and requested the carrier, which had not tendered them to him, to hold them until he ascertained if they were, and only seven hours elapsed between that time and the attempted seizure.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Sagadahoc County for the determination by the Law Court of a question arising upon appeal from a judgment of the Bath Municipal Court finding respondent guilty of storing intoxicating liquors for the purpose of illegal sale. Judgment for respondent.

Note. — As to when interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors is deemed to have terminated, see notes to State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 550; State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1020; and State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745.

The report of Savage, Presiding Justice, is as follows:

"This was a process for the seizure of intoxicating liquors alleged to be stored for the purpose of illegal sale in the office of the American Express Company in the city of Bath. It was issued by the Bath municipal court, and is dated August 5, 1910.

"The following facts appear in evidence:

"A barrel containing intoxicating liquors was shipped from Boston, Massachusetts, to Bath, Maine, the barrel, according to the marks thereon, being consigned to H. C. Parshley. The driver for the express company called at the respondent's shop about 10 o'clock A. M., notified him of the arrival of this barrel, and asked if it was for him and what he wanted done with it. Respondent said he did not know whether it was for him or not, but that he would pay the express charges, which he did, and signed the express receipt book, and told the driver to keep the liquors until he (Parshley) found out about it.

"The liquors remained in the storeroom of the express company until about 5 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, when they were seized under this warrant. Between the time the notice was given by the driver and time of the seizure, no notice had been received by the express company from Parshley, or anyone representing him, as to the disposition of the liquors. But the driver testifies that, if any direction had been given by Parshley, he understood that it would have been his duty to carry and deliver the barrel to the respondent, as directed.

"Upon the foregoing statement of facts the case is, by agreement of parties, reported to the law court for its determination. Only a single question is reserved. All others necessary for the state to prove are admitted by the respondent. If the court is of opinion that the barrel of liquors seized had been sufficiently delivered by the express company to the respondent, so that it was no longer under the protection of the interstate commerce provision of the United States Constitution and of the Federal statutes relating to the same, judgment is to be rendered for the state as follows: 'Judgment of the Bath municipal court affirmed' otherwise, a nol. pros. is to be entered."

Mr. Arthur H. Stetson, for the State:

The act of the express company in notifying the respondent of the arrival of the goods, and the act of the respondent in signing the express book and paying the charges, constituted a constructive delivery of the goods, made the express company the agent of the respondent in holding them, and rendered them liable to seizure 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Mr. Frank L. Staples, for respondent:

Delivery is an essential element in determining whether the goods have arrived in the receiving state; without a delivery of some sort, there is no arrival, within the meaning of the word as used in the Wilson act.

Intoxicating Liquors, 106 Me. 142, 76 Atl. 267.

If the package be a "C. O. D." package, transported by express into the receiving state, there must be an actual delivery; and the protection of the Federal laws remains over it until such delivery takes place.

Bird, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There being no claim of an actual delivery, the sole question for determination is whether the liquors were constructively delivered before seizure under process.

The act of Congress of August 8, 1890

(26 Stat. at L. 313, chap. 728, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177), known as the "Wilson act," provided that all intoxicating liquors "transported into any state or territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such state or territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such state or territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise." The meaning of the word "arrival" as employed in this act was authoritatively settled in Heyman v. Southern R. Co. 203 U. S. 270, 51 L. ed. 178, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1130. The conclusions reached in that case have been summarized by this court as follows:

1. The elementary and long-settled doctrine is reiterated that, prior to the Wilson act, in case of interstate shipments, "delivery and sale in the original packages was necessary to terminate interstate commerce, so far as the police regulations of the states were concerned."

2. That the Wilson act manifested no attempt on the part of Congress to delegate to the states the right to forbid the transportation of merchandise from one state to another, "since it merely provided, in the case of intoxicating liquors, that such merchandise, when transported from one state to another, should lose its character as interstate commerce upon completion of delivery under the contract of interstate shipment, and before sale in the original package."

3. That the state statute must permit the delivery of the liquors to the party to whom they were consigned within the state, but that, after such delivery, the state has power to prevent the sale of the liquors, even in the original package.

4. That the question whether the liability of the carrier, as such, has ceased, under the state laws, and has become that of a warehouseman, is immaterial. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 102 Me. 385, 395, 120 Am. St. Rep. 504, 67 Atl. 312.

In the case under consideration, as already seen, there is no pretense of an actual delivery; but it is urged by the state that there was a constructive delivery, and that such is sufficient to meet the requirement of the Wilson act. In Heyman v. Southern R. Co. ubi supra, there were no facts justifying the passing upon the question of constructive delivery; but the court in its opinion says: "Of course, we are not called upon in this case, and do not decide, if goods of the character referred to in the Wilson act, moving in interstate commerce, arrive at the point of destination, and, after notice and full opportunity to receive them, are designedly left in the hands of the carrier for an unreasonable time, that such conduct on the part of the consignee might not justify, if affirmatively alleged and proven, the holding that goods so dealt with have come under the operation of the Wilson act, because constructively delivered." Id. 203 U. S. 276, 51 L. ed. 180, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1130.

This language of the Supreme Court of the United States has already been considered by this court in State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 102 Me. 385, 396, 120 Am. St. Rep. 504, 67 Atl. 312, in which it is held that the point, if tenable, is unimportant from lack of facts to render it applicable to the cases under consideration, and in State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 104 Me. 463, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1020, 72 Atl. 331, and again in State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 106 Me. 138, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, 76 Atl. 265, 20 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 668.

In the case in 104 Me. 463, it is said: "In this paragraph the court seems to have undertaken to state, but not to decide, the three essential elements of constructive delivery to be notice to the consignee of the arrival of the goods, a reasonable time on his part after notice to receive them, and a mutual design or arrangement with the carrier to hold them for the consignee." And, referring to the words "designedly left in the hands of the carrier for an unreasonable time," the court says: "This phrase was undoubtedly intended to allude to a passive or silent understanding between the shippers of liquors, the carriers, and the consignees, with reference to those transactions which operate to enable an evasion of the law and assist consignees in obtaining a safe delivery of their contraband goods. . . . The rule is well established that a constructive delivery can be effected only by an agreement between the carrier or middleman and the buyer or person claiming under him, whereby the former agrees to hold goods for the latter for some purpose other than that of carriage to and delivery at their original destination. In the absence of an agreement with the buyer to the contrary, the carrier will be presumed to hold the goods in his original capacity. The carrier cannot constitute himself the buyer's agent for the custody of the goods, nor can the buyer make the carrier his agent for custody without the carrier's consent. . . . The relation of carrier to the shipper, the consignee, and the goods is originally fixed by law, and by a contract between the parties, which is that the carrier shall safely carry the goods to their place of destination and there deliver them to the consignee. This contract, once existing, can be changed only by the operation of law or by an agreement between the parties. When the goods arrive at their journey's end, it is the duty of the carrier to store them. This duty is imposed by law. When stored, they are still in the possession and custody of the carrier, and the only change in his relation to the goods is the extent of his liability. The goods are still in transit. . . . The contract is still binding upon the carrier to deliver the goods to the consignee, and this obligation can be terminated only by actual or constructive delivery, or by a new contract with the consignee in place of the contract of carriage."

In 106 Me. 138, this court says: "In Heyman v. Southern R. Co. 203 U. S. 270, 276, 51 L. ed. 178, 180, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1130, the court was careful to say that it did not decide that the Federal protection would not be lost where the consignee, after notice, designedly left the liquors in the hands of the carrier for an unreasonable time. The locality of the liquors is not made the test. All that the Federal courts seem to require is that the liquors shall once have been turned over to and accepted by the consignee. This may occur without any removal of the liquors themselves from the freight sheds of the carrier." This case and that in 104 Me. 463, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1020, 72 Atl. 331, were contracts for the carriage of goods as freight, and not by express. In the latter case it was held there was no constructive delivery, and in the former that there was; but in that case not only had all the goods been receipted for, but part of them had been delivered from the freight shed of the carrier to the agent of the consignee.

Was there constructive delivery of the liquors in the case at bar? As has been noted, the contract between the shipper and carrier provided for carriage by express. Such contract includes the delivery of the goods to the consignee personally, or at his residence or place of business, and until such delivery the liability of the carrier continues. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 101 Me. 430, 64 Atl. 812, Id., 102 Me. 211, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 550, 66 Atl. 393; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission (Com. C.) 188 Fed. 229, 237. The record in the case at bar does not show that the liquors were ever tendered to the plaintiff personally or at his place of business. Notice was given him at 10 o'clock of the forenoon of a certain day that the liquors had arrived, and inquiry made if they were for him, and what he wanted done with them. He replied that he was uncertain if his or not, and said that he would pay the express charges, and directed the driver of the carrier to keep the liquors until he ascertained. He paid the charges and signed the express receipt book.

We do not think that the facts present a case within the exception from the rule as to delivery suggested in Heyman v. Southern R. Co. ubi supra. There is no evidence that the liquors were designedly left in the hands of the carrier. At most, there is but a suspicion or surmise arising from the character of the goods; but there is no evidence contradicting the statement of plaintiff that he was not informed as to their ownership and that he asked opportunity to learn. Neither do we think they were held by the carrier an unreasonable length of time. If, instead of liquors, the goods had been any other commodity, would seven hours have been an unreasonable delay? And to hold that a delay reasonable as to other commodities is unreasonable with respect to intoxicating liquors would be to refuse to the latter before delivery the same protection which the commerce clause of the Constitution affords to other goods. See Heyman v. Southern R. Co. 203 U. S. 270, 276, 277, 51 L. ed. 178, 180, 181, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1130; Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 206 U. S. 129, 135, 136, 51 L. ed. 987, 991, 992, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606.

Until delivery, commerce in intoxicating liquors is left by the Wilson act as free and untrammelled, and subject to the same regulations, as other commodities; but to hold unreasonable delay in case of the former to be different from that of the latter would be discrimination, and would permit the police laws of the state to affect the regulation of commerce. Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 214 U. S. 218, 222, 53 L. ed. 972, 973, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633; Ex parte Eaglesfield (D. C.) 180 Fed. 558, 562. The regulation of commerce adopted by the Wilson act is one common rule, whose uniformity is not affected by variations in state laws in dealing with such property. Re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 559, 561. 35 L. ed. 572, 575, 576, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865; Heyman v. Southern R. Co. 203 U. S. 270, 274, 51 L. ed. 178, 180, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1130. Yet, if unreasonable delay is to be interpreted in view of the police laws of the states, no uniform rule is established, and delay reasonable in a license state will be unreasonable in a state where prohibition prevails. The receipt is not conclusive, but may be modified in its terms or wholly contradicted by evidence. Plaintiff, nevertheless, had a right, under the contract of carriage, to delivery either to him personally or where he should direct, and we find no evidence of waiver of this right. Indeed, it does not appear that the liquors bore any address, except the name of defendant and the words "Bath, Maine," and, until directed where to make it, the express company could make no delivery. Finally, not only is a designed leaving in the hands of the carrier for unreasonable time not proven, but it is nowhere affirmatively alleged.

Applying the test of our own decisions, we do not find constructive delivery proven by the facts presented in the reported case. There is no satisfactory evidence of a change of the contract of carriage by agreement of the parties, nor was such a change effected by operation of law. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 104 Me. 463, 468, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1020, 72 Atl. 331. Nor is there evidence that, either contemporaneously with or subsequent to the giving of the receipt, there was delivery of a part of the goods, as in State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 106 Me. 138, 140, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 745, 76 Atl. 265, 20 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 668.

STATE OF MISSOURI EX REL. TERMINAL RAILROAD ASSOCIATION OF ST. LOUIS

v.

DANIEL O'CONNELL TRACY, Judge. et al.

(237 Mo. 109, 140 S. W. 888.)

Prohibition — failure to state cause of action — jurisdiction.

Note. — Prohibition to prevent numerous unfounded prosecutions for alleged violation of statute or ordinance.

There is a difference of opinion among the courts as to whether the mere fact that a prosecution is for the violation of an invalid statute or ordinance in and of itself furnishes ground for invoking a writ of prohibition to prohibit the prosecution, although in substantially all the cases it is conceded that a writ of prohibition is not the proper remedy if there is some other adequate remedy. It is not the purpose of this note, however, to discuss the general question as to when a writ of prohibition will issue, the 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

dinance in running its cars across streets, filed in a court which has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, fail to state a cause of action, will not justify the issuance of a writ of prohibition against the prosecutions, although the number is so great as to be oppressive.

PETITION for a writ of prohibition to restrain respondents from prosecuting relator for alleged violations of a certain ordinance. Writ denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. M. Pierce and J. L. Howell for relator.

Messrs. Lambert E. Walther and William E. Baird, for respondents:

Where the inferior court has jurisdiction, prohibition will not lie, unless it appears that the court has abused its powers, or has entertained the case for improper purposes.

The inferior court has the power to decide whether the petition does or does not state a cause of action, and the mere failure of a petition to state a cause of action, or the defective statement of a good cause of action, in no way affects the jurisdiction of the court.

question here raised being limited to the question whether the aid of this writ may be invoked to prevent numerous or multifarious prosecutions for violation of an invalid statute or ordinance. In other words, the question is whether the fact that a person is being subjected to several prosecutions for the violation of an invalid statute or ordinance entitles him to a writ of prohibition, on the theory that he has no adequate remedy at law. The courts considering the matter are in harmony in holding that whenever an inferior court proceeds to act in excess of its jurisdiction, and when, as incidental to its action, it involves the submission to multitudinous and persecuting prosecutions in such a way as to make its acts

Kennish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding in prohibition brought by the relator, Terminal Railroad Association of St. Louis, against the respondents, Daniel O'Connell Tracy, judge of the first district police court of the city of St. Louis, and the city of St. Louis. Relator filed its petition in this court on the 28th day of June, 1910. A preliminary rule in prohibition was issued against respondents as prayed, and made returnable to the October term, 1910. In due time the respondents filed their return to the writ. The relator moved for judgment on the pleadings, and the cause, being thus at issue, is submitted for decision.

The pleadings are lengthy, and we do not deem it necessary that they should be set forth in this statement. The facts determinative of the case stand admitted by the respondents' return and by the relator's motion for judgment on the pleadings.

The allegations of the petition are substantially as follows: That relator is a railway corporation, organized under the laws of this state, and in accordance with said laws and the ordinances of the city of St. Louis is engaged in the business of a terminal railway company within the limits of said city, receiving, transporting, and delivering cars and trains of cars from the various railway companies connected with its terminal lines, and in switching cars to and from industries and manufacturing companies within said city, and to and from the Union Station, which station is owned and controlled by relator. That the respondent the city of St. Louis is a municipal corporation, organized and existing under a special charter adopted by its citizens in accordance with the Consti-oppressive, a writ of prohibition is the proper remedy.

Said the court in Crittenden v. Booneville, 92 Miss. 277, 131 Am. St. Rep. 518, 45 So. 723: "A writ of prohibition is an extraordinary writ, and is proper to be issued only in cases of extreme necessity. It should appear to the judge issuing the writ that it is the only adequate remedy of the party making the application therefor. It will not lie in a case which may be redressed in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, and is not to be made a substitute for any other method of obtaining the relief sought. If a complete remedy lies by appeal, certiorari, mandamus, or in any other manner, this writ should be denied. It is different from an injunction, in that the injunction is addressed to the litigating parties, while a writ of prohibition is addressed to the inferior court itself, commanding it to cease from the exercise of a jurisdiction to which it has no legal claim. . . . The object of the writ is to restrain an inferior court from acting without authority of law in cases where wrong, damage, and injustice will follow such action. If the entire proceedings of the inferior court are without authority of law, and void, the remedy to be obtained by appeal, which could only follow fruitless and expensive trials, and particularly in the case where a party is being prosecuted under a void ordinance, and at the same time prohibited from the use of his property while these prosecutions are being conducted, an appeal in such a case cannot be said to be an adequate remedy."

The foregoing doctrine was asserted in holding that a writ of prohibition was the proper remedy where a person was being made the subject of many prosecutions for the violation of an invalid ordinance.

This was also regarded as a sufficient ground to justify the issuance of a writ of 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

prohibition in Hughes v. Detroit Recorder's Ct. 75 Mich. 574, 4 L.R.A. 863, 13 Am. St. Rep. 475, 42 N. W. 984, holding that the writ of prohibition will lie to prevent numerous prosecutions for the violation of an invalid city ordinance relating to hawkers and peddlers, where the refusal of such relief will have the effect of destroying the season's business for the persons being prosecuted, as well as to leave them open to multitudinous and persecuting prosecutions.

Numerous prosecutions for the violation of an unconstitutional statute have also been restrained by a writ of prohibition on the theory that the number of the prosecutions renders any other relief inadequate. Thus in State ex rel. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Asso. v. Eby, 170 Mo. 597, 71 S. W. 52, in giving relief of this character to prevent numerous prosecutions for the violation of an unconstitutional statute, the court pointed out that if the relators could not have the relief prayed for, they would have to go to trial in twelve hundred and three cases, and if defeated would have to give bond in each case, take an appeal in each case, pay for a transcript in each case, pay a docket fee in each case of $10, such fees amounting in the aggregate to $12,030, and would also have to pay counsel fees in each case; and it is said that it is conspicuously obvious that a remedy by different appeals, although available, would be inadequate to meet the emergencies of the case, or afford the redress to which the injured party is entitled.

It has, however, been held that it is not sufficient that a person has been prosecuted in one action for an alleged offense that is unfounded, and that he is also threatened with other similar prosecutions, which, however, have not yet been begun, and hence are not pending. Darnell v. Vandine. 64 W. Va. 53, 60 S. E. 996, A. G. S.

tution and laws of this state. That the respondent Tracy, at the times mentioned, was and is the acting justice of the first district police court of said city, possessing jurisdiction of all suits for the recovery of any fine, forfeiture, or penalty imposed for the violation of any ordinance of said city. That there are pending before respondent Tracy, as acting justice of said police court, against relator, about 200 separate cases for alleged violations of a certain ordinance, instituted by the respondent city and set for trial. That 17 cases for such alleged violations of said ordinance have been prosecuted to final judgment against relator in said police court, and fines imposed amounting to the total sum of $7,050, from which judgments appeals have been taken to the court of criminal correction of said city. That in some of the cases so appealed to the latter court, judgments have been rendered against relator, and fines imposed aggregating the sum of $1,800. That all of said prosecutions are based upon alleged violations of ordinance No. 22,902, § 1224, of the ordinances of said city, which section is as follows: "Whoever shall himself, or by another, place upon any highway or other public place any obstruction not authorized by ordinance, or make any excavation in such place without lawful authority, or displace or remove any stones, stakes, or other landmark placed by any officer of this city under authority thereof, or injure or deface any property, or violate any provisions of this ordinance for violation of which no specific penalty is provided, shall forfeit and pay not less than $10." That said prosecutions were instituted by the city attorney of the respondent city by filing informations identical in form, except where there is a difference in the streets alleged to have been obstructed, and that many of the informations relate to the same streets and portions thereof. That the said informations, omitting caption and signature, are in the following form, to wit:

"Terminal Railroad Association of St. Louis, a corporation. To the city of St. Louis, dr.

"To $500 for the violation of an ordinance of said city, entitled, 'An Ordinance in Revision of the General Ordinances of the City of St. Louis, Being Ordinance No. 22,902, § 1224, Approved March 19th, 1907.'

"In this, to wit:

"In the city of St. Louis and state of Missouri, on the _____ day of _____, 1909, and on divers other days and times prior thereto, the said Terminal Railroad Association of St. Louis, a corporation, did then and there place and cause to be placed upon the public highway known as _____ street, at or near city block _____, an obstruction not authorized by ordinance, consisting of engines, cars, and trains of cars, operated and run over tracks lying across _____ street aforesaid.

"Contrary to the ordinance in such case made and provided."

It is further alleged that no charge or allegation is contained in any of said informations that the tracks of relator were not laid, constructed, or maintained upon or across said streets with authority of law and with the consent of said city; that there is not now and was not at any of the times mentioned any ordinance of said city forbidding the operation or movement of engines, cars, or trains of cars across any street of said city, as appears from the printed and published ordinances of said city, which ordinances are exhibited with and made a part of the petition; that the said city has now printed 1,000 blank informations, and is filling and filing the same, and if not prohibited from so doing by this court will continue to file other and further informations of the same character, and will continue such prosecutions, to the great and irreparable injury of the relator, and to the destruction of its business; that relator has presented the jurisdictional questions against said prosecutions both to said police court and to the court of criminal correction, and its motions and objections have been overruled and disregarded; that the respondent court, being without jurisdiction in the premises, is wrongfully, illegally, and oppressively asserting and exercising jurisdiction in such causes against relator's constitutional rights, and will continue to do so unless prohibited by this court; that by reason of said prosecutions relator is compelled, at great cost and expense, to keep its attorneys almost constantly engaged in the defense thereof and in filing bonds and perfecting appeals therein; that the remedy of appeal is wholly inadequate; and that relator has endeavored in vain to obtain the consent of said city to stop the bringing of said suits and the prosecution of all except one, in order that the rights of the parties may be finally determined by the result of an appeal to this court.

It is further alleged that said § 1224 of the ordinances of said city, against the provisions whereof the relator is alleged to have offended, relates solely to objects placed and at rest in the public highways in said city, and not to vehicles in motion, operated along, upon, or across the same, and has no reference to or bearing upon the right to operate engines, cars, or trains of cars upon, along, or across the city's streets; that the regulation and operation of steam cars or steam railroads in said city are controlled and governed by the provisions of article 5, chapter 23, of said ordinances, embracing §§ 1852 to 1802, inclusive; that in proceeding against relator under said informations said police court "is acting in excess of its jurisdiction and powers, and is proceeding in grievous abuse of its powers, in holding your relator, under the circumstances hereinbefore recited, to defend against all or any number of said alleged informations; and it prays this court to protect it against the hardships, injustice, and oppression involved in requiring it to defend against all of said 210 alleged informations."

Relator has filed as exhibits with its petition copies of the sections of the ordinances of said city fixing and defining the jurisdiction of the police court, together with a descriptive list of the cases now pending against it in the said police court and the court of criminal correction.

The facts set forth in relator's petition are substantially admitted in respondents' return. Respondents affirmatively pleaded in the return, and it stands admitted by the motion for judgment on the pleadings, that by the charter of the city of St. Louis the first district police court is vested with exclusive original jurisdiction over all cases involving the violation of the ordinances of said city, including jurisdiction over offenses for the placing of obstructions in the highways of said city, and that, in entertaining jurisdiction of the cases referred to in the relator's petition, said police court acted by virtue of the authority and power so conferred by said charter, and not otherwise.

The foregoing is deemed a sufficient statement of the facts for the purposes of this opinion.

The remedy by writ of prohibition is of ancient origin in our system of jurisprudence. The principles of law governing its issuance and the facts necessary to warrant relief by that extraordinary writ have frequently been the subject of adjudication in this and other courts of last resort, as well as the theme of much learning by the text writers. It has been likened to the equitable remedy by injunction against proceedings at law. The object in each case is the restraining of legal proceedings; but, as has been said: "This vital difference is, however, to be observed between them: An injunction against proceedings at law is directed only to the parties litigant, without in any manner interfering with the court, while a prohibition is directed to the court itself, commanding it to cease from the exercise of a jurisdiction to which it has no legal claim." High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 763. There is this further similarity between the two remedies thus compared, which is of importance in the consideration of the case in hand; namely, that, as the right to the remedy by injunction implies a wrong threatened by the parties litigant against whom the relief is sought, so the right to the writ of prohibition implies that a wrong is about to be committed, not by the parties litigant, as in the case of injunction, but by the person or court assuming the exercise of judicial power and against whom the writ is asked. Indeed, it may be said generally of all procedure in courts of justice for the enforcement of civil rights, that the existence of a remedy on the one hand implies actionable wrong on the other. It follows that, to entitle a relator to a writ of prohibition, it should be made to appear that it is within the power, and that it is the duty, of the person or court proceeded against, to refrain from taking the threatened judicial action which is made the basis of the complaint. The judicial wrong or fault which calls for the writ of prohibition does not mean an infraction of personal rights only, but rather an offending of the court by an assumption of judicial power and jurisdiction not authorized by law.

Relator states in its brief that the writ of prohibition will be ordered by a superior court to curb and restrain an inferior court in the following instances: "First, when the lower court has no jurisdiction. Second, when the lower court is proceeding in excess of its jurisdiction. Third, when the instrumentalities of the lower court are being used for the purposes of oppression, and the jurisdiction of the court abused."

The first two grounds thus stated are recognized as settled law in the adjudged cases, and if the facts of a given case show either want of jurisdiction or excess thereof, together with an absence of an adequate remedy at law or in equity, a case is made warranting the issuance of the writ. It should be observed that, although want of jurisdiction and excess of jurisdiction are commonly referred to and considered as separate grounds for the issuance of the writ, there is in principle little distinction between them, as each means an attempt by a court or person to take judicial action without judicial power or authority for such action.

The third ground, as stated by relator, is rather vague and indefinite, and seems to assert the proposition that there exists a basis for the issuance of the writ independent of and not comprehended within either of the first two grounds. This contention is the main question before us for decision, and a consideration of the admitted facts of this case makes obvious the importance and necessity to relator of its ability to maintain that proposition.

An examination of the authorities upon the law governing the issuance of this extraordinary writ has brought to our attention, among others, the following: "The sole question for determination upon an application for the writ of prohibition is whether or not the inferior court has usurped jurisdiction or exceeded its lawful powers; and the writ is always refused where it appears that the court has jurisdiction over the matter complained of." 16 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1125.

"Upon an application for a writ of prohibition to stay the action of an inferior court, the sole question to be determined is the jurisdiction of that court." High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 767b. ". . . In all cases, therefore, where the inferior court has jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, the superior court will refuse to interfere by prohibition, and will leave the party aggrieved to pursue the ordinary remedies for the correction of errors, such as the writ of error or certiorari. In the application of the principle it matters not whether the court below has decided correctly or erroneously; its jurisdiction being conceded, prohibition will not go to prevent an erroneous exercise of that jurisdiction. . . ." High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 772.

"The court will exercise its authority to issue writs of prohibition to courts of inferior jurisdiction only in cases where such courts clearly exceed their jurisdiction, or attempt to usurp a jurisdiction belonging to some other forum." 2 Spelling, Inj. & Extr. Rem. 2d ed. § 1723.

"The broad governing principle is that a prohibition lies where a subordinate tribunal has no jurisdiction at all to deal with the cause or matter before it; or where, in the progress of a cause within its jurisdiction, some point arises for decision which the inferior court is incompetent to determine. But a prohibition will not lie where the inferior court has jurisdiction to deal with the cause and with all matters necessarily arising therein, however erroneous its decision may be upon any point." Shortt, Mandamus & Prohibition, § 436.

"Where the lower tribunal has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, prohibition will not lie." 32 Cyc. 605.

and 1752; Wood, Mandamus, Prohibition, 147; Lloyd, Prohibition, 48.

And from the decisions of this court the following:

"A writ of prohibition issues from a superior to an inferior court to restrain the latter from exceeding its jurisdiction. 5 Bacon, Abr. 446, title, 'Prohibition.' The justice clearly had jurisdiction here, and the writ was improvidently issued." Morris v. Lenox, 8 Mo., loc. cit. 253.

"Such jurisdiction being conceded, it clearly follows that a writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent its erroneous exercise. Some other remedy must be resorted to." Wilson v. Berkstresser, 45 Mo., loc. cit. 236.

"The question is not whether the court was authorized to render the judgment entered, but whether it had jurisdiction to enter any judgment at all." State ex rel. Morse v. Burckhardt, 87 Mo., loc. cit. 538.

"The purpose of the writ is to prevent the inferior tribunal from assuming a jurisdiction with which it is not legally vested. If the lower court has jurisdiction to determine the question before it, prohibition will not lie." State ex rel. Dawson v. St. Louis Court of Appeals, 99 Mo., loc. cit. 221, 12 S. W. 662.

"The question for decision is whether this court can properly and lawfully prohibit the circuit court from further taking cognizance of the application made to it by the plaintiff in said injunction case. This depends upon whether that court was entirely wanting in jurisdiction to grant said injunction on the showing made in the petition, or whether, granting it had jurisdiction in that class of cases, it has not exceeded its jurisdiction." State ex rel. Kenamore v. Wood, 155 Mo., loc. cit. 445, 48 L.R.A. 596, 56 S. W. 476.

"The jurisdiction of the police court to try cases for violation of municipal police regulations, leveled at disorderly conduct and drunkenness on the streets, is exclusive. Its procedure in the exercise of its jurisdiction may or may not be erroneous, but so long as it has jurisdiction, and acts within its jurisdiction, its rulings and proceedings cannot be reviewed or corrected by means of a writ of prohibition, no matter how erroneous such rulings and proceedings may be. Mere error or irregularity or mistake, be it ever so manifest, which does not amount to an excess of jurisdiction, will not be ground for a prohibition." Delaney v. Police Court, 167 Mo., loc. cit. 679, 67 S. W. 592.

lenkamp, 133 Mo. 134, 34 S. W. 468; Wand v. Ryan, 166 Mo. 646, 65 S. W. 1025; Schubach v. McDonald, 179 Mo. 163, 65 L.R.A. 136, 101 Am. St. Rep. 452, 78 S. W. 1020; and State ex rel. McNamee v. Stobie, 194 Mo. 14, 92 S. W. 191.

Upon the foregoing authorities it may be safely asserted as settled law, and without exception, that unless the court sought to be prohibited is wanting in jurisdiction over the class of cases to which the pending case belongs, or is attempting to act in excess of its jurisdiction in a case of which it rightfully has cognizance, the writ will be denied.

It is contended by relator that the information fails to state a cause of action, and therefore that the court is without jurisdiction, and the writ should be issued for that reason, especially in view of the number of informations pending and about to be filed. This position is clearly untenable, and no authority is cited in its support. If the lower court has jurisdiction of the class of cases to which the said prosecutions belong, then there can be no doubt of its jurisdiction to determine the sufficiency of the information, leaving the losing party the right to have such judgment reviewed on appeal. It stands admitted in this record that the police court has exclusive jurisdiction of all cases for the violation of city ordinances, and that the prosecutions complained of are for the alleged violations of said ordinances. It follows that said court must have the right to determine whether the informations coming before it charge or fail to charge a violation of said ordinances, and the writ of prohibition "cannot rightly be employed to compel a judicial officer, having full jurisdiction over the parties and a cause, to steer his official course by the judgment of some other judge, or to substitute the opinion of another court for his own in dealing with topics committed by the law to his decision."

"Where jurisdiction over the parties and the subject of the cause is (as in this instance) clear, any error of the trial court in ruling on the sufficiency of the pleading forming the basis of the suit cannot be corrected by resort to a writ of prohibition." State ex rel. Hofmann v. Scarritt, 128 Mo., loc. cit. 338, 340, 30 S. W. 1028.

In State ex rel. McNamee v. Stobie, 194 Mo., loc. cit. 52, 92 S. W. 199, this court said: "That if the court has jurisdiction of the class of cases to which the proceeding sought to be prohibited belongs, and acquires jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the mere fact of defects in the petition or complaint by which the proceeding was inaugurated will not authorize the issuance of a writ of prohibition." And see State ex rel. Union Depot R. Co. v. Southern R. Co. 100 Mo., loc. cit. 61, 13 S. W. 398; Schubach v. McDonald, 179 Mo., loc. cit. 182, 65 L.R.A. 136, 101 Am. St. Rep. 452, 78 S. W. 1020; High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 767a; State ex rel. Kansas City v. Lucas, 236 Mo. 18, 139 S. W. 348.

Relator states in its brief: "An example of the third ground of prohibition is when a court permits multitudinous and innumerable prosecutions to be urged for purposes of coercion and embarrassment, as in State ex rel. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Assn. v. Eby, 170 Mo., loc. cit. 526, 71 S. W. 62, wherein the court said: 'It has, however, been urged by counsel for respondent, that inasmuch as relators have a remedy by appeal, etc., in consequence of this, prohibition cannot be granted. But this is an erroneous view, because in a case like this, where relators, if they could not have the relief prayed, would be compelled to go to trial in 1,203 cases; then, if defeated, would have to give bond in each case, take an appeal in each case, pay for transcript fee in each case, pay docket fee in each case of $10, such fees amounting in the aggregate to $12,039, as well as counsel fees in each court. Consequently, it must be conspicuously obvious that such appeals would be, although available, "inadequate to meet the emergencies of the case, or to afford the redress to which the injured party is entitled." 2 Spelling, Inj. & Extr. Rem. 2d ed. § 1725, and cases cited.'

Relator has misinterpreted the language quoted from the Eby Case. It is apparent that the court was not there dealing with the question as to the grounds upon which the writ should be issued, but the question whether (one of the necessary grounds existing) the court should deny the writ for the reason that the relator had an adequate remedy by appeal. In the preceding part of the opinion the court had held that the law upon which the prosecution in the trial court was based was unconstitutional and had been repealed, and the court (170 Mo., loc. cit. 522) said: "Under the foregoing authorities, does this record present on its face the posture of there being an absolute want of jurisdiction in the lower court to try the 1,203 informations filed against relators in the Pike circuit court? That it does, we entertain no doubt." And again (170 Mo., loc. cit. 526): "Of course, if the law is unconstitutional which is made the basis of the proceedings, the case is one where it is obvious on the face of such proceedings that the trial court has no jurisdiction, and prohibition will consequently lie."

Respondents in that case had urged that, even if the trial court was without jurisdiction, the writ should not be granted, for the reason that the trial court had power to pass upon the question of its own jurisdiction; that that was a proper matter of defense, and there was, an adequate remedy by appeal. Responding to that contention, in the language quoted by the relator, this court held that the remedy by appeal was not adequate, and that, as the trial court was without jurisdiction, the facts of the case warranted the issuance of the writ. In so holding this court was within the general law, as shown by the foregoing authorities, and as applied to the facts of the case before it.

The case of State ex rel. Merriam v. Ross, 122 Mo. 435, 23 L.R.A. 534, 25 S. W. 947, is also cited and relied upon to sustain the contention that the writ may properly be granted when want of jurisdiction or excess of jurisdiction is not shown as a basis therefor. In the Ross Case it was held that when a circuit court had acquired jurisdiction and appointed a receiver in a proceeding pending therein, another court of concurrent jurisdiction would be prohibited by this court from entertaining jurisdiction in a suit subsequently brought for the same purpose. A construction has been placed upon that case as holding that, since the court in which the second proceeding was instituted had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, it follows that this court countenanced the issuance of the writ where neither want nor excess of jurisdiction was shown in the court prohibited. An examination of the decision in that case will disclose that this court based its action in issuing the writ upon the ground of want of jurisdiction in the lower court, for, as stated in the syllabus, "where, in the foregoing action, a receiver has been appointed, the petitioner is entitled to a writ of prohibition against interference by another court and by its receiver appointed without jurisdiction." But the exclusive character of the jurisdiction of the court in which the receivership action is first brought, and which also shows the ground upon which the writ was issued in the Ross Case, supra, has been clearly stated in a recent decision of this court. In the case of State ex rel. Sullivan v. Reynolds, 209 Mo. loc. cit. 182, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 963, 123 Am. St. Rep. 468, 107 S. W. 493, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 198, Woodson, J., voicing the unanimous opinion of this court said: "Whenever the jurisdiction of a court of competent authority takes jurisdiction of a case, that fact must of necessity and in the very nature of things exclude the jurisdiction of all other courts 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) over the same case, as well as all the incidents thereto, excepting only such courts as are given appellate and supervising control over them. The reason for this rule seems to be that when such a court takes jurisdiction of a particular case, with all the incidents thereto, there remains nothing of it to which the jurisdiction of another court can attach,—no case, no parties, no subject-matter is left exposed to the authority of the latter court."

In the case before us it appears from the admitted facts that the respondent Tracy, as judge of the police court, possessed not only jurisdiction, but exclusive jurisdiction, of the prosecutions pending and threatened against relator in that court. There is no fact alleged tending to show the exercise or threatened exercise of jurisdiction in excess of his judicial power and authority, or that he has assumed or is about to assume any power other than that conferred upon him by the charter of the city and required of him by his oath of office. While so acting in the line of his duty and within the scope of his judicial power, as prescribed by the charter, it cannot be maintained, in the light of the authorities heretofore cited, that he should be restrained and prohibited by the extraordinary writ of prohibition, which issues only to prevent the usurpation of judicial power. The prosecutions complained of by relator may be vexatious because of their multiplicity, but it is not alleged that respondent, as judge of said police court, is in any manner responsible for the number of cases so instituted by the prosecuting officers of the city, or that he has any authority to prevent the filing of such cases. If the police court was possessed of jurisdiction to hear and determine one of said prosecutions against relator, it could not be guilty of an abuse of judicial power or excess of jurisdiction solely because it entertained jurisdiction of a larger number. And it does not appear what respondent, as such judge, could have done in the premises, other than what he has done, to have avoided being visited by the extraordinary writ of this court.

In the earlier part of this opinion it is suggested that if relator is entitled to relief against the respondent, as judge of the police court, it must be because he has taken, or is about to take, some action which would be in violation of relator's rights. And the wrong which would warrant the issuance of this writ can be only such a wrong or fault as amounts to usurpation of judicial power. In the case of State ex rel. McNamee v. Stobie, 194 Mo. 14, loc. cit. 62, 92 S. W. 203, it was contended that the prosecution pending before the justice of the peace against whom the writ was asked was instituted in bad faith by the prosecuting witness, and that the writ should be issued to prohibit the respondent justice of the peace from entertaining further jurisdiction in the cause. Answering that contention, this court (l. c. 62) said: "It is immaterial, so far as conferring jurisdiction upon the justice, what the objects and purposes of the prosecution were. William Mathews was the complainant in said cause before the justice, and filed the charge against the relators, and must be treated, so far as the disclosure of the petition are concerned, as the prosecuting witness; hence the allegations upon which this contention is predicated are directed solely to the respondent Mathews. He made the charge, and the petition avers the improper object and purpose in making it. The said allegations apply to the prosecution of the charge, and Mathews is the complainant and prosecuting witness; hence these allegations are exclusively directed to Mathews. There is an entire absence of any charge in the petition that the justice of the peace acquired and assumed jurisdiction of said cause for the objects and purposes attributed to Mathews in making the charge, and in his prosecution of it, or that the justice had any knowledge of such objects and purposes. The objects and purposes of Mathews or anyone else, in making a charge and prosecuting it against relators for the commission of a misdemeanor, absolutely have nothing to do with the jurisdiction acquired by the justice, and can in no way affect such jurisdiction. Even though the justice entertained the purposes attributed to Mathews, while it would be reprehensible in him as an officer, and would furnish a sufficient reason to the relators to invoke the aid of the provisions of the statute providing for changes of venue, it does not go to the jurisdiction of the justice, and furnish a basis for the issuance of the writ of prohibition."

After a full and careful consideration of this cause, we are convinced that this court would not be warranted in issuing its extraordinary writ of prohibition against the respondents, and we hold that the preliminary rule should be quashed and the writ denied. It is so ordered.

All concur, except Graves and Lamm, JJ., who dissent.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

DAVID H. HARDING

v.

BOARD OF EQUALIZATION OF DOUGLAS COUNTY.

C. E. FIELDS, Intervener, Appt.

(90 Neb. 232, 133 N. W. 191.)

Tax — liquor license.

The privilege granted a licensee to sell in Headnote by Root, J.

Note. — Privilege or license to sell intoxicating liquors as subject of taxation.

In HARDING v. BOARD OF EQUALIZATION, it was held that the privilege granted a licensee to sell liquors was not subject to assessment for taxation, on the ground that the licensee did not become vested with any property right within the meaning of the constitutional provision that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

The question of whether the privilege or license to sell intoxicating liquors is a subject of taxation appears to have been previously passed upon but twice, and these cases reached the conclusion that a license was property and therefore subject to taxation.

Thus, in Coulson v. Harris, 43 Miss. 728, a tax on a license to sell spirituous liquors was held valid on the ground that the license was a franchise, and a franchise was property and therefore subject to taxation. The court said: "The first of these grounds of objection raises the question whether the license granted to the appellant to retail vinous and spirituous liquors is property. The license is a franchise, and a franchise is recognized by the best authority as property, and is therefore the subject of taxation. Armington v. Barnett, 15 Vt. 745, 40 Am. Dec. 705. There are many persons who pay for license to pursue a certain business, the income of which is taxed. Such is the case with the keepers of inns and taverns, hawkers and peddlers, and others, who pay for license to follow their respective occupations, and afterward pay a tax upon the gross receipts of their business or income, or upon the gross amount of their sales, and no good reason can be assigned why the retail dealer in vinous and spirituous liquors should be exempt from the operation of such laws. The difficulty of ascertaining with any degree of certainty the extent of his business, no doubt, induced the legislature to tax the licensee instead of the gross amount of his sales under it. The principle, however, is the same, whether the tax be on the license or on the proceeds of the business done under its authority."

And this case was followed in Drysdale v. Pradat, 45 Miss. 445, where a tax on liquor licenses was also upheld on the ground that licenses were property.

toxicating liquors is not subject to assessment for taxation under the provisions of chapter 77 of the Compiled Statutes of 1911, which in substance provide for ad valorem taxation.

(November 14, 1911.)

APPEAL by intervener from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County sustaining the order and finding of the board of equalization that plaintiff's liquor license is not subject to taxation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James B. Kelkenney, for appellant:

A license to sell malt, spirituous, and vinous liquors is subject to taxation.

Coulson v. Harris, 43 Miss. 728; Drysdale v. Pradat, 45 Miss. 445; 2 Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. 1093.

Messrs. Thomas F. Lee and Benjamin S. Baker, for appellee Harding:

A license to sell malt, spirituous, and vinous liquors is not a thing of property, and is not subject to taxation.

Martin v. State, 23 Neb. 371, 36 N. W. 554; Dinuzzo v. State, 85 Neb. 351, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 417, 123 N. W. 309.

Mr. J. P. English for appellee Board of Equalization.

Root, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

But one question is presented in this case, and that is whether a privilege granted by a license to sell intoxicating liquors is subject to ad valorem taxation. The district court held that it is not. Such licenses are but mere temporary permits to the licensee to do that which without it would be unlawful. The licensee does not thereby become vested with any property right, within the meaning of § 3, art. 1, of the Constitution, which provides: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Pleuler v. State, 11 Neb. 547, 10 N. W. 481; Martin v. State, 23 Neb. 371, 36 N. W. 554; Dinuzzo v. State, 85 Neb. 351, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 417, 123 N. W. 309. The privilege is purely personal; it may not be transferred by the act of the licensee or by operation of law; it may be canceled by a repeal of the statute authorizing the granting of licenses, or by an amendment thereto requiring the payment of a greater sum than formerly; and it may be summarily revoked for any cause provided by statute or by the ordinance under which it was used.

In San Francisco v. Anderson, 103 Cal. 69, 42 Am. St. Rep. 98, 36 Pac. 1034, it was held that the right to a seat in a voluntary association, known as the "Stock Ex-37 L.R.A. (N.S.) change," does not contain such elements of property as to be subject to taxation. To the same effect is Baltimore v. Johnson, 96 Md. 737, 61 L.R.A. 568, 54 Atl. 646. The reasons underlying the district court's decision that the privilege granted by the license is not taxable by valuation are stronger than those sustaining the last-cited cases. There is no statute specifically authorizing the levy of a tax by value in addition to the payment of the license money, and we are of opinion that no such right exists.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

DAYTON COAL & IRON COMPANY, Limited, Plff. in Err.,
v.

J. B. DODD, Admr., etc., of Elijah Huff, Deceased.

Court — recital of jurisdiction — collateral attack.

1. Lack of jurisdiction does not appear on the face of an order appointing an administrator, by a court of general jurisdiction over the appointment, so as to render it subject to collateral attack, by a recital that the court "was opened and held" on a certain day, whereas the statute required the regular term to begin on the preceding day, the court to sit from day to day so long as business should require, since it will be assumed that the court regularly convened on the day required by statute, and that the recital in the order referred merely to the opening of the court for the transaction of business on the day when it was entered.

Master and servant — relation of employee being transported to work.

2. Employees in a mine who are gratuitously carried by the mine owner between their homes and place of work on a railroad which he operates as a private road to transport coal and supplies between the mine, his manufacturing establishment, and

Note.—The question whether an employee of a railroad or street railway is to be regarded as a passenger while being carried to or from work is treated in notes to Texas & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 31 L.R.A. 321, and Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Sawyer, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 717; and the question as to relationship of master and servant where the servant goes on the master's premises before, after, or between hours of actual labor, in the notes to *Taylor v. shipping terminals, are, while so in process of transportation, employees, and not passengers; and the employer is therefore not liable for their injury through the negligence of other employees in failing to set derailing devices, and in putting standing cars in motion so that they run down an incline and collide with the miners' train.

Same — safety devices — failure to instruct as to use — liability.

3. A mine owner who gratuitously transports by train employees between their homes and place of work may be liable for injury to them through collision of the train with runaway cars, where a derailing device is necessary, and has been provided to prevent such accidents, but superior officers of the plant have failed to instruct employees as to the use of the device, and to exercise proper supervision over them with respect to such use.

Same — advanced devices — failure to use — negligence.

4. That a derailing switch installed on a private railroad to a mine is in advance of operations as usually conducted in such plants does not, as matter of law, relieve the owner from liability for failure to keep it in use, if experience has shown him the necessity for it.

Same — transporting employees on railroad — measure of care.

5. One operating a private railroad on which his employees are permitted to ride gratuitously between their homes and work must exercise for their safety the measure of care which a prudent, cautious man experienced in the business of managing and running railroads, and accustomed to the use of trains under similar circumstances, in the exercise of care and skill, would use.

Knappen, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ of error is brought in this case to review a judgment in favor of defendant in error for personal injuries to plaintiff's intestate, resulting in death. The prominent facts are these:

The plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant) was at the time of the accident engaged in operating a furnace at Dayton, Tennessee, for the manufacture of pig iron, purchasing ore used for that purpose, also maintaining coal mines and coke ovens about 3 miles from Dayton, together with a small railroad system consisting of a line from the Dayton yards to the coal mines, and another, about 2 miles long, from the Dayton yards to the river, and connecting with traffic thereon. There was also connection at Dayton with the tracks of the Cincinnati Southern Railway. The operating of the furnaces (which was the principal business), the railroad, the mines, and coke ovens (coke being required in the manufacture of pig iron) constituted one business, over which there was a general superintendent, there being also a yard master or foreman of the railroad department. The train running between Dayton and the mines was manned by a locomotive engineer, a fireman, a head brakeman, and an assistant brakeman, there being no conductor. The business of this railroad was largely the hauling of coal and coke from the mines to Dayton, and the hauling of empty coal and coke cars, as well as supplies of various kinds, from Dayton to the mines and ovens. Day and night train shifts were maintained. The first train, which left Dayton at 6 o'clock in the morning and was the first run of the day shift, was called the "miners' train." It consisted largely of empty coal and coke cars to be filled at the mines and ovens, and in which coal and coke cars the miners rode to the mines, supplies being sometimes carried in the train. The company had houses at Dayton, Morgantown, and elsewhere along the railroad, which it rented to its employees. Some of the latter, including deceased, did not rent company houses. The greater part of the miners lived at Dayton and at Morgantown, the latter being a mile or less from the mines. The miners were allowed to ride on this train free, and most of them did so ride, the wages being the same whether they rode or not. They were not, however, required to ride.

The whistle was blown at Dayton as a notice to the miners that the train was about to start. Those living at Morgantown took the train at a certain customary meeting point. At about 4:30 in the afternoon, after the last blast, the miners took the train at Hanging Rock for the return home; that run being the last made by the day shift, and this return train consisting largely, but not always exclusively, of empty coal and coke cars. The miners had nothing to do with either the operation of the morning or the evening train, their actual work having ended when the last blast was fired. The railroad was entirely a private road, and did no commercial business whatever. It carried no passengers, unless the miners are to be regarded such. No passenger cars were carried. From a point at or near Hanging Rock on the main track (where the miners left the train), a spur or tail track, about 300 feet in length, extended to the coal tippie. This tail track had been extended several months before the accident, and in connection therewith a derailing switch put in, in order to throw off the track any run-away car which might escape from the vicinity of the tippie, and thus prevent the car running upon the main track. Until a few weeks before the accident in question it had been customary to operate the derailing switch in connection with trains passing over it. A few weeks before the accident, however, a new head brakeman was installed. He was not instructed to use the derailing switch, and did not make a practice of doing so during his employment, which covered the time of the accident to the deceased. On the evening in question the train brought in from Dayton two cars (one fully, the other partly, loaded) which it left at the coal tippie, in connection with a third car standing thereat. On leaving these cars the train passed over the tail track and onto the main track; the derailing switch not having been set after the passage of the train. The miners (between 200 and 400) boarded the train at Hanging Rock. A few minutes after the train left, the stable boss at the mines, who was also engaged that day in loading coal cars, in company with another employee, pinched two of the cars at the tippie apart from the third, in order to make room for the passage of the mules between the mines and the stables, with the result that the two cars referred to became unmanageable and ran away down the incline of the tail track and upon the main track, overtaking and colliding with the miners' train, killing the plaintiff's intestate and several others. Had the derailing switch been set, the accident could not have happened. The plaintiff relied upon several grounds of negligence, not necessary to be here stated, in addition to those submitted to the jury. Upon the trial the defendant contended that the relation between defendant and deceased was that of master and servant. The plaintiff contended that the defendant's relation was that of a carrier of passengers. The trial court held that the defendant was, as concerned the deceased, not a common carrier of passengers, but a private carrier, bound only to "exercise such a degree of care and skill in the management and running of its train as a prudent, cautious man, experienced in the business, would be expected to use under the circumstances, that is to say, in reference to the means of transportation employed and the character of the train being operated." The court submitted to the jury three alleged grounds of negligence: First, the failure of the defendant's superior officers or agents to "instruct the brakeman in reference to the use or operation of the derailing switch; that is, the alleged failure to see that the use of that derailing switch was kept up by the train crew." Second, the alleged negligence of the head brakeman in failing to set the derailing switch. And, third, the alleged negligence of the employees in so handling the cars at the tipples as to permit them to run away and collide with the miners' train. At the close of the testimony the defendant moved for peremptory instruction, which was denied.

1. A preliminary question arises over the authority of the administrator appointed by the county court of Rhea county, Tennessee. Section 6023 of Shannon's Code of Tennessee provides that "the county court, to be held by the county judge, shall have its regular sessions on the first Monday of each month."

The order appointing the administrator was made on July 2, 1907. The caption of the order of appointment is as follows: "Be it remembered that a quorum court was opened and held for Rhea county, at the courthouse in the city of Dayton, Tennessee, on the 2d day of July, 1907, . . . when the following business was had and entered of record."

It seems to be conceded that the 2d of July, 1907, was Tuesday, and it is urged that the order thus shows upon its face a lack of jurisdiction. The section of the Code above quoted contains, however, this provision: "And the court shall sit from day to day so long as the business thereof may require."

The county court being one of general jurisdiction over the appointment of administrators, all possible intendments will be made in support of the order of appointment, and only jurisdictional defects appearing on the face of the record can be attacked collaterally. Brien v. Hart, 6 Humph. 131; State v. Anderson, 16 Lea, 321; Curtis v. Charlevoix County, 154 Mich. 646, 656, 118 N. W. 618.

To exclude an intendment that the regular session was opened on Monday, July 1st, and continued on Tuesday, July 2d, as the statute permits, it is necessary to construe the language "a quorum court was opened and held" as if it read "a regular session of the quorum court was begun and opened;" for only thus would the lack of jurisdiction appear upon the face of the record. It is clear, to our minds, that the language of the order should not be so construed, and that lack of jurisdiction does not appear upon the face of the order.

2. The fundamental question presented is whether the relation of the deceased to the defendant while on the train in question was that of a passenger or servant. This question gains special importance from the fact that two of the grounds of liability submitted to the jury relate to negligence of employees of defendant who, it is insisted, were fellow servants of the deceased; it being the settled rule in the Federal courts that an employer is not liable for an injury to an employee occasioned by the negligence of another employee engaged in the same general undertaking, and that it is not necessary to the application of this rule that the employees should be engaged in the same operation or particular work; it being sufficient if the two are in the employment of the same master and engaged in the same common enterprise, both performing duties tending to accomplish the same general purpose, although they may be in different departments. Quebec S. S. Co. v. Merchant, 133 U. S. 375, 33 L. ed. 656, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397; Northern P. R. Co. v. Hambly, 154 U. S. 349, 38 L. ed. 1009, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 983; New England R. Co. v. Conroy, 175 U. S. 323, 44 L. ed. 181, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stuber (sixth circuit) 54 L.R.A. 696, 48 C. C. A. 149, 108 Fed. 934, 938; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hart (sixth circuit) — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 100 C. C. A. 49, 176 Fed. 245, 247. That defendant was not a commercial carrier, or a carrier of passengers for hire, is clear, and the circuit court was right in so holding. E. E. Taenzer & Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 95 C. C. A. 436, 170 Fed. 240; Dayton v. Dayton Coal & I. Co. 99 Tenn. 578, 42 S. W. 444. The specific question is whether the defendant's relation to deceased was that of a private carrier, or whether the riding of the deceased on the train in question from the mine to his home was an incident of the employment, to the extent that the relation of employer and employee continued during such carriage.

The general rule is, in our opinion, settled by the weight of authority, that employees, while being carried as part of their contract of service to and from their place of work, are fellow servants, and not passengers. This is the general rule even as to railway employees, and the application of this rule does not necessarily fail from the mere fact that the carriage is had after the day's work has ceased. Nor is it necessary that the agreement for such carriage be expressed. It is sufficient if it be an implied term of the contract of employment, or contemplated thereby as an incident thereof and a privilege connected therewith, for the sole purpose of facilitating the work of the employer and the employee. Nor is the mere fact that it is not necessary that the employee ride upon the train controlling of his status as employee. This rule is supported by a long line of authorities, including the following: Gillshannon v. Stony Brook R. Corp. 10 Cush. 228; Seaver v. Boston & M. R. Co. 14 Gray, 466; Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp. 10 Allen, 233, 87 Am. Dec. 635; McGuirk v. Shattuck, 160 Mass. 45, 39 Am. St. Rep. 454, 35 N. E. 110; Kilduff v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 195 Mass. 307, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 873, 81 N. E. 191; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Salmon, 11 Kan. 83; Bowles v. Indiana R. Co. 27 Ind. App. 672, 87 Am. St. Rep. 279, 62 N. E. 94; Ionnone v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 21 R. I. 452, 46 L.R.A. 730, 79 Am. Co.* 122 N. C. 852, 29 S. E. 100; Roland v. Tift, 131 Ga. 683, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 354, 63 S. E. 133; Tunney v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 291, 12 Jur. N. S. 691; Cremins v. Guest [1908] 1 K. B. 469, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 326, 98 L. T. N. S. 335, 24 Times L. R. 189; Gane v. Norton Hill Colliery Co. [1909] 2 K. B. 539, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 921, 100 L. T. N. S. 979, 25 Times L. R. 640; Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Sawyer, 156 Ala. 199, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 717, 47 So. 67.

In Gillshannon v. Stony Brook R. Corp. a common laborer on a railroad, while riding on a gravel train to his place of labor, was injured by a collision. It was held that the relation of master and servant existed between the plaintiff and the railroad company; the court saying: "If the plaintiff was by the contract of service to be carried by the defendants to the place for his labor, then the injury was received while engaged in the service for which he was employed. . . . If it be not properly inferable from evidence that the contract between the parties actually embraced this transportation to the place of labor, it leaves the case to stand as a permissive privilege granted to the plaintiff, of which he availed himself, to facilitate his labors and service, and is equally connected with it, and the relation of master and servant, and therefore furnishes no ground for maintaining this action."

In Seaver v. Boston & M. R. Co. a carpenter employed by the day by a railroad corporation to work on the line of its road, and carried on its cars to the place of such work without any fare, was held not entitled to maintain an action against the corporation for injuries occasioned to him while being so carried, by the negligence of those managing the train or charged with the duty of keeping in repair the equipment of the train.

railroad company was held not responsible to a person employed by it to repair its cars, for a personal injury arising from the negligence of a switchman upon a track over which he is carried by the company free of charge, between his home and the place of his work, Justice Gray, speaking of the Gillshannon and Seaver Cases, said: "In each of those two, as in this, the plaintiff's work did not begin until his arrival at his destination; and in this, as in those, the work was upon the structures, means, or instruments with which the defendants were to carry on their business of common carriers, the workman paid nothing for his passage, and the object of the defendants in carrying him was to get him to his place of work."

In McGuirk v. Shattuck, a woman who was employed by a person as a laundress, and who was being conveyed either gratuitously or as a part of a contract of employment, from her home to that of her employer in his wagon, was held to be in the service of the employer.

In Kilduff v. Boston Elev. R. Co. a workman employed by a street railway company as a laborer in the construction of a new line of track, was killed while being transported with other workmen back from the place of work after his day's work was finished. Mr. Justice Morton said: "Although at the time of the accident the plaintiff's intestate had finished his work for the day, and was under no obligation to do any more work for the defendant on that day, it seems to us plain that he was being transported by the defendant as an incident of his employment, and that the relation between him and the defendant was therefore that of master and servant, and not that of carrier and passenger. The car was a special car in which only the laborers who were working on that particular job were allowed to ride, and was furnished for the mutual accommodation of the company and the laborers, and the plaintiff's intestate paid no fare. The portion of the track where the accident occurred was not open to the public, and transportation over that and the rest of the route was plainly furnished by the defendant to the deceased as a laborer in its employment, and not as a passenger. It cannot reasonably be referred to any other relation."

In Ionnone v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. where an employee of the defendant railroad company, upon the completion of his work, was invited to ride in the defendant's car to a point near his home, the carriage being gratuitous, it was said: "The carrying of the deceased after his day's work was done, to a point near his home, is, we think, to be regarded not as creating the relation of a passenger, but rather as a privilege incidental to his contract of service, granted to him by the defendant, of which he availed himself to facilitate his return to his home, and that it was a privilege accorded to him merely by reason of his contract of service."

In Bowles v. Indiana R. Co. it is said: "The general rule may be said to be that, where an employee is being carried by his employer in the conveyance of the latter to and from the work for which the former is employed, he is regarded not as a passenger, but as an employee; though if he is being carried merely for his own convenience, pleasure, or business, he is a passenger."

In Kansas, P. R. Co. v. Salmon, the rule of master and servant was applied to the case of a person in the employ of the railroad company riding from his home to his employment in the caboose car attached to a freight train, without paying fare, according to the custom and understanding of the parties, from which cars and trains all persons except the employees of the company were excluded.

In Wright v. Northampton & H. R. Co., the rule was applied to the case of a section master who, after his day's work, rode on a train to his lodging place without paying or being expected to pay his fare. In all or nearly all of the cases we have thus far cited, one or more of the Massachusetts cases referred to are cited with approval.

In Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Sawyer, it was held that a section hand, injured while riding back and forth to work on a car, without charge, pursuant to a rule of the company, is not a passenger, but is in the exercise of a mere privilege connected with his employment.

In Tunney v. Midland R. Co., the rule was applied to the case of a laborer employed by a railway company to assist in loading a "pickup train" with materials left by plate layers and others upon the line; one of the terms of his employment being that he should be carried from his home to the place at which his work for the day was to be done by the train, and to be brought back to his home at the end of each day.

Cremins v. Guest and Gane v. Norton Hill Colliery Co. involved awards under the workmen's compensation act, and in both the question whether plaintiff was in the course of his employment was involved. The Cremins Case turned upon an implied agreement with the colliery company that he should have the right to travel between his home and the colliery free of charge. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the Gane Case, among the acts enumerated as within the contract of employment, was "taking a train, which he (the collier) is entitled to use by virtue of his contract of service."

The Supreme Court of the United States has not passed upon the specific question involved here, although some of its decisions have more or less bearing thereon.

In Martin v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 166 U. S. 399, 41 L. ed. 1051, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 603, the fellow-servant rule was applied to the case of a common laborer who was injured by being run into by a train while on a hand car on the road proceeding to his place of work.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Bourman, 212 U. S. 536, 53 L. ed. 641, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 319, the fellow-servant rule was applied to a section hand who, after being engaged in clearing up a wreck, was taken aboard an express train to be conveyed to the station at which he lived, and being injured while on the train by the alleged negligence of the engineer of the train and his own foreman.

In 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1578a, it is said: "As to whether an employee riding on a train is a passenger, there is some conflict; but the rule seems to be that if he is being carried to and from his working place, he is not a passenger, but if he is carried for his own convenience or business, he is a passenger." See also Labatt, Mast. & S. § 624.

Several cases are cited in support of the contention that the deceased occupied the relation of passenger. All but one of these cases are distinguishable in their facts from the case presented here, and nearly all are reconcilable with the authorities we have cited. For example: In Whitney v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (first circuit) 50 L.R.A. 615, 43 C. C. A. 19, 102 Fed. 850, in which the employee was held a passenger, it was said: "He [the employee] stipulated not only for an increase of wages, but also for free transportation to Boston from the city where he was to be employed, for his own convenience, and not in connection with going to or from his work. He was injured while on one of these trips to Boston, and while not going to and from his work, and while he was not employed; that is to say, during the hours when he was free for recreation or to visit his family, or to use his time for any purpose of his own."

The case of The New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 14 L. ed. 1019, involved the case of one accepted as a passenger under a custom to permit those whose usual employment is on board of steamboats to go from place to place free of charge.

In Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. McCue, 17 Wall. 508, 21 L. ed. 705, a man standing on a wharf was hailed by the mate of a boat to assist in loading goods upon it. After completing his work he was paid at the office on the boat. While going ashore he was injured by the negligence of the boat's employees handling the gang plank. Whether the employment ceased after payment for the service was made, and before the wharf was reached, was held a question of fact for the jury.

In Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 162 Mass. 66, 25 L.R.A. 157, 44 Am. St. Rep. 335, 37 N. E. 770, and Id., 166 Mass. 492, 33 L.R.A. 844, 55 Am. St. Rep. 417, 44 N. E. 611, the injury occurred while the employee was riding upon his own personal business, on a ticket given him as part of his compensation, under which he was at liberty to use the ticket whether going to and from his work or not.

In Dickinson v. West End Street R. Co. 177 Mass. 365, 52 L.R.A. 326, 83 Am. St. Rep. 284, 59 N. E. 60, the motorman who was held to be a passenger was traveling free at a time when he was not on actual duty, under a rule permitting such employees to ride at any time or place, and for any purpose, if in uniform.

In O'Donnell v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 59 Pa. 239, 98 Am. Dec. 336, the carpenter who was held a passenger while traveling between his home and his place of work received a less price per day than if he had paid his fare.

In McNulty v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 182 Pa. 479, 38 L.R.A. 376, 61 Am. St. Rep. 721, 38 Atl. 524, the case was said to be in its controlling features "on all fours with O'Donnell v. Allegheny Valley R. Co."

The case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scott (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Weaver) 108 Ky. 392, 50 L.R.A. 381, 56 S. W. 674, seems to have turned largely upon the proposition that the conductor accepted the deceased as a passenger.

In State use of Abell v. Western Maryland R. Co. 63 Md. 433, 445, the deceased was riding on a pass which, as said by the court, "was no part of the contract between Abell and the railroad. The contract between them was to pay a certain sum for a day's work. It was given as a mere gratuity, and as other passes are given."

plus fourteen transportation tickets good on the defendant's road was held a passenger while riding to his home upon one of the tickets, it is fairly inferable from the opinion, although not expressly stated, that the tickets were good elsewhere than between the place of work and the home, and that they were not limited to use while going to or returning from work. Nor does it affirmatively appear that the wages would be the same were the tickets not given; the court saying: "The plaintiff earned fourteen tickets as well as $8 per week, and the fact that the tickets were purchased by work, instead of cash, is unimportant."

Two cases decided by the supreme court of Tennessee are directly in conflict with what we have stated to be the general rule as to the status of an employee while being carried gratuitously to and from his working place. These cases are Chattanooga Rapid Transit Co. v. Venable, 105 Tenn. 460, 51 L.R.A. 886, 58 S. W. 861, and New Etna Coal Co. v. Bailey, recently decided and not yet reported. In the first of these cases it was held that a railroad employee having nothing to do with the operation of trains, but the performing of service at a station, who is permitted by the carrier to travel to and from the place of service on a train without payment of fare, is not a trespasser, but a passenger while on its trains. The question whether the relation of master and servant existed was not expressly raised in that case; but the court said that "the weight of authority and of sound policy, we think, is that where a servant performs all his work at a fixed place, and the master, either by custom or as a gratuity, carries him to and from his work, the servant doing no service for the master on the train, he is to be treated as a passenger."

We think, however, that the authorities do not sustain this proposition as applied to the case we are considering.

The facts in the New Etna Coal Company Case are substantially the same as those in the case before us; and were we to follow that decision we should be compelled to hold that the deceased was a passenger. The decision in the New Etna Case seems to rest largely upon two propositions: First, that an employee traveling for a purpose wholly disconnected with his employment, and while not engaged in the master's service, upon free transportation furnished him by the master in consideration of his being an employee, occupies, while so traveling, not the position of a servant, but a passenger; and, second, that there is a clear distinction between cases where the servant performs all his duties at a given place, and cases where the servant in the necessary performance of his duties, and while in the performance thereof, is transported by the master from place to place, wherever his services may be required. We think that, under the authority we have cited and the facts of this case, the carriage of the deceased cannot be said to have been wholly disconnected from his employment, but that it was, on the other hand, in a very proper sense, connected therewith, contemplated thereby, and incident thereto; and while the case of the servant who is being transported by the master from place to place, wherever his services may be required (such as section hands, employees on work trains, and those having charge of structures or operations along the line of the road), is not identical with that of one who performs all his duties at a given point, yet we think the legal distinction referred to is not recognized by the authorities generally.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stuber, 54 L.R.A. 697, 48 C. C. A. 151, 108 Fed. at page 936, Judge (now Mr. Justice) Lurton, speaking for this court, called attention to the fact that "under the decisions of the Tennessee supreme court, the liability of a railroad company to one servant who has sustained injury through the negligence of another has been made to depend upon the subordination of the one to the other, as well as upon refinements in respect to different departments of service."

We, of course, do not know to what extent, if at all, the rule so prevailing in Tennessee may have affected the decisions in the two cases we have just discussed.

There is, in our opinion, nothing in the decisions of this court in Ellsworth v. Metheney, 51 L.R.A. 389, 44 C. C. A. 484, 104 Fed. 119; Winters v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 100 C. C. A. 462, 177 Fed. 44; Dishon v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 66 C. C. A. 345, 133 Fed. 471; or Huntzicker v. Illinois C. R. Co. 64 C. C. A. 78, 129 Fed. 548, supporting the proposition that the status of the deceased in the case we are considering was that of passenger. On the contrary, there are expressions in Ellsworth v. Metheney and Huntzicker v. Illinois C. R. Co. not in harmony with such conception. For an interesting review of decisions upon the question before us, see the opinion of Judge Cochran in Dishon v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. (C. C.) 126 Fed. 194, and the reference thereto in the opinion of this court, 66 C. C. A. 345, 133 Fed. at page 477.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stuber, supra, the plaintiff was foreman of water supply on a division of the defendant's railroad; his business being to supervise the tanks and pumping machinery at the water stations and keep the same in repair, in the performance of which duties he was required to ride over the road from station to station, being furnished with a pass good on all trains. While he was riding on a detached engine to a station where his services were required, he was injured in a collision caused by the negligence of the engineer in charge of such engine. In holding that the plaintiff was not a passenger, Judge Lurton said: "His transportation to and from his [place of] work was part of his contract of service, and while being thus transported he was as much in the service of the company as when engaged in the repair or construction of a water tank or pump. He was traveling at the time under a single contract of service, and his right to be carried free to and from his work is inseparable from the contract to do the work, and no valid ground exists for saying that he paid his own fare, or was in any sense a passenger."

The facts in the Stuber Case are thus not identical with those presented here. But, following the proposition just quoted, Judge Lurton said: "The rule is now well settled that railway employees, while being carried as part of their contract of service, to and from their place of work, are fellow servants, and not passengers,"—citing with approval, among other cases, Gillshannon v. Stony Brook R. Corp. 10 Cush. 228; Seaver v. Boston & M. R. Co. 14 Gray, 466; Vick v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 267, 47 Am. Rep. 36, and Tunney v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 291, 12 Jur. N. S. 691.

The cases of Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 162 Mass. 66, 25 L.R.A. 157, 44 Am. St. Rep. 335, 37 N. E. 770, Id. 166 Mass. 492, 33 L.R.A. 844, 55 Am. St. Rep. 417, 44 N. E. 611; McNulty v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 182 Pa. 479, 38 L.R.A. 376, 61 Am. St. Rep. 721, 38 Atl. 524, and State use of Abell v. Western Maryland R. Co. 63 Md. 433, were there distinguished by Judge Lurton as "cases in which it appeared that at the time of the injury the employee was not in the service of the company, but was traveling for his own purposes, and therefore a passenger." The right to ride on the train in question was, in our opinion, an implied term of the miners' employment. Such carriage was for the benefit both of the miners and of the company, and was a privilege given for the purpose of facilitating the employment and labor thereunder. The fact that the renting of houses to miners was facilitated by the maintaining of the miners' train does not impress us as important. The houses were presumably maintained, in part, at least, to facilitate the employment of laborers. In fact, deceased did not rent from defendant, and no distinction as respects the carriage was made between those who did and those who did not so rent. Where an employee is, by contract expressed or implied, carried to and from his work in a passenger car of a common carrier, there is more or less room for argument that the contract contemplated his carriage as a passenger; but, with the exception of New Etna Coal Co. v. Bailey, we have been cited to no case in which an employee riding gratuitously to and from his work, as an incident of his employment by an employer other than a common carrier, has been held to be a passenger.

We are constrained to hold that the deceased while being transported to his home by virtue of his employment as a miner, and upon this private miners' train, was not a passenger of defendant.

It follows from this conclusion that the case was submitted to the jury upon an erroneous theory, under which recovery was permissible for the negligent acts of co-employees. This error requires a reversal of the judgment.

3. The court did not err, however, in our opinion, in refusing to direct a verdict for defendant. The first ground of negligence submitted was "the alleged failure of the defendant's superior officers or agents to instruct the brakeman in reference to the use and operation of the derailing switch, that is, the alleged failure to see that the use of that derailing switch was kept up by the train crew." This ground did not involve the negligent conduct of a fellow servant. It was predicated upon the nondelegable duty which a master owes to the servant. It is true that, with respect to the operation of its road, the defendant's duty to the deceased extended no further, with respect to the complaint under consideration, than to exercise ordinary care to provide a sufficient number of reasonably competent employees, make proper rules for their government, and exercise proper supervision over them; and if that had been done the defendant would not be liable for an injury to an employee in the operation of the road through the negligence of other employees in the operating department, or their failure to observe the rules, notwithstanding such negligence made the place unsafe to work in. Martin v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 166 U. S. 399, 41 L. ed. 1051, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 603; Pennsylvania Co. v. Fishack (sixth circuit) 59 C. C. A. 269, 123 Fed. 465; Kinnear Mfg. Co. v. Carlisle (sixth circuit) 82 C. C. A. 81, 152 Fed. 933; 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hart (sixth circuit) — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 100 C. C. A. 49, 176 Fed. 245, 251. But the negligence aimed at by the proposition we are considering is the failure of the defendant to properly instruct its operatives, and to exercise proper supervision over them. There was evidence tending to show that due care required the installation and use of the derailing switch. Its installation was suggested by the defendant's actual experience with a runaway car. The use of this derailing switch had been maintained until a few weeks previous to the accident. There was testimony that its use was discontinued by reason of the failure of defendant to instruct the new head brakeman to use the same. The general superintendent testified that he did not know that the switch was not being operated, and that, had he known, he would have issued such instructions as would have caused it to be used; also, that the accident in question is evidence that the situation required the maintaining of the derailing switch. In view of this testimony, the court would not have been justified in holding, as matter of law, that the fact that the use of such switch was in advance of operations as usually conducted in plants of this character relieved defendant of the charge of negligence. Such proposition was, at best, addressed to the consideration of the jury. Nor would the court have been justified, under the evidence, in holding that the deceased had assumed the risk arising from the nonuse of the derailing switch. He was not engaged in the operation of the road. While the evidence showed that he passed daily in sight of the switch, and while there was evidence from which the jury might have found that he knew the switch was not being regularly used, the testimony was not, in our judgment, such as to require a finding that he knew of the discontinuance of the use of the switch, and that he knew and appreciated the dangers to ensue from such disuse.

4. The jury were instructed that the measure of care owing by defendant to deceased was what "a prudent, cautious man experienced in the business of managing and running trains, and accustomed to the use of trains under similar circumstances as these, in the exercise of care and skill, would have used. . . ." The defendant presented a request the effect of which, if given, would have been to exclude from a consideration the ground of negligence relating to the alleged failure of instruction and supervision with reference to the derailing switch. The charge as given is in accordance with that approved in Shoe- maker v. Kingsbury, 12 Wall. 369, 20 L. ed. 432, as relating to the duty resting upon a private carrier. The criticism is made that the instruction imposed too high a degree of care upon the employer. We think the criticism is not well made. The deceased was not a mere licensee, as would seem, from the authorities cited, to be defendant's view.

5. Upon the subject of the assumption of risk, the jury was instructed that, if the officers and agents of the company were negligent in the discontinuance of the use of the derailing switch, then the inquiry would be "whether the deceased, Huff, knew of the discontinuance of this switch, and whether a man of ordinary intelligence should have appreciated the dangers that would result from a failure to keep up the use of the derailing switch. If you find from the weight of the proof that the deceased, Huff, knew that the use of the derailing switch was not kept up, and knew, as a man of ordinary intelligence, and appreciated, the dangers to be apprehended from the fact, . . ." such fact would be a complete defense to the allegation of negligence relating to the failure to maintain the use of the derailing switch. To this instruction the criticism is made that it is not necessary that the deceased should have actually appreciated the dangers, provided he, as a reasonable man, should have appreciated them. The instruction which we have quoted may, we think, fairly be construed as conforming to the definition contended for by defendant's counsel.

For the errors above pointed out, the judgment will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(In Banc.)

STATE OF WASHINGTON EX REL.

v.

C. W. CLAUSEN, State Auditor.

Mandamus — enforcement of statute — defense of unconstitutionality.

1. A public officer may raise the question of the constitutionality of a statute in defense of a mandamus proceeding to compel him to make expenditures of public money in accordance with its terms.

Master and servant — employees' indemnity — constitutionality of statute.

2. A statute creating an employees' indemnity fund by assessments upon employers in hazardous callings, being within the police power, is not invalid under the due process of law clauses of the Constitution, as interfering with freedom of contract, creating liability without fault, or taking the property of one employer to pay the obligations of another.

Same — class legislation.

3. That an employees' indemnity act made applicable only to hazardous occupations entitled to its benefit workmen injured when outside the line of their duties, or in a branch of the business not peculiarly hazardous, does not render the entire act invalid as class legislation, if provision is made for an elimination from the act of parts which may be found to be invalid, without affecting the remainder.

Same — application to particular class of workmen.

4. An employees' indemnity act is not invalid as class legislation because the fund collected by assessments upon certain hazardous business is to be expended in the relief of employees of such businesses, instead of being applied to the relief of workmen generally, or to the use of the state at large.

Tax — uniformity — employees' indemnity fund.

5. An assessment levied on those conducting hazardous occupations, to provide an indemnity fund for their employees, is not within a constitutional provision requiring taxes to be equal and uniform, since it is in the nature of a license tax.

Jury — employees' indemnity — administration by commission — validity.

6. A statute fixing an indemnity to be awarded employees injured in hazardous occupations, to be administered by a commission, is not invalid, as interfering with the constitutional right of trial by jury.

Statute — setting aside for expediency.

7. The court will not set aside an employees' indemnity act on the ground that it will prove unnecessarily costly and burdensome to those whose interests will be affected by it, and will lead to public and private abuses, where it was adopted by the legislature after expert advice and careful consideration of the objections urged against it.

The constitutionality of workmen's compensation legislation of various sorts has already been discussed in a note to Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, which contains a summary of the provisions 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of the Massachusetts statute of July 28th, 1911, establishing a scheme for providing, through the instrumentality of a corporation established for that purpose, and a subscription of employers thereto, for compensation to employees engaged in employments other than domestic service and farm labor, for personal injuries received by them in the course of their employment, and not due to serious and wilful misconduct; and of the opinion of the justices of the supreme court of that state, to whom the statute was submitted before its passage, affirming its constitutionality; which statute and opinion therefore need not be again reviewed in the present connection. The opinion referred to has since been reported in 209 Mass. 607, 96 N. E. 308.

In Montana, provision has been made by statute (chap. 67, Laws 1900) for the creation of a state accident insurance and total permanent disability fund to insure all workmen, laborers, and employees employed in and around any coal mines or coal washers, except office employees, superintendents, and general managers, against accidents occurring in the course of their occupations; such fund to arise from the payment to the state auditor by operators of coal mines of 1 cent per ton of coal mined and 1 per cent of the gross monthly earnings of persons entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the act, to be deducted by the employer from such earnings. The act goes on to provide that, in the event of death by accident of an employee insured thereunder who shall have come to his death in the course of his employment and by causes arising therein, the state auditor, upon being satisfied by adequate evidence of such death, shall issue his warrant in the sum of $3,000, (1) to surviving wife and child or children in equal shares; if none, then (2) to surviving parents who are dependent or partially so upon the deceased; if none, then (3) to other dependent relatives. It is further provided that a workman receiving injuries permanently incapacitating him shall receive a compensation monthly, not to exceed $1 a day for each working day, upon filing with the auditor his application therefor, together with a certificate from the county physician of the county wherein he resides, attested before a notary public, the auditor being authorized to procure medical examination or treatment when, in his judgment, he may deem it advisable. Loss of a limb or eye caused by accident to a workman in the course of his occupation is to be compensated by the payment of the sum of $1,000. Provision is also made for the investigation by the secretary of the state board of health of any claim believed to be fraudulent, upon the request of any contributor toward the insurance fund. The act further provides for the payment in lieu of monthly compensation, of a lump sum upon application by or in behalf of the workman, which in no instance shall exceed the amount specified as death indemnity. The auditor is further given plenary power to determine all disputed cases which may arise in the administration of the act, not otherwise provided for, and to define the insurance provisions thereof by regulations not inconsistent therewith, and to make all other orders and rules necessary to carry out its true intent. The act, after rendering money payable thereunder nonassignable, and exempting from execution or attachment, further provides that the acceptance of pecuniary benefit thereunder shall operate to release the person or persons, corporation, partnerships, or associations causing such injuries or death for which benefits are so claimed, who shall have paid the assessment therein provided for, and also the employer, officers, and agents thereof, from all liability and claim arising from such injuries or death, and that the commencement of a suit to recover for such injuries or death shall operate as a forfeiture of the right to benefit thereunder.

The constitutionality of this act is considered in Cunningham v. Northwestern Improv. Co. — Mont. —, 119 Pac. 554, in which it is held that as the act has a tendency to minimize indigency and to reduce the amount of personal-injury litigation in the courts, it is to be considered as a proper exercise of the police power; that, in singling out the employment of coal mining, it is not obnoxious as class legislation, all persons operating coal mines and all coal miners being therein treated alike; that the impost laid by the act upon coal operators and miners is to be considered as an employment tax upon persons operating and working coal mines; and that the fact that the act operates to the direct benefit of the injured employee or his dependents does not, of itself, render the tax one for private purposes only, but that the legislature must, in view of the considerations accompanying the enactment, be deemed to have declared by implication that the purpose for which the tax is imposed is a public one; that the right to trial by jury guaranteed by the Federal and state Constitutions is not thereby denied, since the provision of the Federal Constitution does not guarantee a trial by jury in a civil action in a state court, and since the right of trial by jury, secured by the state Constitution, refers to the trial of cases, actions, or suits at law, and has no reference to claims against an indemnity fund, such as are provided for by the act, or demands by the state auditor for occupation taxes; that the provision for the collection of an occupation tax in the summary manner provided by the act does not contravene the constitutional guaranties of due process of law, as such guaranties do not require the collection of taxes by judicial proceedings, and since the person aggrieved by an illegal tax has his remedy by injunction against its collection, or by an action at law for its recovery where paid under protest. In replying to the contention that the provision for payment to an injured employee, of his compensation in a lump sum, defeats the purpose of the act, viewed as a police regulation, by putting it within the power of the employee to dissipate and waste the money so paid, the court said that there is no presumption that the employee would render himself indigent, and that the expediency of the provision was one for legislative determination exclusively. It was further held that the act is not unconstitutional as failing to differentiate between a careful and a careless employer; that it is not objectionable as lodging judicial power in the state auditor, the act being almost, if not completely, automatic in practical working, and the auditor's powers thereunder relating to details of administration. Further discussing the objection last stated, the court said: "The fact 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that one who has a cause of action at common law may elect to take under the act, and the suggestion that as to him the auditor may be called upon to exercise judicial power, has no persuasive force when we consider that such election is altogether voluntary, and he may resort to the courts if he so desires. If the tax provided for in the act can legally be exacted from the employer, and, as is the case, the acceptance of its benefits by the claimant ipso facto operates to release the employer from liability, it is difficult to see how the latter has any further concern in the matter of distribution of the fund than to be assured, as the act provides he may be, that it is not paid out on improper or fraudulent claims. If the summary method of administration provided may not be resorted to, then one of the paramount reasons for this class of legislation must be entirely eliminated from consideration." But the act was held to be fatally defective as denying to the mine operator the equal protection of the laws, inasmuch as, after full compliance with the terms of the act, he is not exonerated from liability, but still may be sued and compelled to pay damages in a proper case, and no provision being made for reimbursement, in whole or in part, of his contributions toward the indemnity fund.

The Wisconsin act providing for the payment of compensation without litigation to an employee for injury sustained in the performance of service growing out of and incidental to his employment, and not caused by wilful misconduct, the acceptance of the benefits of the provisions of which is optional with both the employee and the employer, who, in case of his nonacceptance, is deprived of the benefit of the defenses of assumption of risk or, where he has in a common employment four or more employees, that the injury was caused in whole or in part by the negligence of a fellow servant, has been held constitutional in Borgnis v. Falk Co. 147 Wis. 327, post, 489, 133 N. W. 209, which, being reported herewith, need not here be summarized.

Messrs. Graves, Kizer, & Graves, also for defendant:

There is nothing new in the legislative attempt to impose a liability where no fault exists. But it has not met the approval of the courts.

The power of taxation can only be exercised for a public purpose, which means, for the benefit of all the citizens of the state. The true test for classification is not what occupation employers may be engaged in, but whether the work is such that employees are exposed to dangers in the course of their employments.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding in mandamus, brought by the relator to compel the state auditor to issue a warrant on the state treasurer in payment of an obligation incurred by the industrial insurance department. The application was in the form required by the statute governing the practice in such cases, and sets forth facts which, on their face, show that the applicant is entitled to the warrant demanded. The auditor demurred generally to the application, and at the hearing his counsel argued that the act purporting to authorize the expenditure for which the warrant was demanded was unconstitutional and void.

It was suggested at the argument that the question of the constitutionality of the act could not be raised by the auditor in this form of proceeding, but to do so is in accord with the practice in this state. In State ex rel. Olmstead v. Mudgett, 21 Wash. 99, 57 Pac. 351, the relator sought by mandamus to compel the county treasurer of Spokane to collect an assessment levied to pay the cost of a street improvement, and, on the demurrer of the treasurer to the application for the writ, we inquired into the constitutionality of the act authorizing the assessment to be made. To the same effect are State ex rel. Port Townsend v. Clausen, 40 Wash. 95, 82 Pac. 187, and Hindman v. Boyd, 42 Wash. 17, 84 Pac. 609. In the latter case it was acknowledged that the authorities on the question were in conflict; but it was said that the preferable rule was with the cases holding that the question could be thus raised. On principle the ruling seems to be sound. If it be true that an act of the legislature authorizing the disbursement of public money is unconstitutional, to inquire into it on the objection of an officer having in charge such disbursement may save an expenditure that would be otherwise lost to the state were the court to await the suggestion of the question by some private litigant injuriously affected by the act. There is no merit in the objection that the officer is without interest in the proceeding. He is charged with the duty of conserving the public funds, and consequently must be held to have an interest in any proceeding which directly tends to that end.

The act thought to be unconstitutional by the auditor is the act of the legislature of March 14, 1911, commonly known as the "workmen's compensation act." Laws 1911, p. 345. The act is of too great length to be set forth here in full; but the following epitome of its several provisions will give an understanding of its salient features, and of the questions involved on this hearing:

Section 1 contains a declaration of the policy of the act. It recites that the common-law system governing remedies of workmen against employers for injuries received in hazardous employments is inconsistent with modern industrial conditions; that in practice such remedies have proven economically unwise and unfair; that their administration has produced the result that little of the cost thereof to the employer has reached the workmen, and that little, only at a great expense to the public; that the remedy to the individual workman is uncertain, slow, and inadequate; that injuries in such employments formerly occasional have become frequent and inevitable; that the welfare of the state depends upon its industries, and even more upon the welfare of its wage workers. And it thereupon declares that the state of Washington, exercising its sovereign powers, withdraws all phases of the premises from private controversies and provides sure and certain relief for workmen injured in extra-hazardous work, and their families and dependents, regardless of questions of fault, to the exclusion of "every other remedy, proceeding, or compensation, except as otherwise provided in this act." It thereupon abolishes civil actions and civil causes of action for personal injuries incurred in extra-hazardous employments, and the jurisdiction of the courts thereover, except as in the act provided.

Section 2 enumerates what the legislature deems extra-hazardous employments. It is provided, however, that if there be found to be, or if there subsequently arise, any hazardous employments not enumerated, the same shall nevertheless come within the provisions of the act, and the rate or contribution to the accident fund to be exacted from such employments shall be fixed by the department therein created until the legislature itself shall have acted thereon. The enumeration includes all classes of business and employments in which machinery is employed, whether conducted by corporations or by individuals, and whether they are affected by a public interest or are purely of a private nature.

Section 3 defines certain of the words and terms used in the act. Concerning the word "workman" is the following: "Workman means every person in this state, who, after September 30, 1911, is engaged in the employment of an employer carrying on or conducting any of the industries scheduled or classified in § 4, whether by way of manual labor or otherwise, and whether upon the premises or at the time, or, he being in the course of his employment, away from the plant of his employer: Provided, however, that if the injury to a workman occurring away from the plant of his employer is due to the negligence or wrong of another not in the same employ, the injured workman, or, if death result from the injury, his widow, children, or dependents, as the case may be, shall elect whether to take under this act or seek a remedy against such other, such election to be in advance of any suit under this section; and if he take under this act, the cause of action against such other shall be assigned to the state for the benefit of the accident fund; if the other choice is made, the accident fund shall contribute only the deficiency, if any, between the amount of recovery against such third person actually collected, and the compensation provided or estimated by this act for such case. Any such cause of action assigned to the state may be prosecuted, or compromised by the department, in its discretion. Any compromise by the workman of any such suit, which would leave a deficiency to be made good out of the accident fund, may be made only with the written approval of the department. Any individual employer or any member or officer of any corporate employer who shall be carried upon the pay roll at a salary or wage not less than the average salary or wage named in such pay roll, and who shall be injured, shall be entitled to the benefit of this act as, and under the same circumstances as, and subject to the same obligations as, a workman."

Section 4 contains a schedule of contributions. It recites that, in so much as industry should bear the greater proportion of the burden of the costs of its accidents, each employer shall, prior to January 15th of each year, pay into the state treasury, in accordance with a schedule provided, a sum equal to a percentage of his total pay roll of that year. Then follows a classification of the different industries and the rate per centum each several class shall be required to pay; the amounts varying as the legislature deemed the risk of injury therefrom varied, and the greater hazard contributing the larger percentage. The fund created is termed the "accident fund," and it is provided that it shall be devoted exclusively to the purposes specified in the act. A scheme is provided for replenishing the fund in case an amount collected shall be insufficient to meet the demands upon it. It is also provided: "If a single establishment or work comprises several occupations listed in this section in different risk classes, the premium shall be computed according to the pay roll of each occupation, if clearly separable; otherwise an average rate of premium shall be charged for the entire establishment, taking into consideration the number of employees and the relative hazards. If an employer, besides employing workmen in extrahazardous employment, shall also employ workmen in employments not extrahazardous, the provisions of this act shall apply only to the extrahazardous departments and employments and the workmen employed therein. In computing the pay roll the entire compensation received by every workman employed in extrahazardous employment shall be included, whether it be in form of salary, wage, piece-work, overtime, or any allowance in the way of profit-sharing premium, or otherwise, and whether payable in money, board, or otherwise."

Section 5 contains the compensation schedule. It provides that each workman who shall be injured, whether upon the premises or at the plant, or being in the course of his employment away from the plant of his employer, or his family or dependents, in case of the death of the workman, shall receive out of the accident fund compensation in accordance with the schedule provided, and except as in the act otherwise provided such compensation shall be in lieu of any and all rights of action whatsoever against any person whomsoever. This schedule provides for monthly payments to dependents of the workman in case the injury results in death, varying according to their number and degree of relationship, and to the workman direct in case the injury results only in disability; the amount varying according to the proportion the extent of such disability bears to a fixed maximum.

Section 6 relates to intentional injuries and the status of minors engaged in hazardous employments. It is provided that, if injury or death results to a workman from the deliberate intention of the workman himself to produce such injury or death, no compensation shall be made either to the workman or his dependents out of the accident fund. If, however, the injury or death results to a workman from the deliberate intention of his employer, such workman, or in case of his death, a widow, widower, child, or dependent of the workman, shall have the privilege to take under the act, and shall also have a cause of action against the employer, as if the act had not been enacted, for any excess of damage over the amount received, if receivable under the act. A minor working at an age legally permitted under the laws of the state shall be deemed sui juris for the purposes of the act, and no other person shall have any cause of action or right to compensation for his injury.

Section 7 provides for converting the monthly payments into corresponding lump sums according to the American mortality tables. Section 8 provides penalties for defaulting employers. Section 9 relates to injuries caused by the absence of safeguards required by statute.

Section 10 exempts awards made under it from assignment, or from seizure under legal proceedings.

Section 11 provides that no employer of workmen shall exempt himself from the burden or waive the benefits of the act by any contract, agreement, rule, or regulation; and that any such contract, agreement, rule, or regulation shall be pro tanto void.

Section 12 relates to the filing of claims; § 13 to medical examinations; § 14 to the notice required of the happening of accidents; § 15 to an inspection of any employer's books. Section 16 provides a penalty for misrepresentation as to the amount of the pay roll. Section 17 relates to pub-lie contract work. Section 18 contains provisions relating to interstate and intrastate commerce, and § 19 provides that the provisions of the act may be adopted by employers and employees engaged in non-hazardous employments.

Section 20 relates to court reviews. It provides that any employer, workman, beneficiary, or person feeling aggrieved in any decision of the department created to administer the terms of the act, affecting his interest, may have the same reviewed by a proceeding for that purpose in the nature of an appeal, initiated in the superior court of the county of his residence, in so far as such decision rests upon questions of fact or of the proper application of the provisions of the act; "it being the intent that matters resting in the discretion of the department shall not be subject to review." It is provided further that the appeal shall be informal and summary. No bond shall be required, and any decision of the superior court may be referred to the supreme court for review according to existing laws applicable to other civil causes. The calling of a jury is within the discretion of the court, except that, in cases occurring under §§ 9, 15, and 16, of the act, each party shall be entitled to a trial by jury on demand.

Section 21 vests the administration of the act in a department to be known as the "Industrial Insurance Department," to consist of three commissioners to be appointed by the governor. It is provided that a decision of any question arising under the act, concurred in by two commissioners, shall be deemed the decision of the department, and each member thereof is given power to issue subpoenas requiring the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and documents.

Section 22 relates to the salary of the commissioners, and § 23 to the appointment of deputies and assistants. Section 24 further defines the duties of the commissioners in relation to the administration of the act. Section 25 relates to medical examinations, and § 26 to the manner in which funds appropriated to the use of the department shall be disbursed.

Section 27 provides: "If any employer shall be adjudicated to be outside the lawful scope of this act, the act shall not apply to him or his workman; or if any workman shall be adjudicated to be outside the lawful scope of this act because of remoteness of his work from the hazard of his employer's work, any such adjudication shall not impair the validity of this act in other respects; and in every such case an accounting in accordance with the justice of the case shall be had of moneys received. If the provisions of § 4 of this act for the creation of the accident fund, or the provisions of this act making the compensation to the workman provided in it exclusive of any other remedy on the part of the workman, shall be held invalid, the entire act shall be thereby invalidated except the provisions of § 31, and an accounting according to the justice of the case shall be had of moneys received. In other respects an adjudication of invalidity of any part of this act shall not affect the validity of the act as a whole or any other part thereof."

Section 29 appropriates out of the general fund in the state treasury the sum of $150,000, to be known as an "administration fund," out of which the salaries, traveling, and office expenses of the department shall be paid, together with all the expenses of administration of the accident fund; and out of the accident fund is appropriated $1,500,000, to be applied to the purposes for which such fund is applicable. The remaining sections relate to the administration, and define and limit the effect and operation of the act, and need no special reference to their contents.

The foregoing summary makes clear the theory and purpose of the act. It is founded on the basic principle that certain defined industries called in the act extra-hazardous should be made to bear the financial losses sustained by the workmen engaged therein through personal injuries, and its purpose is to furnish a remedy that will reach every injury sustained by a workman engaged in any such industries, and make a sure and certain award therefor, bearing a just proportion to the loss sustained, regardless of the manner in which the injury was received. With the economic questions thus suggested, the auditor's learned counsel object only to the wisdom of the scheme formulated. They concede that the evil is one calling for a remedy, and direct their arguments solely against the constitutionality of the scheme adopted. In our discussion we shall confine ourselves to the question thus suggested, noticing the economic question only incidentally.

The act is challenged as unconstitutional on four distinct grounds: (1) That it violates § 3 of article 1 of the state Constitution and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provide that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; (2) that it violates § 12 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which provides that no law shall be passed granting to any citizen, class of citizens, or corporations, other than municipal, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens or corporations; and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides for the equal protection of the laws; (3) that it violates §§ 1 and 2 of article 7 of the state Constitution, which provide that property shall be taxed according to its value in money, and that all taxation shall be equal and uniform; and (4) that it violates § 21 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which provides that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate. But, while we shall discuss the questions suggested under the several divisions as here set out, it is obvious that no very logical segregation of the argument can be thus made, as many of the reasons advanced for or against the act under one particular division are equally applicable to one or more of the others. Any different arrangement, however, seems to be at the sacrifice of clearness, and we pass therefore directly to the first objection stated.

It is with regret that we are unable to set forth at length counsel's argument on this branch of the case, as any abbreviation of it is at the expense of its cogency and force. To do so, however, would unduly lengthen this opinion. The argument is based on two fundamental ideas: The one, that the act creates a liability without fault; and, the other, that it takes the property of one employer to pay the obligations of another. It must be conceded that these contentions have a basis in fact, and that they, on first impression, constitute a persuasive argument against the validity of the act. Since there is exacted from every employer of labor engaged in one or more of the industries termed hazardous a certain fixed sum, based upon his pay roll, which is to be used to compensate employees working in such hazardous employments who receive personal injuries, regardless of the question whether the injury was because of the fault of the employer or of the negligence of the employee, it can be said that some part of the sum so collected will be paid out on injuries in which the employer is without fault; and furthermore, since every such employer is liable to make the payments whether or not any of his own workmen are injured, and since an employer is liable under the common law for an injury to his own workmen only, it can also be said that by this act one employer is held liable for the obligations of another.

But these conditions do not furnish an absolute test of the validity of the act. In the statute books of the several states are many statutes held constitutional by the courts where liability is created without fault, and where the property of one person is taken to pay the obligations of another, and this where no compensation is made to the person who is thus made liable, or whose property is thus taken, other than perhaps the bestowal upon him of some privilege. The test of the validity of such a law is not found in the inquiry: Does it do the objectionable things? But is found rather in the inquiry: Is there no reasonable ground to believe that the public safety, health, or general welfare is promoted thereby? The legislature cannot, of course, without violating this clause of the Constitution, declare a particular industry, commonly engaged in by the people, to be unlawful, which, under all circumstances, must necessarily be harmless and innocent; but it can regulate and control and prohibit any industry, however, innocent it may have been in its inception, whenever it becomes a menace to the employees engaged in it, the people surrounding it, or to any considerable number of the people at large, no matter from whatsoever cause the menace may arise. This it does under the police power,—“the power inherent in every sovereignty, . . . the power to govern men and things.” It is unnecessary to discuss the origin, nature, or extent of this power. It is sufficient to say that, by means of it, the legislature exercises a supervision over matters affecting the common weal, and enforces the observance by each individual member of society of duties which he owes to others and the community at large. The possession and enjoyment of all rights are subject to this power. Under it the state may “prescribe regulations promoting the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its welfare and prosperity.” In fine, when reduced to its ultimate and final analysis, the police power is the power to govern. It is not meant here to be asserted that this power is above the Constitution, or that everything done in the name of the police power is lawfully done. It is meant only to be asserted that a law which interferes with personal and property rights is valid only when it tends reasonably to correct some existing evil or promote some interest of the state, and is not in violation of any direct and positive mandate of the Constitution. The clause of the Constitution now under consideration was intended to prevent the arbitrary exercise of power, or undue, unjust, and capricious interference with personal rights; not to prevent those reasonable regulations that all must submit to as a condition of remaining a member of society. In other words, the test of a police regulation, when measured by this clause of the Constitution, is reasonableness, as contradistinguished from arbitrary or capricious action.

The authorities, as we view them, abundantly support the foregoing principles. Of statutes upheld by the court which can be said to create liability without fault, and take the property of one person to pay the obligations of another, the most conspicuous examples are, perhaps, §§ 4585 and 4803 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provide:

"Sec. 4585. There shall be assessed and collected by the collectors of customs at the ports of the United States, from the master or owner of every vessel of the United States arriving from a foreign port, or of every registered vessel employed in the coasting trade, and before such vessel shall be admitted to entry, the sum of forty cents per month for each and every seaman who shall have been employed on such vessel since she was last entered at any port of the United States; such sum such master or owner may collect and retain from the wages of such seamen."

"Sec. 4803. The several collectors of the customs shall respectively deposit, without abatement or reduction, the sums collected by them under the provisions of law imposing a tax upon seamen for hospital purposes, with the nearest depository of public moneys, and shall make returns of the same, with proper vouchers, monthly, to the Secretary of the Treasury, upon forms to be furnished by him. All such moneys shall be placed to the credit of 'the fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen;' of which fund separate accounts shall be kept in the Treasury. Such fund is appropriated for the expenses of the marine-hospital service, and shall be employed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the care and relief of sick and disabled seamen employed in registered, enrolled, and licensed vessels of the United States." U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3322.

This statute clearly does everything that is charged against the statute at bar. It creates liability without fault, since it obligates the master or owner of every vessel of the United States to pay into a given fund, controlled by the government, a fixed sum for the benefit of sick and disabled seamen, regardless of the fact whether or not the vessel of the master or owner making the payment has any sick or disabled seamen who take advantage of the fund; and it takes the property of the one to pay the obligations of another, since the fund is disbursed in the cure of sick and disabled American seamen generally, regardless of the fact whether or not the expense of their cure exceeds the sum paid in by the master or owner of the vessel from which they came. Whatever may be said as to the foundation of the liability of the master or the owner of a vessel, or the vessel itself, to answer for the expenses of the cure of sick and disabled seamen while in service on the ship, the foundation of this liability is purely statutory, and, if the objection that is made to the present statute were sufficient to condemn it, the statute is in violation of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The statute had its inception in the act of Congress of July 16, 1798, chap. 77, 1 Stat. at L. 606, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3321, and was on the statute books for nearly one hundred years, during which time it was continuously enforced. It is true our attention has been called to no case where the statute was directly attacked; but there are numerous cases in which it has been specifically mentioned and given force, and it would seem that, if it were thought inimical to the Constitution, it would not have escaped the attention of the astute counsel whose client's interests were adversely affected by it. Buckley v. Brown, 3 Wall. Jr. 199, Fed. Cas. No. 2,092; Reed v. Canfield, 1 Sumn. 195, Fed. Cas. No. 11,641; Peterson v. The Chandos (D. C.) 4 Fed. 645; Holt v. Cummings, 102 Pa. 212, 48 Am. Rep. 199. See also 3 Ops. Atty. Gen. 683; 13 Ops. Atty. Gen. 330.

Statutes making railroad corporations absolutely liable, without regard to negligence, for injuries to property caused by fires escaping from their locomotive engines, are clearly statutes creating liability without fault, yet these statutes have been upheld by all the courts of the states in which they have been enacted, as well as by the Supreme Court of the United States. Chapman v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 37 Me. 92; Sherman v. Maine C. R. Co. 86 Me. 422, 30 Atl. 69; Hooksett v. Concord R. Co. 38 N. H. 242; Smith v. Boston & M. R. Co. 63 N. H. 25; Lyman v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Cush. 288; Pierce v. Worcester & N. R. Co. 105 Mass. 199; Rodemacher v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 297, 20 Am. Rep. 592; Mathews v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 121 Mo. 278, 25 L.R.A. 161, 24 S. W. 591; Emerson v. Gardiner, 8 Kan. 452; Jensen v. South Dakota C. R. Co. 25 S. D. 506, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1015, 127 N. W. 650; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Mathews, 165 U. S. 1, 41 L. ed. 611, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Mathews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609. Other statutes are those providing that any landlord who knowingly leases his premises for saloon purposes shall be liable for losses resulting from intoxication caused by the sale of liquor by his lessee. Such a statute was formerly in force in this state, and was given effect by this court. Delfel v. Hanson,

2 Wash. 194, 26 Pac. 220; Burkman v. Jamieson, 25 Wash. 606, 66 Pac. 48. And in Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 500, 30 Am. Rep. 323, the constitutionality of a like statute was maintained in an opinion by Judge Andrews, renowned for its ability and learning. In the course of his opinion, the learned judge noted the fact that the liability of the landlord could not be sustained on the theory that such liability was a condition of a privilege granted by the statute, but rested the decision on the principle that the state, under its police power, could impose upon the landlord liability for the acts of his tenants. In the course of the opinion this language was used: "And the act of 1873 is not invalid because it creates a right of action and imposes a liability not known to the common law. There is no such limit to legislative power. The legislature may alter or repeal the common law. It may create new offenses, enlarge the scope of civil remedies, and fasten responsibility for injuries upon persons against whom the common law gives no remedy. We do not mean that the legislature may impose upon one man liability for an injury suffered by another, with which he had no connection. But it may change the rule of the common law, which looks only to the proximate cause of the mischief, in attaching legal responsibility, and allow a recovery to be had against those whose acts contributed, although remotely, to produce it. . . . The liability imposed upon the landlord for the acts of the tenant is not a new principle in legislation. His liability only arises when he has consented that the premises may be used as a place for the sale of liquors. He selects the tenant, and he may, without violating any constitutional provision, be made responsible for the tenant's acts connected with the use of the leased property."

Statutes imposing a liability upon fire insurance agents, based upon the amount of the insurance effected by them, for the benefit of a fund to care for and cure sick and injured firemen, have been upheld in the states of New York and Illinois. Fire Dept. v. Noble, 3 E. D. Smith, 440; Fire Dept. v. Wright, 3 E. D. Smith, 453; Exempt Fireman's Benev. Fund v. Roome, 29 Hun, 391, 394; Firemen's Benev. Assn. v. Lounsbury, 21 Ill. 511, 74 Am. Dec. 115. Clearly these are statutes creating liability without fault. A similar statute relating to agents of foreign fire insurance companies was upheld in Wisconsin. Fire Dept. v. Helfenstein, 16 Wis. 136.

The statute of Nebraska makes a railroad company liable in damages for injuries sustained by a passenger, regardless of the question of negligence on the part of the company, except where the injury is caused by the passenger's criminal negligence, or by his violation of some express rule of the company, actually brought to his attention. This statute was upheld against a challenge on the ground that it violated the due process of law clauses of the state and Federal Constitutions, by the state court, in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Zernecke, 59 Neb. 689, 55 L.R.A. 610, 82 N. W. 26, and by the Supreme Court of the United States in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Zernecke, 183 U. S. 582, 46 L. ed. 339, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229. The Supreme Court of the United States, vindicating the statute against the attack made upon it, used the following language: "In Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Chollette, 33 Neb. 143, 49 N. W. 1114, the words of the statute exempting railroad companies from liability, 'where the injury done arose from the criminal negligence of the persons injured,' were defined to mean 'gross negligence,' 'such negligence as would amount to a flagrant and reckless disregard' by the passenger of his own safety, and 'amount to a wilful indifference to the injury liable to follow.' This definition was approved in subsequent cases. It was also approved in the case at bar, and the plaintiff in error, it was in effect declared, was precluded from any defense but that of negligence as defined, or that the injury resulted from the violation of some rule of the company by the passenger, brought to his actual notice, and the company, as we have said, was not permitted to introduce evidence that the derailment of its train was caused by the felonious act of a third person. The statute, thus interpreted and enforced, it is asserted, impairs the constitutional rights of plaintiff in error. The specific contention is that the company is deprived of its defense, and not only declared guilty of negligence and wrongdoing without a hearing, but adjudged to suffer without wrongdoing; indeed, even for the crimes of others, which the company could not have foreseen or have prevented. Thus described, the statute seems objectionable. Regarded as extending the rule of liability for injury to persons which the common law makes for the loss of or injury to things, the statute seems defensible. And it was upon this ground that the supreme court of the state defended and vindicated the statute. The court said: 'The legislation is justifiable under the police power of the state, so it has been held. It was enacted to make railroad companies insurers of the safe transportation of their passengers as they were of baggage and freight; and no good reason is suggested why a railroad company should be released from liability for injuries received by a passenger while being transported over its line, while the corporation must respond for any damages to his baggage or freight.' Our jurisprudence affords examples of legal liability without fault, and the deprivation of property without fault being attributable to its owner. The law of deodands was such an example. The personification of the ship in admiralty law is another. Other examples are afforded in the liability of the husband for the torts of the wife—the liability of the master for the acts of his servants. In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161, a statute of Kansas abrogating the common-law rule exempting a master from liability to a servant for the negligence of a fellow servant was sustained against the contention that such statute violated the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. And in Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Herrick, 127 U. S. 210, 32 L. ed. 109, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1176, a statute of Iowa which extended liability for the 'wilful wrongs, whether of commission or omission,' of the 'agents, engineers, or other employees' of railroad companies, was vindicated against the double attack of being an unjust discrimination against railroad corporations and the deprivation of property without due process of law."

The latest illustration of such a statute is found in the Oklahoma depositors' guaranty law, which authorizes the assessment and collection of a certain per centum on the daily average deposit of each and every bank organized under the laws of the state, as a fund to pay the losses caused depositors by failing and insolvent banks. This act was challenged in the state court on the ground that it violated the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the due process of law clause of the state Constitution, but was upheld by the state court, and on writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States the judgment of the state court was affirmed. Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 22 Okla. 48, 97 Pac. 500; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 55 L. ed. 112, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1062, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186: Answering the objection that the act takes private property for a private use, and creates a liability without fault, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "The substance of the plaintiff's argument is that the assessment takes private property for private use without compensation. And while we should assume that the plaintiff would retain a reversionary interest in its contribution to the fund, so as to be entitled to a return of what remained of it if the purpose were given up (see Danby 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Bank v. State Treasurer, 39 Vt. 92, 98), still there is no denying that by this law a portion of its property might be taken without return, to pay debts of a failing rival in business. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the logical form of the objection, there are more powerful considerations on the other side. In the first place, it is established by a series of cases that an ulterior public advantage may justify a comparatively insignificant taking of private property for what, in its immediate purpose, is a private use. Clark v. Nash, 198 U. S. 361, 49 L. ed. 1085, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1171; Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. 200 U. S. 527, 531, 50 L. ed. 581, 583, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1174; Offield v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 203 U. S. 372, 51 L. ed. 231, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72; Bacon v. Walker, 204 U. S. 311, 315, 51 L. ed. 499, 501, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289. And, in the next, it would seem that there may be other cases beside the everyday one of taxation, in which the share of each party in the benefit of a scheme of mutual protection is sufficient compensation for the correlative burden that it is compelled to assume. See Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 44 L. ed. 729, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 466. At least, if we have a case within the reasonable exercise of the police power as above explained, no more need be said."

Illustrations of the nature and all-pervading extent of the police power are shown somewhat in the cases already cited. Other illustrations abound almost without number in the decisions of the state and Federal courts. It will be sufficient for our purposes, however, to call attention to a few of those which most clearly, as we believe, illustrate the doctrine. In Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 38 L. ed. 385, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499, the court used this language: "The extent and limits of what is known as the police power have been a fruitful subject of discussion in the appellate courts of nearly every state in the Union. It is universally conceded to include everything essential to the public safety, health, and morals, and to justify the destruction or abatement, by summary proceedings, of whatever may be regarded as a public nuisance. Under this power it has been held that the state may order the destruction of a house falling to decay or otherwise endangering the lives of passers-by; the demolition of such as are in the path of a conflagration; the slaughter of diseased cattle; the destruction of decayed or unwholesome food; the prohibition of wooden buildings in cities; the regulation of railways and other means of public conveyance, and of interments in burial grounds; the restriction of objectionable trades to certain localities; the compulsory vaccination of children; the confinement of the insane or those afflicted with contagious diseases; the restraint of vagrants, beggars, and habitual drunkards; the suppression of obscene publications and houses of ill fame; and the prohibition of gambling houses and places where intoxicating liquors are sold. Beyond this, however, the state may interfere wherever the public interests demand it, and in this particular a large discretion is necessarily vested in the legislature to determine, not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests."

Again, in Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, it was said: "An examination of both these classes of cases under the 14th Amendment will demonstrate that, in passing upon the validity of state legislation under that amendment, this court has not failed to recognize the fact that the law is, to a certain extent, a progressive science; that in some of the states methods of procedure which, at the time the Constitution was adopted, were deemed essential to the protection and safety of the people, or to the liberty of the citizen, have been found to be no longer necessary; that restrictions which had formerly been laid upon the conduct of individuals, or of classes of individuals, had proved detrimental to their interests; while, upon the other hand, certain other classes of persons, particularly those engaged in dangerous or unhealthful employments, have been found to be in need of additional protection. Even before the adoption of the Constitution, much had been done toward mitigating the severity of the common law, particularly in the administration of its criminal branch. The number of capital crimes, in this country, at least, had been largely decreased. Trial by ordeal and by battle had never existed here, and had fallen into disuse in England. The earlier practice of the common law, which denied the benefit of witnesses to a person accused of felony, had been abolished by statute, though, so far as it deprived him of the assistance of counsel and compulsory process for the attendance of his witnesses, it had not been changed in England. But to the credit of her American colonies let it be said that so oppressive a doctrine had never obtained a foothold there. The present century has originated legal reforms of no less importance. The whole fabric of special pleading, once thought to be necessary to the elimination of the real issue between the parties, has crumbled to pieces. The ancient tenures of real estate have been largely swept away, and land is now transferred almost as easily and cheaply as personal property. Married women have been emancipated from the control of their husbands and placed upon a practical equality with them with respect to the acquisition, possession, and transmission of property. Imprisonment for debt has been abolished. Exemptions from execution have been largely added to, and in most of the states homesteads are rendered incapable of seizure and sale upon forced process. Witnesses are no longer incompetent by reason of interest, even though they be parties to the litigation. Indictments have been simplified, and an indictment for the most serious of crimes is now the simplest of all. In several of the states grand juries, formerly the only safeguard against a malicious prosecution, have been largely abolished, and in others the rule of unanimity, so far as applied to civil cases, has given way to verdicts rendered by a three-fourths majority. This case does not call for an expression of opinion as to the wisdom of these changes, or their validity under the 14th Amendment, although the substitution of prosecution by information in lieu of indictment was recognized as valid in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292. They are mentioned only for the purpose of calling attention to the probability that other changes of no less importance may be made in the future, and that, while the cardinal principles of justice are immutable, the methods by which justice is administered are subject to constant fluctuation, and that the Constitution of the United States, which is necessarily and to a large extent inflexible and exceedingly difficult of amendment, should not be so construed as to deprive the states of the power to so amend their laws as to make them conform to the wishes of the citizens as they may deem best for the public welfare, without bringing them into conflict with the supreme law of the land."

So, in Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 55 L. ed. 112, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, Mr. Justice Holmes said: "It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the great public needs. Camfield v. United States, 167 U. S. 518, 42 L. ed. 260, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 864. It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage, or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare. Among matters of that sort probably few would doubt that both usage and preponder-ant opinion give their sanction to enforcing the primary conditions of successful commerce. One of those conditions at the present time is the possibility of payment by checks drawn against bank deposits; to such an extent do checks replace currency in daily business. If, then, the legislature of the state thinks that the public welfare requires the measure under consideration, analogy and principle are in favor of the power to enact it. Even the primary object of the required assessment is not a private benefit, as it was in the cases above cited, of a ditch for irrigation, or a railway to a mine, but it is to make the currency of checks secure, and by the same stroke to make safe the almost compulsory resort to depositors to banks as the only available means for keeping money on hand. The priority of claim given to depositors is incidental to the same object and is justified in the same way. The power to restrict liberty by fixing a minimum of capital required of those who would engage in banking is not denied. The power to restrict investments to securities regarded as relatively safe seems equally plain. It has been held, we do not doubt rightly, that inspections may be required and the cost thrown on the bank. See Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbes, 142 U. S. 386, 35 L. ed. 1051, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255. The power to compel, beforehand, co-operation, and thus, it is believed, to make a failure unlikely and a general panic almost impossible, must be recognized, if government is to do its proper work, unless we can say that the means have no reasonable relation to the end. Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 188, 44 L. ed. 725, 728, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633. So far is that from being the case that the device is a familiar one. It was adopted by some states the better part of a century ago, and seems never to have been questioned until now. Danby Bank v. State Treasurer, 39 Vt. 92; People v. Walker, 17 N. Y. 502. Recent cases going not less far are Lemieux v. Young, 211 U. S. 489, 496, 53 L. ed. 295, 300, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174; Kidd, D. & P. Co. v. Musselman Grocer Co. 217 U. S. 461, 54 L. ed. 839, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606. It is asked whether the state could require all corporations or all grocers to help to guarantee each other's solvency, and where we are going to draw the line. But the last is a futile question, and we will answer the others when they arise. With regard to the police power, as elsewhere in the law, lines are pricked out by the gradual approach and contact of decisions on the opposing sides. Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U. S. 349, 355, 52 L. ed. 828, 831, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 520, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 560. It will 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

serve as a datum on this side that, in our opinion, the statute before us is well within the state's constitutional power, while the use of the public credit on a large scale to help individuals in business has been held to be beyond the line. Citizens' Sav. & L. Asso. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 22 L. ed. 455; Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39."

It is argued, however, that the statutes above referred to can be supported on principles not applicable to the statute before us. First, it is said that the statutes creating absolute liability on railroad companies for losses caused by fires from their locomotive engines are in themselves but a return to the common law as it originally existed. But this does not meet the objection. At the time the common law becomes a rule of action for the American states, the doctrine that negligence or fault of some kind was a necessary element of liability was as firmly imbedded in it as was any other of its tenets, and to create liability regardless of negligence is now as fundamental a change in the common law as it would be had the rule always remained as it now is. Again, it is said that the right to use the agencies of fire and steam in the movement of trains is derived from legislation by the state, and the state can, for that reason, prescribe such limitations upon and annex such conditions to its use as it may deem fit and necessary to protect from injury those who come in contact with it. But the premise here assumed is not strictly accurate. The use of fire and steam to propel trains is not in itself unlawful. On the contrary, it is as much a natural right as is the right to propel them by any other means, or to engage in any other lawful enterprise. Hence the power to regulate and interfere with the right must come from some source other than the inherent unlawfulness of the act itself. It is not meant to be said, of course, that the state, when it grants a charter to a railroad company empowering it to construct and operate a railroad within its boundaries, may not annex to the charter such conditions as it pleases. But that is not the question here. The question is: Whence comes the power to impose these additional burdens upon a railroad corporation by legislative fiat after it has received its charter and has constructed and is operating its road thereunder? Unless the constitution or the act granting the charter itself expressly reserves such right, the legislature cannot materially change the charters of railroad companies after it has once granted them. The power to annex additional conditions thereto must therefore be found in some other power than the one here alluded to. Then, again, it is said with reference to these and the bank guaranty statutes that the corporations named therein are affected with a public interest, and that this fact renders them subject to regulations that they would not otherwise be subject to. But again we say that the legislature, because of this public interest, may be warranted in imposing such a condition as a precedent right to engage in the business of railroading or banking, but it furnishes no reason for imposing additional conditions after the business has been entered upon with the consent of the state. The property of such institutions is private property, and its ownership is as secure and free from arbitrary exactions as is the property invested in enterprises of a more private nature. Of the statutes making the landlord liable for damages caused by the sale of intoxicating liquors by his tenant, it is said that the traffic is unlawful in itself; that "whisky is an outlaw," and hence the legislature, if it permits its sale at all, may prescribe the terms upon which sales shall be made. But here again the assumption is not in accord with the fact. The sale of liquor was not unlawful at common law. On the contrary, it has been said by as high an authority as the Supreme Court of the United States that the state could no more exclude its importation and sale in original packages without the consent of Congress than it could exclude the sugar of Louisiana, the cotton of South Carolina, the wines of California, the hops of Washington, the tobacco of Maryland and Connecticut, or the products natural or manufactured of any state. Lyng v. Michigan, 135 U. S. 161, 34 L. ed. 150, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 143, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 725. It refused to classify intoxicating liquors with rags or other goods infected with disease, or with cattle or meat or other provisions which, from their condition, are unfit for human use or consumption, as it was conceded that the state could prohibit the importation and use of these in any form, with or without the consent of Congress. It seems to us, therefore, that it cannot be successfully controverted that all of these statutes rest upon the same basic principle on which the statute at bar rests; that is to say, they have their foundation in the police power of the state.

Nor is it sufficient to exclude the industries mentioned in the act before us from the operation of these principles to say that they are lawful callings, not subject to absolute prohibition. As we have said in another place, lawful trades and businesses, although private in their nature, are subject to the police power, and may be controlled and regulated under it whenever the welfare of the state requires it. This is well illustrated by the laws of our own state. For example, the statute requiring employers of labor to pay their employees in lawful money; the statute requiring employers of female help in stores or offices to provide each of them with a chair or stool on which to rest when their duties permit; the statute prohibiting the employment of females in any mechanical or mercantile establishment, laundry, hotel, or restaurant, for more than ten hours in any one day; the statute limiting the number of hours an employee will be permitted in any one day to work underground in a coal mine: the statute requiring machinery in factories, mills, and workshops, the openings of all hoistways, hatchways, elevators, and well holes, to be guarded; the statute appointing a commissioner of labor, and empowering him to inspect mills and factories and charge the cost thereof to the mill or factory inspected,—are all statutes regulating lawful trades or businesses not affected with public interests, yet each and all of them have been upheld and enforced in a long line of cases by this court. State v. Buchanan, 29 Wash. 602, 59 L.R.A. 342, 92 Am. St. Rep. 930, 70 Pac. 52; Kirkham v. Wheeler-Osgood Co. 39 Wash. 415, 81 Pac. 869, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 532; Shortall v. Puget Sound Bridge & Dredging Co. 45 Wash. 290, 122 Am. St. Rep. 899, 88 Pac. 212; Hall v. West & S. Mill Co. 39 Wash. 447, 81 Pac. 915, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 587; Whelan v. Washington Lumber Co. 41 Wash. 153, 111 Am. St. Rep. 1006, 83 Pac. 98.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, speaking of the power of the state to interfere with private property, used this language: "That a state, in a bona fide exercise of its police power, may interfere with private property, and even order its destruction, is as well settled as any legislative power can be, which has for its objects the welfare and comfort of the citizen. For instance, meats, fruits, and vegetables do not cease to become private property by their decay; but it is clearly within the power of the state to order their destruction in times of epidemic, or whenever they are so exposed as to be deleterious to the public health. There is also property in rags and clothing; but that does not stand in the way of their destruction in case they become infected and dangerous to the public health. No property is more sacred than one's home, and yet a house may be pulled down or blown up by the public authorities, if necessary to avert or stay a general conflagration, and that, too, without re-

The power to regulate, therefore, applies alike to all employments. The test of the power is found in the effect the pursuit of the calling has upon the public weal rather than in the inherent nature of the calling itself.

In Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 832, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427, the court, referring to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, said: "The liberty mentioned in that Amendment means not only the right of the citizen to be free from the mere physical restraint of his person, as by incarceration, but the term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes above mentioned."

It is thought the act at bar interferes with certain of the personal rights here defined, particularly with the right of contract, and is for that reason violative of this provision of the Constitution. But it is recognized in the case cited, and in many others, that these rights are not absolute. On the contrary, it has been many times said that there is no absolute right to do as one wills, pursue any calling one desires, or contract as one chooses; that the term "liberty" means absence of arbitrary restraint, not immunity from reasonable regulations and prohibitions imposed in the interests of the community. The principle was thus stated in Frisbie v. United States, 157 U. S. 160, 39 L. ed. 657, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 586: "A second objection, insisted upon now as it was by demurrer to the indictment, is that the act under which the indictment was found is unconstitutional, because interfering with the price of labor and the freedom of contract. This objection also is untenable. While it may be conceded that, generally speaking, among the inalienable rights of the citizen is that of the liberty of contract, yet such liberty is not absolute and universal. It is within the undoubted power of government to restrain some individuals from all contracts, as well as all individuals from some contracts. It may deny to all the right to contract for the purchase or sale of lottery tickets; to the minor the right to assume any obligations, except for the necessities of existence; to the common carrier the power to make any contract releasing himself from negligence; and, indeed, may restrain all engaged in any employment from any contract in the course of that employment which is against public policy. The possession of this power by government in no manner conflicts with the proposition that, generally speaking, every citizen has a right freely to contract for the price of his labor, services, or property."

Again, in the case of Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, the court, holding constitutional the statute of the state of Utah fixing the number of hours a workingman should be permitted to work continuously in underground mines, used this language: "This right of contract, however, is itself subject to certain limitations which the state may lawfully impose in the exercise of its police powers. While this power is inherent in all governments, it has doubtless been greatly expanded in its application during the past century, owing to an enormous increase in the number of occupations which are dangerous, or so far detrimental to the health of employees as to demand special precautions for their well-being and protection, or the safety of adjacent property. While this court has held, notably in the cases Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616, and Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 113 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064, that the police power cannot be put forward as an excuse for oppressive and unjust legislation, it may be lawfully resorted to for the purpose of preserving the public health, safety, or morals, or the abatement of public nuisances, and a large discretion 'is necessarily vested in the legislature to determine not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests.'"

So, in State v. Buchanan, 29 Wash. 602, 59 L.R.A. 342, 92 Am. St. Rep. 930, 70 Pac. 52, this court, holding constitutional the act limiting the number of hours women could be required to work in one day in mechanical and mercantile establishments, said: "Law is, or ought to be, a progressive science. While the principles of justice are immutable, changing conditions of society and the evolution of employment make a change in the application of principles absolutely necessary to an intelligent administration of government. In the early history of the law, when employments were few and simple, the relative conditions of the citizen and the state were different, and many employments and uses which were then considered inalienable rights have since, from the very necessity of changed conditions, been subjected to legislative control, restriction, and restraint. This all flows from the old announcement made by Blackstone, that when man enters into society, as a compensation for the protection which society gives to him, he must yield up some of his natural rights; and, as the responsibilities of the government increase, and a greater degree of protection is afforded to the citizen, the recompense is the yielding of more individual rights. Transportation companies are now controlled and restricted, where a few years ago they claimed the right to transact their business exactly as it suited their private interests. The practice of medicine is restricted and controlled. Laws against quackery and empiricism are enforced without question. The sale of liquor, which formerly was a legitimate business, and which the citizen had a right to enter into, as he did any other business, without any restrictions, has now become subject to the control of the state, or to actual prohibition at the will of the state. The changing conditions of society have made an imperative call upon the state for the exercise of these additional powers, and the welfare of society demands that the state should assume these powers, and it is the duty of the court to sustain them whenever it is found that they are based upon the idea of the promotion and protection of society."

If, therefore, the act in controversy has a reasonable relation to the protection of the public health, morals, safety, or welfare, it is not to be set aside because it may incidentally deprive some person of his property without fault, or take the property of one person to pay the obligations of another. To be fatally defective in these respects, the regulation must be so utterly unreasonable and so extravagant in nature and purpose as to capriciously interfere with and destroy private rights.

That the statute here in question has the attribute of reasonableness, rather than that of capriciousness, seems incontrovertible. The evil it seeks to remedy is one that calls loudly for action. Accidents to workmen engaged in the industries enumerated in it are all but inevitable. It seems that no matter how carefully laws for the prevention of accidents in such industries may be framed, or how rigidly they may be enforced, there is an element of human equation that enters into the problem which cannot be eliminated and which invariably causes personal injuries and consequent financial losses to workmen engaged therein. Heretofore these losses have been borne by the injured workmen themselves, by their dependents, or by the state at large. It was the belief of the legislature that they should be borne by the industries causing them, or, perhaps more accurately, by the consumers of the products of such industries.

That the principle thus sought to be put into effect is economically, sociologically, and morally sound, we think must be conceded. It is so treated by the learned counsel who have filed briefs in support of the auditor's contentions; it is so conceded by all modern statesmen, jurists, and economic writers who have voiced their opinions on the subject; and the principle has been enacted into law by nearly all of the civilized countries of Europe, by Australia, by New Zealand, by the Transvaal, by the principal provinces of the Dominion of Canada, and in a partial form, at least, by one or more of South American republics. Indeed, so universal is the conception that to assert to the contrary is to turn the face against the enlightened opinion of mankind. The common law does not purport to afford a remedy for the condition here found to exist. It affords relief to an injured workman in only a limited number of cases,—cases where the injury is the result of fault on the part of the employer and there is want of fault on the part of the workman. For the greater number of injuries traceable to the dangers incident to industry, no remedy at all is afforded. The act, therefore, having in its support these economic and moral considerations, is not unconstitutional for the reasons suggested upon this branch of the argument.

Passing to the second objection, it is well settled that neither the clause of the state Constitution prohibiting class legislation, nor the clause of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the equal protection of the laws, takes from the state the power to classify in the adoption of police regulations. The limitations imposed admit of a wide discretion in this respect, and avoid only what is done without any reasonable basis; that is, such regulations as are in their nature arbitrary. The learned counsel for the auditor recognize this distinction, and consequently do not attack the act because it is confined to extrahazardous occupations as its field of regulation, but complain because its benefits are not confined to workmen injured while engaged in such occupations. It is claimed that the act allows workmen employed in such industries the benefit of the act when injured outside of the line of their duties, or when engaged in the business of the concern in a capacity not affected by the peculiar hazards of the business. We have quoted enough of the statute to show that it is somewhat obscure in these respects, but we are not inclined to think the point fatal to the act, even though we concede counsel's interpretation of it to be the correct one.

In § 27, the legislature has made it clear that it did not intend the provisions relating to those who are entitled to partake of its benefits to be so far an integral part of the act that it could not be eliminated in part without destroying the act in its entirety. It is there expressly provided that the adjudication of invalidity of any part of the act shall not affect the validity of the act as a whole, or any other part thereof. This means that the legislature intended the act to be enforced as far as it may be, even though it might not be valid in its entirety. It was competent for the legislature so to provide. Anything it could have eliminated itself and left an operative act can be eliminated by the courts without destroying the entire act, if it is the will of the legislature that the remaining parts of the act shall stand after such elimination. So here, if it be true that the legislature has gone too far in this direction, and has attempted to include within its benefits certain employees who cannot be included without including employees generally, these can be omitted in the administration of the act without the necessity of nullifying the entire act. But whether any such workmen are so improperly included we shall not here determine. The question can best be met when it arises during the course of the act's administration.

Again, it is said that the act violates the provisions relating to class legislation because it diverts the contributions exacted from the numerous industries to the relief of a particular class of injured and disabled workmen, instead of applying it to the relief of injured workmen generally, or applying it to the use of the state at large. But to divert the money collected in this manner to a special use is one of the prerogatives of legislation. The right of the state to regulate any form of industry arises from the fact that its pursuit affects injuriously the health, safety, morals, or welfare of the persons engaged in it, or is inimical in some form to some portion of the individuals of the community. It is not necessary that it always affect injuriously the public at large. On the contrary, it may be regulated if it affects injuriously those engaged in it, or those brought in direct contact with it, even though its pursuit may benefit generally the people of the state at large. Nor is there any particular form which the regulation must take. The conduct of the business may be prohibited entirely in a particular place or in a particular manner; its pursuit may be restricted to certain hours of the day; it may be permitted to be conducted only in caso protective devices are used; or it may be permitted in certain forms, and a sum of money exacted from the individuals carrying it on, for the purpose of recompensing those who suffer losses because thereof.

So, in this instance, if the legislature believed that, to permit the pursuit of the industries named after the present manner of conducting them was generally for the public good in spite of the losses the method of pursuit entailed, there is no reason why it should not confine its regulations to compelling the owners and conductors of such industries to create a fund out of which the losses caused thereby should be made good. That legislation in this form is not class legislation, nor a denial to owners of property of the equal protection of the laws, is well sustained by authority.

In Jensen v. South Dakota C. R. Co. 25 S. D. 508, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1015, 127 N. W. 650, the court, discussing the question, used this language: "The exercise of the police power in this class of cases is based upon the ground that, where persons are engaged in a calling or business attended with danger to other persons and their property, then the legislature may step in and impose conditions upon the exercise of such calling or business for the general good and welfare of society, and may prescribe the terms on which such dangerous calling or business will be permitted to be carried on by persons in charge thereof, whether such persons happen to be private individuals or railway corporations. The fact that such legislative exercise of the police power applies alike to all persons and all corporations engaging in such dangerous calling or business relieves it from the charge and contention that there is a denial of equal protection under the law by reason of such enactments."

In Firemen's Beney. Asso. v. Lounsbury, 21 Ill. 511, 74 Am. Dec. 115, the court had under consideration a statute of the state of Illinois which created a corporation called the Firemen's Benevolent Association, and required every insurance agent in the city of Chicago to pay to the association a fixed percentage upon the amount of fire insurance premiums collected by him per year from fire insurance effected upon property in the city, to be used solely for the relief of distressed, sick, injured, or disabled firemen and their immediate families. Answering the objection that the act was void as class legislation, the court said: "There is nothing to be found in the Constitution which can be held to inhibit the legislature from imposing burdens, or raising money from citizens of the state, which is not for the direct benefit of the state, and is never designed to belong to the state. To deprive the legislature of this power would to a great extent destroy its usefulness,— while it would to a certain extent deprive it of the power of abuse, it would destroy its power to regulate by law a thousand things which the public good requires should be regulated by law. . . . Let us once hold that the legislature could not compel any citizen to submit to a burden, except for the benefit of the state aggregate, or for some subdivision of it, as a county, city, or town, or to pay any money except it shall go into the state or some subordinate public treasury, and we should soon find ourselves on the brink of anarchy itself,—we should tie up the hands of the legislature, it is true, so that they might not do some evils which they have hitherto had the power of doing; but we should also let loose upon society 10,000 evils which, in every well-regulated community, it has always been the duty of the legislature to suppress. It is in the exercise of this indispensable power that ferries, toll bridges, and the like are licensed or chartered. The legislature, finding it necessary to afford especial encouragement to private enterprise to erect a bridge or a ferry, has ever exercised the power of imposing a burden on some, for the benefit of others. Who ever doubted the right of the legislature to charter a bridge, and to require all persons crossing the stream within certain limits, to pay the tolls, whether they cross on the bridge or not? It is the exercise of the same power which fixes the fees of officers for the performance of certain services. It is the power which the legislature possesses, of imposing burdens upon certain members of the community who are supposed to be benefited, by the efforts or acts of certain other members of the community, as a reward or compensation for such acts. . . . It would fill a volume to enumerate all the familiar instances of the exercise of this power,—a power which must be exercised constantly in every civilized community, or the well-being of that community must vitally suffer."

In State v. Cassidy, 22 Minn. 312, 21 Am. Rep. 765, the court sustained an act which required the venders of intoxicating liquors to pay a fixed sum per annum into the state treasury, in addition to the usual license fee, as a fund to be disbursed by a state commission in the creation and operation of a state asylum for the care and cure of inebriates. The court, in its opinion, points out that the act is an exercise of police power, saying: "It regards the traffic as one tending to produce intemperance, and as likely, by reason thereof, to entail upon the state the expense and burden of providing for a class of persons rendered incapable of self-support, the evil influence of whose presence and example upon society is necessarily injurious to the public welfare and prosperity, and therefore calls for such legislative interposition as will operate as a restraint upon the business, and protect the community from the mischiefs, evils, and pecuniary burdens flowing from its prosecution. . . . That these provisions unmistakably partake of the nature of police regulations, and are strictly of that character, there can be no doubt, nor can it be denied that their expediency or necessity is solely a legislative, and not a judicial, question. . . . Regarding the law as a precautionary measure, intended to operate as a wholesome restraint upon the traffic, and as a protection to society against its consequent evils, the exacted fee is not unreasonable in amount, and the purpose to which it is devoted is strictly pertinent and appropriate. It could not be questioned but that a reasonable sum imposed in the way of an indemnity to the state against the expense of maintaining a police force to supervise the conduct of those engaged in the business, and to guard against the disorders and infractions of law occasioned by its prosecution, would be a legitimate exercise of the police power, and not open to the objection that it was a tax for the purpose of revenue, and therefore unconstitutional. Reclaiming the inebriate, restoring him to society, prepared again to discharge the duties of citizenship, equally promotes the public welfare, and tends to the accomplishment of like beneficial results, and it is difficult to see wherein the imposition of a reasonable license fee would be any the less a proper exercise of this power in the one case than in the other. The purpose to which the license fund created by the act is designated is more consonant to the idea of regulating the traffic and preventing its evils than is the case under the general license law, which devotes the fees received to common-school purposes, and we are not aware that any objection has ever been urged against that law on that account."

A statute of Kentucky imposed upon all dogs a tax at a fixed sum per capita, to be paid by their owners, for the creation of a fund to be disbursed to sheep growers whose sheep should be injured or destroyed by the ravages of dogs. In McGlone v. Womack, 129 Ky. 274, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 855, 111 S. W. 698, this statute was challenged by a number of owners of dogs on the ground that it violated the state Constitution. Answering the objection that it was class legislation, the court said: "Nor do we think the act is inimical to that portion of § 3 of the Bill of Rights which provides: ' . . . And no grant of exclusive, separate public emoluments or privileges shall be made to any man or set of men, except in consideration of public services. . . . As we view it, the statute does not confer any special privilege on the owner of sheep. It merely protects these owners from the destruction of their property by dogs. It is the duty of the state to protect every citizen in his life, liberty, and property; and it certainly is within the competency of the legislature to exercise the police power of the state to protect all property against the ravages of destructive animals. The question as to how this is to be done and what property is to be so protected is a matter of legislative discretion. Undoubtedly the sheep industry is a most important one to the whole state. All of our citizens are interested in an industry which supplies the market with wholesome meat, provides means of obtaining warm and comfortable clothing, and at the same time furnishes labor to the otherwise unemployed. It is only necessary to allude to this phase of the question. The importance of the industry as a whole is most obvious. It is equally obvious that sheep are peculiarly liable to the ravages of dogs. They have neither the fleetness to escape nor the courage to defend themselves from attack, and their silent suffering enables the dog to prey upon them without any danger that the owner will be warned of the destruction of his property by the outcry of the dying animal. . . . The fact that sheep are generally killed at night when it is impossible to ascertain the owner of the dog committing the ravage makes it necessary, if protection is to be had through this channel at all, that each owner of a dog should be required to contribute a small amount to a common fund dedicated to the remuneration of owners of sheep killed by unknown dogs. As said before, this is simply requiring the owners of dogs to make good the ravages of dangerous animals kept by them; and no citizen has just cause of complaint, if he keeps animals destructive to the property of others, that he is required to make good the damages done by them. The statute, in truth, is but an enforcement of the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, and, as such, its constitutionality is beyond successful question." See also Leavitt v. Morris, 105 Minn. 170, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 984, 117 N. W. 393, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 961; Mitchell v. Williams, 27 Ind. 62; Van Horn v. People, 46 Mich. 183, 41 Am. Rep. 159, 9 N. W. 246; Cole v. Hall, 103 Ill. 30; Longyear v. Buck, 83 Mich. 236, 10 L.R.A. 43, 47 N. W. 234; Holst v. Roe, 39 Ohio St. 340, 48 Am. Rep. 459; State v. Frame, 39 Ohio St. 399.

of class legislation, are interesting from another aspect also. They furnish examples of constitutional statutes creating liability without fault. To effect insurance as an agent, to sell intoxicating liquors where not forbidden by the state, or to own and keep dogs, is not of itself unlawful, and it would seem that any reason which would justify the levying of a tax on persons pursuing these occupations as business callings, or owning and keeping the species of property mentioned, would justify the levy sought to be made by the act before us.

The third principal objection to the constitutionality of the act is that it violates the provision of the Constitution designed to secure equal and uniform taxation of property for public purposes. As the charge laid on the persons engaged in the industries named in the act is a pecuniary burden imposed by public authority, it partakes of the nature of a tax, and, in the language of a distinguished judge discussing a similar question, "for many purposes might be so spoken of without harm." But it is manifest that it is not a "tax" in the sense the word is used in the sections of the Constitution to which reference is here made. No accession to the public revenue, general or local, is authorized or aimed at. The purpose of the exaction is entirely different. It is to be used, not to meet the current expenses of government, but to recompense employees of the industries on whom the burden is imposed for injuries received by them while engaged in the pursuit of their employment. It is the consideration which the owners of the industries pay for the privilege of carrying them on. It is therefore in the nature of a license tax, and can be justified on the principle of law that justifies the imposition and collection of license taxes generally.

In this state, such taxes may be imposed, either as a regulation or for the purposes of revenue, the only limitation upon the power being that such taxes when imposed on useful trades and industries shall not be unreasonable, and if a class of trades or industries is selected from the whole, and the tax imposed upon the class selected alone rather than upon the whole, that there be some reasonable ground for making the distinction. Walla Walla v. Ferdon, 21 Wash. 308, 57 Pac. 796; Fleetwood v. Read, 21 Wash. 547, 47 L.R.A. 205, 58 Pac. 665; Stull v. De Mattos, 23 Wash. 71, 51 L.R.A. 892, 62 Pac. 451; Seattle v. Barto, 31 Wash. 141, 71 Pac. 735; Re Garfinkle, 37 Wash. 650, 80 Pac. 188; Oilure Mfg. Co. v. Pidduck-Ross Co. 38 Wash. 137, 80 Pac. 276; McKnight v. Hodge, 55 Wash. 289, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 104 Pac. 504.

impose such license taxes is well stated by Judge Brewer in Newton v. Atchison, 31 Kan. 151, 47 Am. Rep. 486, 1 Pac. 288, in the following language: "Before noticing some specific objections which are made to this particular tax, we think it proper to state certain general propositions which underlie this matter of a license tax. First. In the absence of any inhibition, express or implied, in the Constitution, the legislature has power, either directly to levy and collect license taxes on any business or occupation, or to delegate like authority to a municipal corporation. This seems to be the concurrent voice of all the authorities. In 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 3d ed. § 357, note, the author says: 'Unless specially restrained by the Constitution, the legislature may provide for the taxing of any occupation or trade, and may confer this power upon municipal corporations.' In Burroughs on Taxation, p. 148, is this language: 'Where the Constitution is silent on the subject, the right of the state to exact from its citizens a tax regulated by the avocations they pursue cannot be questioned.' In Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 606, 18 L. ed. 902, the Supreme Court of the United States thus states the law: 'Nothing can be more certain in legal decision than that the privileges and franchises of a private corporation, and all trades and avocations by which the citizens acquire a livelihood, may be taxed by a state for the support of the state government.' Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 638, 18 L. ed. 906; Cooley, Taxn. 384-392, 410. On page 384 the author observes: 'The same is true of occupations; government may tax one, or it may tax all. There is no restriction upon its power in this regard unless one is expressly imposed by the Constitution.' In State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. ed. 179, Field, J., among other things, speaking of the power of taxation, says: 'It may touch property in every shape, in its natural condition, in its manufactured form, and in its various transmutations. And the amount of taxation may be determined by the value of the property, or its use, or its capacity, or its productiveness. It may touch business in the almost infinite forms in which it is conducted; in professions, in commerce, in manufactures, and in transportation. Unless restrained by the Constitution, the power as to the mode, forms, and extent of taxation is unlimited.' See also the authorities collected in Fretwell v. Troy, 18 Kan. 274. Nor does this rest alone upon a mere matter of authority. Full legislative power is, save as specially restricted by the Constitution, vested in the legislature. Taxation is a legislative power. Full discretion and control, therefore, in reference to it, are vested in the legislature, save when specially restricted. There is no inherent vice in the taxation of avocations. On the contrary, business is as legitimate an object of the taxing power as property. Oftentimes a tax on the former results in a more even and exact justice than one on the latter. Indeed, the taxing power is not limited to either property or avocations. It may, as was in fact done during the late war and the years immediately succeeding, be cast upon incomes, or placed upon deeds and other instruments. We know there is quite a prejudice against the occupation taxes. It is thought, to be really double taxation. Judge Dillon well says that (such taxes are apt to be inequitable, and the principle not free from danger of great abuse.' Yet, wisely imposed, they will go far toward equalizing public burdens. A lawyer and a merchant may, out of their respective avocations, obtain the same income. Each receives the same protection and enjoys the same benefits of society and government. Yet the one having tangible property pays taxes; the other, whose property is all in legal learning and skill, wholly intangible, pays nothing. A wisely adjusted occupation tax equalizes these inequalities. But, after all, these are questions of policy, and for legislative consideration. It is enough for the courts that both occupation and property are legitimate objects of taxation; that they are essentially dissimilar; that constitutional provisions regulating the taxation of one do not control that of the other; and that there are no constitutional inhibitions on the taxation of business, either by the legislature directly, or by municipal corporations thereto empowered by the legislature. Second. There is no inhibition, express or implied, in our Constitution, on the power of the legislature to levy and collect license taxes, or to delegate like power to municipal corporations. It is not pretended that there is any express inhibition. It has been contended that § 1, art. 11, creates an implied inhibition, and this because it reads that "the legislature shall provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation.' But that section obviously refers to property, and not to license, taxes."

In Fleetwood v. Read, 21 Wash. 547, 47 L.R.A. 205, 58 Pac. 665, this court, discussing the question whether taxation of this sort was prohibited by the Constitution, said: "It is insisted, also, that the ordinance is void because it imposes a burden upon a portion, and not the whole, of a class of merchants. We do not think this contention is tenable. The ordinance does apply to all merchants who see fit to engage in the business of buying tickets of that kind, and the constitutional provision (art. 1, § 12) that no law shall be passed granting to any citizen, class of citizens, or corporation other than municipal, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens or corporations, cannot be invoked against this ordinance. The adjudicated cases in this respect are so numerous that it is scarcely worth while to mention them here. The ordinance cannot be held void on account of excessive burden imposed. It is not so oppressive that it will in any way interfere with the rights of merchants. However wrong the policy may be which prompted the enactment of this ordinance, or however doubtful the propriety of passing such an ordinance, those are questions which are submitted by the legislature to the discretion of the council, and upon them it is not our province to comment. We think, without further investigation, that there is no doubt that the ordinance is warranted by legislative authority. Some question was raised by the court at the time of the argument of this case in relation to the ordinance being in conflict with §§ 1, 2, and 9 of article 7 of the state Constitution, which provide for uniformity in taxation. Counsel for the respondent was requested by the court to furnish it with a brief on that subject, which he did, and upon an examination of the cases cited and of other cases, we have become convinced that the question raised by the court was not a question pertinent in this case; that, under the great weight of authority, a tax on occupation, business, etc., is not, in legal contemplation, a tax on property, which falls within the inhibition imposed by the usual constitutional provisions in relation to uniformity of taxation; and, in consideration of the fact that the state Constitution is a limitation upon the actions and powers of the legislature instead of a grant of power, that the power of the legislature to tax trades, professions, and occupations is, in the absence of constitutional restriction, a matter within its absolute control, and resting entirely in sound legislative discretion."

The sums exacted from the several industries named, we think may be treated as partaking both of the nature of a license for revenue and regulation; as such, however, we find nothing in the principle inimical to either the state or Federal Constitutions.

The fourth principal reason for which the act is thought to be unconstitutional is that it interferes with the right of trial by jury. It is said that the legislature cannot fix a procrustean rule for the admeasurement of damages arising from injuries received by one in the employment of another, as the employer and the employee alike have the right to submit to a jury both the question of the right to recover for any such injury, and the question of the amount that may be recovered therefor. But we cannot think the rule absolute. It may be that the legislature cannot fix the amount of recovery, or provide for an absolute recovery, in all cases where one person is injured by another, regardless of the relation of the parties, or the question whether the injury is or is not the result of negligence; but it does not follow that it may not so provide where the injury happens in that class of employments subject to legislative regulation and control. If it be as we have attempted to show, a proper regulation of hazardous industries to compel those engaged therein as owners or operators to pay a fixed sum into a fund to be used for the purpose of compensating the employees thereof for injuries received by them, it is difficult to understand why it is not also proper regulation to require the employees of such industries to accept a given sum for any injury they may receive while so engaged. The same power that authorizes the state to regulate the participation of the one in the particular industry would seem to authorize it to regulate the participation of the other therein. Theoretically, of course, the employer and employee, on entering into a contract by which the one engages the services of the other, stand on the same plane; but in practice, as it is well known, this ideal condition very seldom exists. Greed and sagacity on the one side, and necessity and incapacity on the other, sometimes lead to contracts that create conditions little short of peonage; and our own reports abound with instances where men have been induced to work in situations so dangerous to life and limb that the wonder is not that some of them were injured, but rather that any of them escaped injury. Indeed, it is a common thing for an employer, in defense of an action of damages brought by his employee for injury received in such a situation, to urge that the dangers of the place were so obvious and apparent that the employee was guilty of contributory negligence for working therein. These conditions, we think, authorize the interference of the legislature. The grounds upon which the employer may be held to contribute to a fund for the relief of all injuries sustained by his employees, whatever the cause, we have already stated. The obligation of the employee to accept the conditions of the statute can rest on like grounds; namely, the welfare of the state. The relation being one of contract between employer and employee, the state may make it a condition of the contract that the employee shall accept a fixed sum for any injury he may receive while engaged in the employment, whether the injury be the result of the inherent dangers of the employment or the result of some fault of his employer.

There is, of course, no direct authority supporting the contention that the right of trial by jury may be thus taken away. There are, however, cases maintaining principles more or less analogous to the principle thus involved. Of these State v. Buchanan, 29 Wash. 602, 59 L.R.A. 342, 92 Am. St. Rep. 930, 70 Pac. 52, and Holden v. Hart, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, are illustrative. In these cases it is held that the legislature may limit the number of hours a workman shall be permitted to labor in certain classes of employments, on the principle that to do so is to protect the health of the individual workman and thus contribute to the public welfare. If it be within the rule of the police powers of the state to interfere with the workman's personal freedom in this regard, it would seem to be no greater stretch of power to go one step further and provide that, if he be injured while so laboring, he shall receive a sure award in a limited sum as compensation for his injury, and in lieu thereof shall forego his common-law action in damages therefor.

The common-law system of making awards for personal injuries has no such inherent merit as to make a change undesirable. While courts have often said that the question of the amount of compensation to be awarded for a personal injury is one peculiarly within the province of the jury to determine, the remark has been induced rather because no better method for solving the problem is afforded by that system, than because of the belief that no better method could be devised. No one knows better than judges of courts of nisi prius and of review that the common-law method of making such awards, even in those instances to which it is applicable, proves in practice most unsatisfactory. All judges have been witnesses to extravagant awards made for most trivial injuries, and trivial awards made for injuries ruinous in their nature; and perhaps no verdicts of juries are interfered with so often by the courts as verdicts making awards in such cases. There is no standard of measurement that the court can submit to the jury by which they can determine the amount of the award. The test of reasonableness means but little to the ordinary juror. Unused as he is generally to witnessing the results of injuries, he is inclined to measure his verdict by the amount of disorder he observes, rather than by the actual amount of disablement the injury has caused. Nor is he aided in this respect by the testimony of medical experts. Conflicting as such testimony usually is, it tends rather to confuse than to enlighten him. Perhaps the whole difficulty lies in the fact that the question is too much one of opinion, and not enough of fact. It must be remembered also that the remedy afforded by the common law, as we have elsewhere remarked, can be applied only in a limited number of cases of injury,—cases where the injury is the result of negligence on the part of the employer, not contributed to by the employee. For the greater number of injuries the common law affords no remedy at all. For this unscientific system it is proposed to substitute a system which will make an award in all cases of injury, regardless of the cause or manner of its infliction; limited in amount, it is true, but commensurate in some degree to the disability suffered. The desirability of this substitution is unquestioned, and we believe that the legislature had the power to make it without violating any principle of the fundamental law.

The objection may be answered also in another way. The Constitution does not undertake to define what shall constitute a cause of action, nor to prohibit the legislature from so doing. The right of trial by jury, accorded by the Constitution, as applicable to civil cases, is incident only to causes of action recognized by law. The act here in question takes away the cause of action on the one hand, and the ground of defense on the other, and merges both in a statutory indemnity fixed and certain. If the power to do away with a cause of action in any case exists at all in the exercise of the police power of the state, then the right of trial by jury is thereafter no longer involved in such cases. The right of jury trial being incidental to the right of action, to destroy the one is to leave the other nothing upon which to operate.

The auditor also complains of the scheme adopted by the legislature for correcting the evil they have found to exist. It is said that the scheme is unduly cumbersome; that its administration will prove unnecessarily costly and burdensome to those whose interests are affected by it, and will lead to public and private abuses and consequent evils more dangerous to the state than the evil that it is sought to correct.

But the courts are slow to inquire into the mere wisdom of a statute. This question is so pre-eminently one of the law-making branch of the government that the courts will interfere only where there can be no two opinions as to the mischievous and evil tendencies of the act. The act in

in the business of buying tickets of that kind, and the constitutional provision (art. 1, § 12) that no law shall be passed granting to any citizen, class of citizens, or corporation other than municipal, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens or corporations, cannot be invoked against this ordinance. The adjudicated cases in this respect are so numerous that it is scarcely worth while to mention them here. The ordinance cannot be held void on account of excessive burden imposed. It is not so oppressive that it will in any way interfere with the rights of merchants. However wrong the policy may be which prompted the enactment of this ordinance, or however doubtful the propriety of passing such an ordinance, those are questions which are submitted by the legislature to the discretion of the council, and upon them it is not our province to comment. We think, without further investigation, that there is no doubt that the ordinance is warranted by legislative authority. Some question was raised by the court at the time of the argument of this case in relation to the ordinance being in conflict with §§ 1, 2, and 9 of article 7 of the state Constitution, which provide for uniformity in taxation. Counsel for the respondent was requested by the court to furnish it with a brief on that subject, which he did, and upon an examination of the cases cited and of other cases, we have become convinced that the question raised by the court was not a question pertinent in this case; that, under the great weight of authority, a tax on occupation, business, etc., is not, in legal contemplation, a tax on property, which falls within the inhibition imposed by the usual constitutional provisions in relation to uniformity of taxation; and, in consideration of the fact that the state Constitution is a limitation upon the actions and powers of the legislature instead of a grant of power, that the power of the legislature to tax trades, professions, and occupations is, in the absence of constitutional restriction, a matter within its absolute control, and resting entirely in sound legislative discretion."

The sums exacted from the several industries named, we think may be treated as partaking both of the nature of a license for revenue and regulation; as such, however, we find nothing in the principle inimical to either the state or Federal Constitutions.

The fourth principal reason for which the act is thought to be unconstitutional is that it interferes with the right of trial by jury. It is said that the legislature cannot fix a procrustean rule for the admeasurement of damages arising from injuries received by one in the employment of another, as the employer and the employee alike have the right to submit to a jury both the question of the right to recover for any such injury, and the question of the amount that may be recovered therefor. But we cannot think the rule absolute. It may be that the legislature cannot fix the amount of recovery, or provide for an absolute recovery, in all cases where one person is injured by another, regardless of the relation of the parties, or the question whether the injury is or is not the result of negligence; but it does not follow that it may not so provide where the injury happens in that class of employments subject to legislative regulation and control. If it be as we have attempted to show, a proper regulation of hazardous industries to compel those engaged therein as owners or operators to pay a fixed sum into a fund to be used for the purpose of compensating the employees thereof for injuries received by them, it is difficult to understand why it is not also proper regulation to require the employees of such industries to accept a given sum for any injury they may receive while so engaged. The same power that authorizes the state to regulate the participation of the one in the particular industry would seem to authorize it to regulate the participation of the other therein. Theoretically, of course, the employer and employee, on entering into a contract by which the one engages the services of the other, stand on the same plane; but in practice, as it is well known, this ideal condition very seldom exists. Greed and sagacity on the one side, and necessity and incapacity on the other, sometimes lead to contracts that create conditions little short of peonage; and our own reports abound with instances where men have been induced to work in situations so dangerous to life and limb that the wonder is not that some of them were injured, but rather that any of them escaped injury. Indeed, it is a common thing for an employer, in defense of an action of damages brought by his employee for injury received in such a situation, to urge that the dangers of the place were so obvious and apparent that the employee was guilty of contributory negligence for working therein. These conditions, we think, authorize the interference of the legislature. The grounds upon which the employer may be held to contribute to a fund for the relief of all injuries sustained by his employees, whatever the cause, we have already stated. The obligation of the employee to accept the conditions of the statute can rest on like grounds; namely, the welfare of the state. The relation being one of contract between employer and employee, the state may make it a condition of the contract that the employee shall accept a fixed sum for any injury he may receive while engaged in the employment, whether the injury be the result of the inherent dangers of the employment or the result of some fault of his employer.

There is, of course, no direct authority supporting the contention that the right of trial by jury may be thus taken away. There are, however, cases maintaining principles more or less analogous to the principle thus involved. Of these State v. Buchanan, 29 Wash. 602, 59 L.R.A. 342, 92 Am. St. Rep. 930, 70 Pac. 52, and Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, are illustrative. In these cases it is held that the legislature may limit the number of hours a workman shall be permitted to labor in certain classes of employments, on the principle that to do so is to protect the health of the individual workman and thus contribute to the public welfare. If it be within the rule of the police powers of the state to interfere with the workman's personal freedom in this regard, it would seem to be no greater stretch of power to go one step further and provide that, if he be injured while so laboring, he shall receive a sure award in a limited sum as compensation for his injury, and in lieu thereof shall forego his common-law action in damages therefor.

The common-law system of making awards for personal injuries has no such inherent merit as to make a change undesirable. While courts have often said that the question of the amount of compensation to be awarded for a personal injury is one peculiarly within the province of the jury to determine, the remark has been induced rather because no better method for solving the problem is afforded by that system, than because of the belief that no better method could be devised. No one knows better than judges of courts of nisi prius and of review that the common-law method of making such awards, even in those instances to which it is applicable, proves in practice most unsatisfactory. All judges have been witnesses to extravagant awards made for most trivial injuries, and trivial awards made for injuries ruinous in their nature; and perhaps no verdicts of juries are interfered with so often by the courts as verdicts making awards in such cases. There is no standard of measurement that the court can submit to the jury by which they can determine the amount of the award. The test of reasonableness means but little to the ordinary juror. Unused as he is generally to witnessing the results of injuries, he is inclined to measure his verdict by the amount of disorder he observes, rather than by the actual amount of disablement the injury has caused. Nor is he aided in this respect by the testimony of medical experts. Conflicting as such testimony usually is, it tends rather to confuse than to enlighten him. Perhaps the whole difficulty lies in the fact that the question is too much one of opinion, and not enough of fact. It must be remembered also that the remedy afforded by the common law, as we have elsewhere remarked, can be applied only in a limited number of cases of injury,—cases where the injury is the result of negligence on the part of the employer, not contributed to by the employee. For the greater number of injuries the common law affords no remedy at all. For this unscientific system it is proposed to substitute a system which will make an award in all cases of injury, regardless of the cause or manner of its infliction; limited in amount, it is true, but commensurate in some degree to the disability suffered. The desirability of this substitution is unquestioned, and we believe that the legislature had the power to make it without violating any principle of the fundamental law.

The objection may be answered also in another way. The Constitution does not undertake to define what shall constitute a cause of action, nor to prohibit the legislature from so doing. The right of trial by jury, accorded by the Constitution, as applicable to civil cases, is incident only to causes of action recognized by law. The act here in question takes away the cause of action on the one hand, and the ground of defense on the other, and merges both in a statutory indemnity fixed and certain. If the power to do away with a cause of action in any case exists at all in the exercise of the police power of the state, then the right of trial by jury is thereafter no longer involved in such cases. The right of jury trial being incidental to the right of action, to destroy the one is to leave the other nothing upon which to operate.

The auditor also complains of the scheme adopted by the legislature for correcting the evil they have found to exist. It is said that the scheme is unduly cumbersome; that its administration will prove unnecessarily costly and burdensome to those whose interests are affected by it, and will lead to public and private abuses and consequent evils more dangerous to the state than the evil that it is sought to correct.

But the courts are slow to inquire into the mere wisdom of a statute. This question is so pre-eminently one of the law-making branch of the government that the courts will interfere only where there can be no two opinions as to the mischievous and evil tendencies of the act. The act in question here was framed by a commission composed of men eminent for their ability, who gave to the work extended consideration. It was selected by the legislature from among a number of proposed acts having a similar purpose, submitted for their examination, and this, too, after its supposed evil tendencies had been fully pointed out by the representatives of the different interests to be affected by it. In the light of these facts, the court cannot do otherwise than put it to the test of practice. Moreover, the question becomes one of less importance when it is remembered that the sessions of the legislature are sufficiently close together to enable that body to correct any evil influence the enforcement of the act may have before it becomes unduly harmful.

In the foregoing discussion we have not referred to the decision of the court of appeals of the state of New York in the case of Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 201 N. Y. 271, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, 94 N. E. 431, which holds the workmen's compensation act of that state to be in conflict with the due process of law clause of the state Constitution, and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The case has, however, been the subject of extended consideration in the briefs of counsel, and it is urged upon us by counsel for the auditor as conclusive of the questions at bar. The act the court there had in review is dissimilar in many respects to the act before us, and is perhaps less easily defended on economic grounds. The principle embodied in the statutes is, however, the same, and it must be conceded that the case is direct authority against the position we have here taken. We shall offer no criticism of the opinion. We will only say that notwithstanding the decision comes from the highest court of the first state of the Union, and is supported by a most persuasive argument, we have not been able to yield our consent to the view there taken.

We conclude, therefore, that the act in question violates no provision of either the state or Federal Constitutions, and that the auditor should give it effect. Let the writ issue.

Dunbar, Ch. J., and Crow, Morris, Ellis, Mount, Parker, and Gose, JJ., concur.

Chadwick, J., concurring:

This proceeding is prosecuted by the relator, a simple contract creditor of the state. There is no party in interest before us whose interest it is to challenge the act of the legislature. This is a moot case, pure and simple, and the right of the relator to recover is in no way affected by the constitutional questions raised by the parties and discussed by the court. The legislature having created the industrial insurance commission, its power to organize cannot be questioned by any one who is not affected by the terms of the law, and such expenses as it may incur are proper charges against the state, and may be collected without reference to the power of the commission to levy a tribute upon certain kinds of business, or to make disbursement of the funds under the provisions of the act.

Without questioning or discussing the conclusions of the court upon the first three propositions advanced, with all of which I agree, the fourth proposition should not now be decided for the very palpable reason that our decision is binding upon no one, not even upon the court. No one will contend that it is of any concern to a furniture dealer who is seeking to collect his account whether an injured workman is to be deprived of the right to submit his cause to a jury of his peers. The principle is too important to be mooted by the court, for some day a real party in interest will be before us,—either an employer who feels aggrieved at the operation of the law, or a workman who has received injuries which the accepted schedules will not compensate. And we will be put to the duty of deciding the case without reference to our present decision, so that the Federal questions involved may pass for final hearing to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The right to recover damages for personal injuries suffered in consequence of the negligence of another was an admitted right at common law, so that the question whether the 7th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which preserves the right of trial by jury in all cases maintainable at common law which are begun in the courts of the United States, would not compel a Federal court to ignore our statute, and the consequent question, whether a party assessed could be compelled to contribute to the indemnity fund unless he is to be protected from all suits of like character, becomes most material, and it is to be hoped that we will have an early opportunity to meet these issues in a proper case.

That the people of the state of Washington can take away a right of action, or abolish the right of trial by jury, I have no doubt; but whether the legislature can do so without the warrant of the whole people, expressed by way of amendment or repeal of §§ 3 and 21 of article 1 of the state Constitution, is a grave question which is not discussed in the opinion of the court. The right of trial by jury has ever been regarded as the very sinew of liberty. It was the cardinal principle of the great charter, and "it is worthy of note that all that is extant of the legislation of the Plymouth colony for the first five years consists of the single regulation 'that all criminal facts, and also all manner of trespasses and debts between man and man, shall be tried by the verdict of twelve honest men, to be impaneled by authority, in form of a jury, upon their oath.' 1 Palfrey's New England, 340." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 389, note.

The right is asserted in every state Constitution. Section 21, supra, provides that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." No distinction is made between civil and criminal cases; indeed, the additional text would indicate that no distinction was intended. This guaranty has been held by this court to apply to all civil-law actions maintainable at common law. State ex rel. Mullen v. Doherty, 16 Wash. 382, 58 Am. St. Rep. 39, 47 Pac. 958. I am a firm believer in trial by jury and am of equal faith that the will of the people, as declared in their written Constitution, is binding upon legislatures as well as courts, until the people, by like adoption, express a contrary will. We should not decide otherwise except at the suit of a proper party.

The present law seems to be greatly to the advantage of the employer, for whom an easy method of discharging an obligation to his injured employee is provided, but whether the legislature can take from the workman his right to have the amount of his compensation fixed by an authority less than the very people, who have said "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," is for future hearing.

I have not advanced these observations in the way of objections, for the result of the court's opinion is a consummation for which I have devoutly hoped; but to indicate merely that our decision upon the fourth proposition—the right of trial by jury—is not settled by this decision, and should not be so regarded; and further, in the event that it be finally held that a jury trial cannot be dispensed with, under our present Constitution, that the objection may be easily overcome without doing violence to the purpose or principle of the act, and without amendment to the Constitution, by providing that, in the event of a dispute as to the amount of compensation, a jury shall be called to try that issue, and that its verdict shall be conclusive.

Upon the fourth proposition, therefore, I reserve my opinion until such time as its expression will have the force of law.

There being no question that the relator has a right to recover the amount due on its account, it follows that the writ should issue.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

EDWARD G. BORGNIS et al., Respts.,
v.

FALK COMPANY, Appt.

(147 Wis. 327, 133 N. W. 209.)

Courts — power to decide incidental questions.

1. The court may determine the question of the constitutionality of a statute, although it is not absolutely necessary to the disposition of the cause, if it is involved in the suit, and the settlement of the question is one of public importance.

Statutes — validity — public policy.

2. A constitutional statute cannot be declared inoperative because opposed to public policy.

Same — discrimination — classification.

3. A statute is not invalid as conferring unequal privileges and immunities, which abolishes the doctrines of assumption of risk and fellow service in actions to hold employers liable for personal injuries to their servants, in cases where employers refuse to take advantage of the act, but preserves them intact to those who come under the law.

Same — fewness of employees.

4. A statute is not invalid for unconstitutional discrimination, which abolishes the doctrines of fellow service and assumption of risk in actions to hold employers liable for negligent injuries to their employees, except in cases of persons employing less than four servants.

Statutes — abolishing assumption of risk and fellow service doctrine — coercion.

5. A section of the workmen's compensation act, abolishing the defenses of assumption of risk and fellow service in actions to hold employers liable for personal injuries to servants, in cases where the provisions of the act are not accepted, cannot be said to make the act coercive upon every employer or employee, so as to raise the question of the constitutionality of such abolition, on the theory that the employer will be compelled to accept the statute to escape such defenses, and the employee will be compelled to do so to avoid dismissal from service.

Note. — The constitutionality of workmen's compensation legislation is discussed in the note to State ex rel. Davis-Smith Co. v. Clausen, ante, 466, and the note to Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162. And see State ex rel. Davis-Smith Co. v. Clausen and note, ante, 466, as to constitutionality of industrial insurance.

Courts — industrial accident board — validity.

6. Providing for the submission to an administrative board of the questions of fact in case of a dispute as to the amount to be awarded an injured employee under a workmen's compensation act, which has power to award the amount due as provided by the statute, which award, under certain circumstances, may be reviewed by the courts, does not, where the jurisdiction of the commission depends on the consent of parties, and the question of consent is subject to review by the courts, render the commission a court, and the statute void on the theory that the legislature has no constitutional power to create courts.

Same — jurisdiction — review of action of board.

7. Authority to test the jurisdiction of a commission, which depends upon consent of the parties to be affected by its action, is conferred by a statute empowering the court to set aside the award in case the board acted without or in excess of its powers.

Arbitration — ousting courts of jurisdiction — validity.

8. An employer and employee may stipulate to arbitrate the extent of injury or disability caused by a personal injury to the employee in the performance of his duties, if the question as to the fundamental rights of the parties as to recovery is left open to the courts.

Municipal corporations — paying injured employees — due process of law.

9. Requiring municipal corporations to compensate all workmen injured in their employ does not require taxes to be levied for other than public purposes, or deprive taxpayers of their property without due process of law.

Master — compensation act — action of administrative board — notice.

10. Permitting an administrative board which acts only by consent of the parties interested, to take testimony without notice to either party, and to give notices by mail, does not deprive the parties of due process of law.

Same — determination for minor employee — validity.

11. An employees' compensation act is not invalid because it gives the employers the right to determine whether or not minors rightfully employed by them shall have the benefit of the act, in the same way that they determine the matter for adult employees.

Contract — impairment of obligation — option to change.

12. No contract right is impaired by making applicable to existing contracts which are to terminate in the future, an employees' indemnity act which gives the employees an option to take advantage of it, or to stand on their common-law right, under the contract, to maintain an action to redress an injury received in the employment.

Injunction — against adoption of statutory benefit — remedy at law.

13. Injunction will not lie to prevent an employer from accepting the benefits of an employees' indemnity act, where there is an adequate remedy at law for any injury which may come to the employees thereby.

(November 14, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in complainants' favor in a suit to enjoin defendant from electing to become subject to the workmen's compensation act during the continuance of complainants' contracts of employment. Reversed.

Statement by Winslow, Ch. J.:

It appears by the complaint that the defendant is a manufacturing corporation in Milwaukee, employing at its shops many workmen, among whom are the plaintiffs; the plaintiff Borgnis is the superintendent of one of the departments in the defendant's establishment, at a salary of $2,000 per year, under a contract extending some time in the future; the plaintiff Schumacher is an infant seventeen years of age, employed under an apprenticeship contract which has yet nearly three years to run. The complaint further alleges that the defendant threatens to file an election to become subject to the provisions of chapter 50 of the Laws of 1911, known as the "workmen's compensation act;" that such election will compel the plaintiff severally to withdraw from their said contracts, or to submit to the provisions of said act; and that hence said election will thus work irreparable injury to the plaintiffs, for which they have no adequate remedy at law. The prayer is that the defendant be enjoined from filing such election during the continuance of the contracts. By answer the defendant admitted the allegations of the complaint, except the allegations of irreparable injury and absence of an adequate remedy at law, which were denied, and as an affirmative defense alleged that the act in question was null and void, because it violates a number of specified articles of the Constitutions of the state and of the United States, and hence that the defendant's election to become subject to the act could not possibly work any injury to the plaintiffs. Upon motion, judgment was entered upon the pleadings enjoining the defendant from electing to become subject to the act during the continuance of the plaintiffs' contracts, and the defendant appeals.

Messrs. Carpenter & Poss, for appellant:

Plaintiffs could not suffer any damage by the defendant's election, since that election would be of no effect, the law itself being unconstitutional.

Where parts of a law are unconstitutional, and the connection is such as to warrant the belief that the legislature would not have passed the valid parts alone, the whole act should be held invalid.

It was entirely competent for the legislature to abolish these defenses in the manner provided, and to make the abrogation thereof conditional upon the election of the employer to accept the immunities afforded him by the compensatory provisions of the act. The influence exercised by the act in this respect is not coercive, although it may have a persuasive effect.

Messrs. C. H. Crownhart, Joseph D. Beck, and John R. Commons, Industrial Commission, in propria persona.

Winslow, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are not certainly advised as to the exact ground on which the decision below was reached, but we assume that it was on the theory that the law in question was a valid law; and that it was retrospective in its effect; and that if the defendant elected to become subject to the act, the plaintiffs would be compelled to breach their existing contracts, or submit to the terms of the act, and thus lose valuable rights; and hence that equity might and should restrain their employer from electing to come under the law until their existing contracts had expired.

It seems to be true that this action might very well be disposed of without considering the question of the validity of the act in question. Ordinarily, under such circumstances, that course would be the proper one to pursue, for the question of the constitutionality of a statute passed by the legislature is not one to be lightly taken up, and generally such a question will not be decided unless it be necessary to decide it in order to dispose of the case. There are circumstances here present, however, which seem to call very loudly for immediate consideration of the question of the validity of the act in question, if under any view of the case it can be considered as involved. The legislature, in response to a public sentiment which cannot be mistaken, has passed a law which attempts to solve certain very pressing problems which have arisen out of the changed industrial conditions of our time. It has endeavored by this law to provide a way by which employer and employed may, if they so choose, escape entirely from that very troublesome and economically absurd luxury known as "personal injury litigation," and resort to a system by which every employee not guilty of wilful misconduct may receive at once a reasonable recompense for injuries accidentally received in his employment, under certain fixed rules, without a lawsuit and without friction.

A considerable number of employers have accepted the terms of the act, but unquestionably many are waiting until the question of the constitutionality of the act be authoritatively settled by this court. Nor is this attitude either blameworthy or surprising. If an employer elects to accept the act, and proceeds to pay out the sums which it requires for a year or more, and then the act should be declared unconstitutional, it might well be that he would have paid out considerable sums which, under the former system, he would not be required to pay at all, because he was not negligent; and that he would also be subject to suits to recover additional sums by those who, without contributory negligence, had suffered injury and had received compensation under the law. The situation is unquestionably one of much doubt and uncertainty among the great industries of the state, and it must remain such until this court has spoken. Many employers of labor who have not accepted the law have taken that course, not because they have chosen definitely to decline the terms of the law, but because they do not know whether they will be protected if they accept and act under it. Such a condition of uncertainty ought not to be allowed to exist, if it can be removed. This court cannot properly decide questions which are not legitimately involved in bona fide lawsuits, but it may properly decide all questions which are so involved, even though it be not absolutely essential to the result that all should be decided. The validity of the statute in question is a matter which may be legitimately considered in the decision of this case. If the statute be unconstitutional and void, then it is certain that the plaintiffs have no cause of action, because an election to accept the terms of a void statute could harm no one. Impressed with this view of our duty under the circumstances, we advanced the present case upon the calendar, and invited argument upon the main question as to the constitutionality of the statute, not only from the attorney general on behalf of the state, but from any attorney interested in the question. In pursuance of this invitation the attorney general and the industrial commission filed briefs, and oral argument was made by the deputy attorney general. The case has been fully presented, therefore, both by brief and argument, and we are now to consider whether there be any solid foundation for the attack made upon the law. In undertaking this task, it will be necessary first to set forth in some detail its fundamental provisions.

It adds thirty-two new sections to the statutes, the first eight of which sections are as follows:

"Sec. 2394—1. In any action to recover damages for a personal injury sustained within this state by an employee while engaged in the line of his duty as such, or for death resulting from personal injury so sustained, in which recovery is sought upon the ground of want of ordinary care of the employer, or of any officer, agent, or servant of the employer, it shall not be a defense:

"1. That the employee either expressly or impliedly assumed the risk of the hazard complained of.

"2. When such employer has, at the time of the accident, in a common employment four or more employees, that the injury or death was caused in whole or in part by the want of ordinary care of a fellow servant.

"Any employer who has elected to pay compensation as hereinafter provided shall not be subject to the provisions of this section, 2394—1.

"Sec. 2394—2. No contract, rule, or regulation shall exempt the employer from any of the provisions of the preceding section of this act.

"Sec. 2394—3. Except as regards employees working in shops or offices of a railroad company, who are within the provisions of subsection 9 of § 1816 of the statutes, as amended by chapter 254 of the Laws of 1907, the term 'employer' as used in the two preceding sections of this act shall not include any railroad company as defined in subsection 7 as said § 1816 as amended, said § 1816 and amendatory acts being continued in force unaffected, except as aforesaid, by the preceding sections of this act.

"Sec. 2394—4. Liability for the compensation hereinafter provided for, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, shall exist against an employer for any personal injury accidentally sustained by his employee, and for his death, if the injury shall proximately cause death, in those cases where the following conditions of compensation concur:

"1. Where, at the time of the accident, both the employer and employee are subject to the provisions of this act according to the succeeding sections hereof.

"2. Where, at the time of the accident, the employee is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment.

"3. Where the injury is proximately caused by accident, and is not so caused by wilful misconduct.

"And where such conditions of compensation exist for any personal injury or death, the right to the recovery of such compensation pursuant to the provisions of this act, and acts amendatory thereof, shall be the exclusive remedy against the employer for such injury or death; in all other cases the liability of the employer shall be the same as if this and the succeeding sections of this act had not been passed, but shall be subject to the provisions of the preceding sections of this act.

"Sec. 2394—5. The following shall constitute employers subject to the provisions of this act, within the meaning of the preceding section:

"1. The state, and each county, city, town, village, and school district therein.

"2. Every person, firm, and private corporation (including any public service corporation) who has any person in service under any contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, and who, at or prior to the time of the accident to the employee for which compensation under this act may be claimed, shall, in the manner provided for in the next section, have elected to become subject to the provisions of this act, and who shall not prior to such accident, have effected a withdrawal of such election, in the manner provided in the next section.

"Sec. 2394—6. Such election on the part of the employer shall be made by filing with the industrial accident board, hereinafter provided for, a written statement to the effect that he accepts the provisions of this act, and filing of which statement shall operate, within the meaning of § 2394—5 of this act, to subject such employer to the provisions of this act and all acts amendatory thereof for the term of one year from the date of the filing of such statement, and thereafter, without further act on his part, for successive terms of one year each, unless such employer shall, at least sixty days prior to the expiration of such first or any succeeding year, file in the office of said board a notice in writing to the effect that he desires to withdraw his election to be subject to the provisions of the act.

"Sec. 2394—7. The term 'employee' as used in § 2394—4 of this act shall be construed to mean:

"1. Every person in the service of the state, or of any county, city, town, village, or school district therein, under any appointment, or contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, except any official of the state, or of any county, city, town, village, or school district therein, provided that one employed by a contractor, who has contracted with a county, city, town, village, school district, or the state, through its representatives, shall not be considered an employee of the state, county, city, town, village, or school district which made the contract.

"2. Every person in the service of another under any contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, including aliens, and also including minors who are legally permitted to work under the laws of the state (who, for the purposes of the next section of this act, shall be considered the same, and shall have the same power of contracting, as adult employees), but not including any person whose employment is but casual, or is not in the usual course of the trade, business, profession, or occupation of his employer.

"Sec. 2394—8. Any employee as defined in subsection 1 of the preceding section shall be subject to the provisions of this act and of any act amendatory thereof. Any employee as defined in subsection 2 of the preceding section shall be deemed to have accepted, and shall, within the meaning of § 2394—4 of this act, be subject to, the provisions of this act and of any act amendatory thereof, if, at the time of the accident upon which liability is claimed:

"1. The employer charged with such liability is subject to the provisions of this act, whether the employee has actual notice thereof or not; and

"2. Such employee shall not, at the time of entering into his contract of hire, express or implied, with such employer, have given to his employer notice in writing that he elects not to be subject to the provisions of this act; or, in the event that such contract of hire was made in advance of such employer becoming subject to the provisions of the act, such employee shall have given to his employer notice in writing that he elects to be subject to such provisions or, without giving either of such notices, shall have remained in the service of such employer for thirty days after the employer has filed with said board an election to be subject to the terms of this act."

Sections 2394—9 and 2394—10 contain schedules fixing the amounts to be paid by way of compensation in case of disability or death where liability exists under the act, define and classify dependents, and lay down rules for determining the weekly and annual earnings of the injured or deceased employee. Section 2394—11 requires the giving of a notice in writing within thirty days after the accident, as a condition precedent to the recovery of compensation under the act. Section 2394—12 requires that the injured party shall submit to examination by a physician upon request of the employer, or when required by the industrial accident board, and provides a penalty for refusal so to do. Sections 2394—13 and 2394—14 create an industrial accident board of five members, and define generally the methods of procedure of such board. The next seven sections are as follows:

"Sec. 2394—15. Any dispute or controversy concerning compensation under this act, including any in which the state may be a party, shall be submitted to said industrial accident board in the manner and with the effect provided in this act. Every compromise of any claim for compensation under this act shall be subject to be reviewed by, and set aside, modified, or confirmed by, the board, upon application made within one year from the time of such compromise.

"Sec. 2394—16. Upon the filing with the board by any party in interest, of an application in writing stating the general nature of any claim as to which any dispute or controversy may have arisen, which shall fix a time for the hearing thereof, which shall not be more than forty days after the filing of such application. The board shall cause notice of such hearing, embracing a general statement of such claim, to be given to each party interested, by service of such notice on him personally, or by mailing a copy thereof to him at his last known postoffice address at least ten days before such hearing. Such hearing may be adjourned from time to time in the discretion of the board, and hearings may be held at such places as the board shall designate. Either party shall have the right to be present at any hearing, in person or by attorney, or any other agent, and to present such testimony as may be pertinent to the controversy before the board; but the board may, with or without notice to either party, cause testimony to be taken, or an inspection of the premises where the injury occurred to be had, or the time books and pay roll of the employer to be examined by any member of the board or any examiner appointed by it, and may from time to time direct any employee claiming compensation to be examined by a regular physician; the testimony so taken, and the results of any such inspection or examination, to be reported to the board for its consideration upon final hearing. The board, or any member thereof, or any examiner appointed thereby, shall have power and authority to issue subpoenas, to compel the attendance of witnesses or parties, and the production of books, papers, or records, and to administer oaths. Obedience to such subpoenas shall be enforced by the circuit court of any county.

"Sec. 2394—17. After final hearing by said board, it shall make and file (1) its findings upon all the facts involved in the controversy, and (2) its award, which shall state its determination as to the rights of the parties. Pending the hearing and determination of any controversy before it, the board shall have power to order the payment of such, or any part, of the compensation, which is or may fall due, as to which the party from whom the same is claimed does not deny liability in good faith within ten days after the giving of notice of hearing provided for in the preceding section; and if the same shall not be paid as required by such order, the facts with respect to the liability therefor, and the determination of the board as to the rights of the parties, shall be embraced in, and constitute a part of, its finding and award; and the board shall have the power to include in its award as a penalty for noncompliance with any such order, not exceeding 25 per cent of each amount which shall not have been paid as directed thereby.

"Sec. 2394—18. Either party may present a certified copy of the award to the circuit court for any county, whereupon said court shall, without notice, render a judgment in accordance therewith, which judgment, until and unless set aside as hereinafter provided, shall have the same effect as though duly rendered in an action duly tried and determined by said court, and shall, with like effect, be entered and docketed.

"Sec. 2394—19. The findings of fact made by the board acting within its powers shall in the absence of fraud, be conclusive; and the award, whether judgment has been rendered thereon or not, shall be subject to review only in the manner and upon the grounds following: Within twenty days from the date of the award, any party aggrieved thereby may commence, in the circuit court for Dane county, an action against the board for the review of such award, in which action the adverse party shall also be made defendant. In such action a complaint which shall state the grounds upon which a review is sought shall be served with the summons. Service upon the secretary of the board or any member of the board shall be deemed completed service. The board shall serve its answer within twenty days after the service of the complaint, and, within the like time such adverse party shall, if he so desires, serve his answer to said complaint. With its answer, the board shall make return to said court of all documents and papers on file in the matter, and of all testimony which may have been taken therein, and of its findings and award. Said action may thereupon be brought on for hearing before said court upon such record by either party on ten days' notice to the other, subject, however, to the provisions of law for a change of the place of trial or the calling in of another judge. Upon such hearing, the court may confirm or set aside such award, and any judgment which may theretofore have been rendered thereon; but the same shall be set aside only upon the following grounds:

"1. That the board acted without or in excess of its powers.

"2. That the award was procured by fraud.

"3. That the findings of fact by the board do not support the award.

"Sec. 2394—20. Upon the setting aside of any award, the court may recommit the controversy and remand the record in the case to the board, for further hearing or proceedings; or it may enter the proper judgment upon the findings, as the nature of the case shall demand. An abstract of the judgment entered by the trial court upon the review of any award shall be made by the clerk thereof upon the docket entry of any judgment which may theretofore have been rendered upon such award, and transcripts of such abstract may thereupon be obtained for like entry upon the dockets of the courts of other counties.

"Sec. 2394—21. Said board, or any party aggrieved by a judgment entered upon the review of any award, may appeal therefrom within the time and in the manner provided for an appeal from the orders of the circuit court; but all such appeals shall be placed on the calendar of the supreme court, and brought to a hearing in the same manner as state causes on such calendar."

Section 2394—22 regulates officers' fees, costs, and attorneys' fees in the prosecution of claims; § 2394—23 prevents assignment of the claim before payment, and exempts the claim from being taken for debt; § 2394—24 gives the claim preference over unsecured debts of the employer contracted after the passage of the law; § 2394—25 provides that the making of a claim under the act shall operate to assign to the employer any cause of action in tort which the employee might have against a third party for the injury; § 2394—26 provides that the act shall not affect insurance companies, nor existing contracts of insurance, nor the right of the employer to insure against liability, and contains other clauses respecting the effect of amounts received by the employee, by way of insurance or benefits; § 2394—27 makes all contracts of insurance subject to the provisions of the act; § 2394—28 provides that the employer may be relieved from liability under the act in a given case, either (1) by depositing the present value of the total unpaid compensation, computing interest at 3 per cent per annum, with a trust company to be designated by the board, or (2) by the purchase of an annuity approved by the board; § 2394—29 requires the printing and furnishing of forms for the transaction of the business and the keeping of records by the board, and requires the board to post or publish notices of the employer's election to come under the act; § 2394—30 appropriates a sufficient sum to carry out the provisions of the act; and § 2394—31 repeals all inconsistent acts. Section 2394—32 is as follows:

"Sec. 2394—32. The legislature intends the contingency in subdivision 2 of § 2394—1 of this act, to be a separable part thereof, and the subdivision likewise separable from the rest of the act, and that part of said § 2394—1 that follows subdivision 2, likewise separable from the rest of the act; so that any part of said subdivision, or the whole, or that part which follows said subdivision 2, may fail without affecting any other part of the act."

By a later act passed at the same session of the legislature (chapter 485, Laws of 1911) an industrial commission composed of three members was created, which, among numerous other duties, is required to perform all the duties vested in the industrial accident board aforesaid, and thus the last-named board has passed out of existence. Re Filer & S. Co. 146 Wis. 629, 132 N. W. 584. The act is quite long, as the complicated and delicate subject with which it deals manifestly requires, but its general purport and effect so far as this case is concerned may be briefly summarized:

It creates an administrative board to carry its provisions into effect. It divides all private employers of labor into two classes: (1) Those who elect to come under the law; and (2) those who do not so elect. It takes away the defenses of assumption of risk, and negligence of a coemployee from the second class (except that where there are less than four coemployees, the latter defense is not disturbed), but leaves both defenses intact to the first class. It prescribes the manner in which an employer may elect to come under it terms, and how an employee may make his election, and when silence on the part of the employee will be considered an election; but it does not in terms compel either employer or employee to submit to its provisions. It then provides a comprehensive scheme by which, after both parties have so elected, any substantial injury, whether the result be fatal or not, received by the employee in the course of or incidental to his employment (except those caused by wilful misconduct), shall be compensated for by the employer according to certain definite rules, which rules are to be administered by the administrative board aforesaid, by means of simple procedure definitely laid down, which gives to both parties fair notice and hearing, and results in findings and an award which may be filed in the circuit court and become a judgment. It further provides that the findings of fact shall be conclusive, and the award subject to review only by action in the circuit court for Dane county, in which it can be set aside only (1) if the commission acted without or in excess of its powers; (2) if the award was procured by fraud; or (3) if the award is not supported by the findings of fact. It then provides that the judgment thus rendered shall be subject to appeal to the supreme court.

For all the essential purposes of this discussion, it may truly be said that this is the law which is before us, and the question is simply whether there is any vital part of it which the legislature may not enact because the Constitution forbids it. It is matter of common knowledge that this law forms the legislative response to an emphatic, if not a peremptory, public demand. It was admitted by lawyers, as well as laymen, that the personal injury action brought by the employee against his employer to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the employer had wholly failed to meet or remedy a great economic and social problem which modern industrialism has forced upon us, namely, the problem of who shall make pecuniary recompense for the toll of suffering and death which that industrialism levies, and must continue to levy, upon the civilized world. This problem is distinctly a modern problem. In the days of manual labor, the small shop with few employees, and the stagecoach, there was no such problem, or, if there was, it was almost negligible. Accidents there were in those days, and distressing ones; but they were relatively few, and the employee who exercised any reasonable degree of care was comparatively secure from injury. There was no army of injured and dying, with constantly swelling ranks, marching with halting step and dimming eyes to the great hereafter. This is what we have with us now, thanks to the wonderful material progress of our age, and this is what we shall have with us for many a day to come. Legislate as we may in the line of stringent requirements for safety devices or the abolition of employers' common-law defenses, the army of the injured will still increase, and the price of our manufacturing greatness will still have to be paid in human blood and tears. To speak of the common-law personal injury action as a remedy for this problem is to jest with serious subjects, to give a stone to one who asks for bread. The terrible economic waste, the overwhelming temptation to the commission of perjury, and the relatively small proportion of the sums recovered which comes to the injured parties in such actions, condemn them as wholly inadequate to meet the difficulty.

In approaching the consideration of the present law, we must bear in mind the well-established principle that it must be sustained, unless it be clear beyond reasonable question that it violates some constitutional limitation or prohibition. That governments founded on written constitutions which are made difficult of amendment or change lose much in flexibility and adaptability to changed conditions there can be no doubt. Indeed that may be said to be one purpose of the written constitution. Doubtless they gain enough in stability and freedom from mere whimsical and sudden changes to more than make up for the loss in flexibility; but the loss still remains, whether for good or ill. A constitution is a very human document, and must embody with greater or less fidelity the spirit of the time of its adoption. It will be framed to meet the problems and difficulties which face the men who make it, and it will generally crystallize with more or less fidelity the political, social, and economic propositions which are considered irrefutable, if not actually inspired, by the philosophers and legislators of the time; but the difficulty is that, while the constitution is fixed or very hard to change, the conditions and problems surrounding the people, as well as their ideals, are constantly changing. The political or philosophical aphorism of one generation is doubted by the next, and entirely discarded by the third. The race moves forward constantly, and no Canute can stay its progress.

Constitutional commands and prohibitions, either distinctly laid down in express words or necessarily implied from general words, must be obeyed, and imple-itly obeyed, so long as they remain unamended or unrepealed. Any other course on the part of either legislator or judge constitutes violation of his oath of office; but when there is no such express command or prohibition, but only general language, or a general policy drawn from the four corners of the instrument, what shall be said about this? By what standards is this general language or general policy to be interpreted and applied to present-day people and conditions? When an eighteenth century constitution forms the charter of liberty of a twentieth century government, must its general provisions be construed and interpreted by an eighteenth century mind in the light of eighteenth century conditions and ideals? Clearly not. This were to command the race to halt in its progress, to stretch the state upon a veritable bed of procrustes.

Where there is no express command or prohibition, but only general language or policy to be considered, the conditions prevailing at the time of its adoption must have their due weight; but the changed social, economic, and governmental conditions and ideals of the time, as well as the problems which the changes have produced, must also logically enter into the consideration, and become influential factors in the settlement of problems of construction and interpretation. These general propositions are here laid down, not because they are considered either new or in serious controversy, but because they are believed to be peculiarly applicable to a case like the present, where a law which is framed to meet new economic conditions, and difficulties resulting therefrom, is attacked principally because it is believed to offend against constitutional guaranties or prohibitions couched in general terms, or supposed general policies drawn from the whole body of the instrument.

Passing to the consideration of the contentions made in the present case, we note in limine that this is not a compulsory law. No employer is compelled to pay damages to an employee without having had his day in court. It is true that the argument is made that the law is practically coercive; but that argument is not regarded by us as sound, and will be taken up and treated later in this opinion. We are therefore relieved from all consideration of the question whether a compulsory compensation act offends against those clauses of the state and Federal Constitutions which guarantee all citizens against the deprivation of property without due process of law. This would be a question of greater difficulty than those which are presented in the present case. It was decided in the affirmative by the court of appeals of New York (Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co. 201 N. Y. 271, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162, 94 N. E. 431), and in the negative by the supreme court of Washington (State ex rel. Davis-Smith Co. v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, ante, 466, 117 Pac. 1101), and we express no opinion upon it.

The contention which naturally seems to come first in order is the objection that the whole first section, abolishing the defenses of assumption of risk and negligence of a fellow servant, is void, because, as it is said, public policy does not require their abrogation in any but the hazardous trades; it being admitted that in these last-named trades these defenses may properly be abolished.

The term "public policy" is frequently used very vaguely, and evidently is so used here. It is, however, quite a definite thing. Public policy on a given subject is determined either by the Constitution itself or by statutes passed within constitutional limitations. In the absence of such constitutional or statutory determination only may the decisions of the courts determine it. Hartford L. Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 L.R.A. 193, 17 C. C. A. 62, 36 U. S. App. 152, 70 Fed. 201; s. c., 175 U. S. 91, 44 L. ed. 84, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33. This court has said: "We know of no ground upon which a constitutional legislative enactment can be rightly spoken of as contrary to public policy." Julien v. Model Bldg. Loan & Invest. Asso. 116 Wis. 79, 61 L.R.A. 668, 92 N. W. 561. And the remark is certainly correct. When acting within constitutional limitations, the legislature settles and declares the public policy of a state, and not the court. True, where the legislature has not spoken on a subject, and the courts, in the course of their duty, have declared the principle of common law applicable thereto, public policy may be truly said to be thus created; but any public policy thus created by the courts may be at any time reversed or changed by the legislature, provided it act within constitutional lines. The people, acting directly by means of a referendum, or through their representatives in constitutional conventions or legislative bodies, are the makers of public policy, and it is only when the people have failed to speak in these methods that the courts can be said to have power to make public policy by decision. A constitutional statute cannot be contrary to public policy,—it is public policy.

The contention that a statute is unconstitutional because it is against public policy amounts to nothing more than a contention that it is unconstitutional; hence we address ourselves directly to that question, and thereby gain something in clearness of thought.

The two defenses which the legislature has thus attempted to take away are not intrenched behind any express constitutional provision, nor were they originally created by legislative action. They were both evolved by the courts. At a time when industries of all kinds were comparatively simple and free from danger, when employees of a common master were few in number and generally acquainted with each other, and when a personal injury action was a rarity, it was thought not to be unreasonable that an employee should assume those simple risks which were plainly before him, and should not be heard to complain if he were injured by the careless act of a fellow workman by whose side he had continued to work when he must have well known the nature and habits of the man. The precedent once made was generally followed, until it became buttressed by a multitude of decisions in practically all of the jurisdictions whose jurisprudence is founded upon the English common law. But, as has been pointed out earlier in this opinion, the conditions surrounding employer and employed have vastly changed during the last half century, and now the legislature, having become convinced that new conditions call for a change in rules of liability, have declared that such a change shall be made. They have changed the rule established by the courts, because they deem another rule better fitted to deal with the problems of the time, or, in other words, because they deem it best to establish a changed public policy.

It is frankly admitted by appellant that it is within the legislative power to make this change with regard to the hazardous trades, but not with regard to what are called the nonhazardous trades. But why not? There are, of course, some occupations which are exceptionally hazardous, and it may well be that it would be within legislative discretion to classify these very hazardous occupations and remove the defenses as to them, while retaining them as to others less hazardous. Indeed, that very thing has been done, and has been approved by the courts in this and many other states, especially in the case of railroads and to some extent with other industries. Minnesota Iron Co. v. Kline, 199 U. S. 593, 50 L. ed. 322, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159; Wis. Stat. § 1816, as amended by chapter 254, Laws 1907; Kiley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 142 Wis. 154, 125 N. W. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But because there is room for classification it does not follow that legislation without classification is unconstitutional. There are hazards in all occupations; indeed, they follow every man from the cradle to the grave. What constitutional requirement, either express or implied, clothes these court-made defenses with exceptional sanctity as to the less hazardous industries, and warns off from them the sacreligious hand of the legislature? We are referred to none, and we know of none. It is admitted in the Ives Case, supra, that both the fellow servant defense and the contributory negligence defense, being of judicial origin, may be changed or abolished by the legislature. See also Opinion of Justices of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court on the Personal Injuries Act of 1911, 209 Mass. 607, 96 N. E. 308. We see absolutely no ground for the contention that these defenses may be lawfully abrogated as to the more hazardous industries, but must be forever held sacred as to the less hazardous industries. There may be a less persuasive reason for the change in the case of the latter class of industries, but this does not deprive the legislature of the power to make it.

But it is said that there is no proper classification here, and hence that the law is fatally discriminating in its character. The two defenses are preserved intact to employers who elect to come under the law, and taken away from those who do not so elect. The rules governing classification are familiar, and are in brief as follows: It must be based on substantial distinctions which make real differences; it must be germane to the purposes of the law; it must not be limited to existing conditions only, and must apply equally to each member of the class. It seems to us that this classification fully meets these requirements; certainly there will be very real differences between the situation of the employer who elects to come under the law and the employer who does not. If the consenting employer only employs workmen who also elect to come under the law, he can never be mulcted in heavy damages, and will know whenever an employee is injured practically just what must be paid for the injury. Surely this is a different situation from the situation of the man who is liable to be brought into court by an injured employee at any time, and obliged to defend common-law actions upon heavy claims unliquidated in their character, the outcome of which actions none can foretell. On the other hand, if, as seems quite likely, the greater part of the consenting employer's workmen consent, but some do not, and these latter are still retained in the employment, the same considerations will apply with somewhat less force. On the one hand, there is a class of consenting employers employing wholly or largely consenting workmen, and having definite and fixed obligations to their workmen in case of injury; on the other hand is a class of nonconsenting employers who have no such fixed obligations in case of injury to their workmen, but choose to meet every such workman in court and fight out the question of liability. There seems a very robust difference between these two classes. But after all there is another distinction which seems perhaps more satisfactory. The consenting employer has done his share, and it must be considered a considerable share, in rendering successful the legislative attempt to meet and solve a difficult social and economic problem. Even if it be true (which, as before stated, is not decided) that he may not be compelled under our Constitutions, state and national, to assist in the solution of this problem, still does not his voluntary act in giving that assistance constitute a substantial distinction, making a real difference of situation between him and the employer who refuses his aid,—a difference which justifies a difference in treatment?

It seems to us that this question must be answered in the affirmative, and if it be so answered there can be no doubt as to the legitimacy of the classification, for the reason that it is quite apparent that the other conditions of valid classification are fully satisfied. There can be no doubt that the classification is germane to the purpose of the law, and it is not limited in its application to existing conditions only, and applies equally to each member of the class.

The minor classification, by which the fellow servant defense is preserved to all employers employing less than four employees in a common employment, is also attacked as having no proper legal basis; but it seems to us that the grounds of classification here are more persuasive even than in the case just discussed. The man who is employed with one or two other men in a given employment in all reasonable probability knows their characteristics well, and will probably be with them a great part of the time. He will have ample opportunity to form a just judgment as to the risk of injury from their negligence which he will run if he works with them, and will be enabled to shape his own conduct accordingly; but the man who is one of a large number of men, many of whom he never sees, and some of these latter having duties to perform in distant places, upon the due performance of which his own safety depends, has no opportunity to acquire any accurate knowledge of the characteristics of many of his fellow workmen, and cannot intelligently decide what risk he runs at the hands of such distant and unknown employees. The difference in situation is not merely fanciful; it is real. In one case, the employee knows or has the means of knowing what to expect from his collaborators; in the other case, he has neither the knowledge nor the means of knowledge. Of course, there will be cases on the border line, where the difference in situation will be very slight, or perhaps entirely nonexistent. There will probably be no practical difference between the situation of the man who is one of four or five employees in a given employment and the situation of the man who is one of three; but this does not militate against the legitimacy of the classification. This is a necessary defect in all cases of classification based upon numbers. The question is not whether there may be some on one side of the line whose situation is practically the same as that of some on the other side, but whether there "is the distinction between the classes as classes, whether there are characteristics which, in a greater degree, persist through the one class than in the other which justify legal discrimination between them." State v. Evans, 130 Wis. 381, 110 N. W. 241.

Passing from these questions of classification, we meet the objection that the law, while in its words presenting to employer and employee a free choice as to whether he will accept its terms or not, is in fact coercive, so that neither employer nor employee can be said to act voluntarily in accepting it. As to the employer, the argument is that the abolition of the two defenses is a club which forces him to accept; and as to the employee, the argument is that if his employer accepts the law, the employee will feel compelled to accept also, through fear of discharge if he do not accept.

Both of these arguments are based upon conjecture. Laws cannot be set aside upon mere speculation or conjecture. The court must be able to say with certainty that an unlawful result will follow. We do not see how any such thing can be said here. No one can say with certainty what results will follow in the practical workings of the law. It may well be that many manufacturers, especially those employing small numbers of employees and in the less dangerous trades, will deliberately conclude that it will be better business policy to exercise greater care in guarding their employees from possible danger, and greater discrimination in the employment of careful men, and reject the law entirely, running the risk of being able to prevent all or nearly all accidents. It seems extremely probable that the great bulk of workmen, especially of the unskilled classes, will be glad to come under the act and thus secure a certain compensation in case of injury, in place of that very uncertain and expensive thing, namely, the final result of a lawsuit; but whether this be so or not, it may be considered as reasonably certain that very many will elect to come under the act voluntarily and freely, and that those who do not will probably come from the ranks of skilled labor, who will deem the rates of compensation under the law as entirely inadequate, or will be careful workmen in the less dangerous trades, who will see no gain in bartering their common-law rights for the restricted remedies furnished by the statute. It cannot be said with any certainty that such men will be discharged for their failure to voluntarily come under the law. The probability would seem rather to be that they would be of a class which the employer would wish to keep in his employ, notwithstanding their attitude toward the law. These matters are, however, purely speculative and conjectural. None can say what the practical operation of the law will be. It is enough for our present purpose that no one can say with certainty that it will operate to coerce either employer or employee.

We thus reach the conclusion that there are no valid constitutional objections to the first section of the law in question, and this conclusion obviates the necessity of any consideration of the provisions of § 2394—32, which aims to preserve the balance of the law intact in case the whole or some part of § 2394—1 should be considered invalid. We may say in passing that we know of no good reason why the legislature may not declare its intention that one part or section of a law is not a compensation for, and that it may be separated from, the balance of the act for the very purpose of saving such balance from being invalidated in case the first-named part or section be held unconstitutional. We think it would take a very extreme case of palpable absurdity or falsity in such a provision, to justify any court in declaring such a declaration of legislative intent ineffective, if indeed a court could make such a declaration at all.

The next important contention is that the law is unconstitutional because it vests judicial power in a body which is not a court, and is not composed of men elected by the people, in violation of those clauses 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of the state Constitution which vest the judicial power in certain courts, and provide for the election of judges by the people, as well as in violation of the constitutional guaranties of due process of law. It was suggested at the argument that the industrial commission might perhaps be held to be a court of conciliation, as authorized to be created by § 16 of article 7 of the state Constitution; but we do not find it necessary to consider or decide this contention. We do not consider the industrial commission a court, nor do we construe the act as vesting in the commission judicial powers within the meaning of the Constitution. It is an administrative body or arm of the government, which, in the course of its administration of a law, is empowered to ascertain some questions of fact and apply the existing law thereto, and in so doing acts quasi judicially; but it is not thereby vested with judicial power in the constitutional sense.

There are many such administrative bodies or commissions, and with the increasing complexity of modern government they seem likely to increase rather than diminish. Examples may be easily thought of. Town boards, boards of health, boards of review, boards of equalization, railroad rate commissions, and public utility commissions, all come within this class. They perform very important duties in our scheme of government, but they are not legislatures or courts. The legislative branch of the government by statute determines the rights, duties, and liabilities of persons and corporations under certain conditions of fact, and varying as the facts and conditions change. Manifestly the legislature cannot remain in session and pass a new act upon every change of conditions; but it may and does commit to an administrative board the duty of ascertaining when the facts exist which call into activity certain provisions of the law, and when conditions have changed so as to call into activity other provisions. The law is made by the legislature; the facts upon which its operation is dependent are ascertained by the administrative board. While acting within the scope of its duty, or its jurisdiction as it is sometimes called, such a board may lawfully be endowed with very broad powers, and its conclusions may be given great dignity and force, so that courts may not reverse them unless the proof be clear and satisfactory that they are wrong. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 136 Wis. 146, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 821, 116 N. W. 905. Not only this, but many such boards are created whose decisions of fact honestly made within their jurisdiction are not subject to review in any proceeding. State ex rel. Coffey v. Chittenden, 112 Wis. 569, 88 N. W. 587; State ex rel. Vilas v. Wharton, 117 Wis. 558, 94 N. W. 359; State ex rel. Cook v. Houser, 122 Wis. 534-561, 100 N. W. 964; State ex rel. McManus v. Policemen's Pension Fund, 138 Wis. 133, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1175, 119 N. W. 806. It is important to notice the limitation contained in the last sentence. The decision of such a board may be made conclusive when the board is acting within its jurisdiction, not otherwise. Hence the question of its jurisdiction is one always open to the courts for review. It cannot itself conclusively settle that question, and thus endow itself with power. If no appeal from its conclusions be provided, the question whether it has acted within or exceeded its jurisdiction is always open to the examination and decision of the proper court by writ of certiorari. The instances where the question of jurisdiction of such bodies has been examined and decided in certiorari actions are so numerous that it seems unnecessary to cite them. In such cases it is considered that clear violations of law in reaching the result reached by the board, such as acting without evidence when evidence is required, or making a decision contrary to all the evidence, constitute jurisdictional error, and will justify reversal of the board's action, as well as the failure to take the proper steps to acquire jurisdiction at the beginning of the proceeding. State ex rel. Augusta v. Losby, 115 Wis. 57, 90 N. W. 188.

Thus, in the case before us, the jurisdiction of the industrial commission to entertain any claim for compensation under the act rests upon two facts which must exist, viz.: (1) That both employer and employee have elected to come under the act; and (2) that the injury was received in service growing out of or incidental to the employment, as the result of accident, and not of wilful misconduct.

The industrial commission must, of course, decide these questions in any case where they are raised; but it cannot decide them conclusively, for they are jurisdictional questions on which its right to act at all depends. They must be open to review in some court of competent jurisdiction; otherwise the parties would be denied due process of law. The tribunal only has authority over those who have voluntarily elected to give it authority, and if it can decide finally that a man has given consent, when he has not, it assumes the functions of a court. If the act before us took away from the courts the power to consider these jurisdictional questions, either expressly or by necessary implication, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

cation, the contention that judicial power had been vested in the commission, contrary to the command of the Constitution, would be of greater force; but we think that the act does not do this, or attempt to do it. True, it says that the findings of fact made by the commission shall, in the absence of fraud, be conclusive; but it provides for an action in the circuit court of Dane county, in which the board's award may be set aside upon either of three grounds, viz.: (1) That the board acted without or in excess of its powers; (2) that the award was procured by fraud; and (3) that the findings of fact do not support the award.

We regard the expression "without or in excess of its powers" as substantially the equivalent, or at least as inclusive, of the expression "without or in excess of its jurisdiction," as those words are used in certiorari actions to review the decisions of administrative officers and bodies. We know of no other construction that can be logically given to them, and it seems to us that they were designedly and advisedly inserted by the framers of the bill to meet the very objection which is now made. With this construction, it is certain that the constitutional powers of the courts have not been invaded, and that no man without his consent can be brought under the law, or is deprived of his right to "due process of law" thereby.

There are some further objections which will be more briefly considered. It is said that, even if it be held that the act is not coercive, still, when employer and employee consent to come under the law, they in effect wholly stipulate away their rights to resort to the courts, and that such agreements are void, citing Fox v. Mason's Fraternal Acci. Asso. 96 Wis. 390, 71 N. W. 363. The case cited, however, recognizes the companion principle that agreements to arbitrate special matters, such, for instance, as the amount of the loss under an insurance policy (or, as in the present case, the extent of an injury or disability, and the like), which do not go to the whole ground work of the controversy, are universally sustained. As we have seen, these special matters are the only matters which the board may conclusively decide under this law. If there be a controversy as to fundamental rights, namely, whether the parties have consented, or as to whether the injuries resulted from wilful misconduct, these issues are still open to the court upon the appeal.

In considering the question as to how far consent may go in matters of this kind, a case not cited in the briefs or mentioned in the oral argument should, we think, be referred to here, viz., the case of Van Slyke v. Trempealeau County Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 39 Wis. 390, 20 Am. Rep. 50. In this case it appeared that the legislature had passed a law providing that, in case of the filing of an affidavit of prejudice against a circuit judge, the parties might, if they chose, stipulate that a member of the bar should act as judge and try the case, with all the powers of the regularly elected judge of the court. Acting on this law, the parties in the case agreed that Mr. John J. Cole should try the case, and he did so, rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed. The court held (Chief Justice Ryan writing the opinion) that, the Constitution having vested all the judicial power of the state in the courts, and provided for the election of judges for such courts, the legislature could confer no judicial power on other officers or persons, nor authorize the parties to an action to do so; hence there was no trial before a court, and no judgment. The question as to whether the defeated party might not be prevented from raising any objection by his voluntary waiver was not considered or mentioned; but in any event the case has no bearing here, and is only mentioned in order to show that it has not been overlooked. It only decides that neither the legislature nor private parties can make a judge out of a private citizen, and endow him with the power to hold a court, contrary to the direct command of the Constitution. As the commission in the present case is not a court, but simply an administrative board, the doctrine laid down in the case cited has no application.

Again, it is said that the act compels municipalities to levy taxes for other than public purposes, since all workmen injured in the employ of the public are to be compensated, and thus taxpayers will be deprived of their property without due process of law. We have not been quite able to appreciate the force of this point, and we find no argument upon it in the brief. We shall only say that the manner in which the state or the public shall treat its workmen is peculiarly a matter for the legislature to determine. No one is compelled to work for the public, and, if he does, he takes his situation on the terms which the public gives. We know of no reason why the public, acting by its law-making power, may not provide that its employees shall have as part of their compensation certain indemnities in case of accidental injury in the public service. When a law does so provide, the raising of the funds to discharge those indemnities becomes plainly a proper public purpose.

Objection is made to those clauses of § 2394—16 which provides for the giving of notice of claim by mail, and allow testimony to be taken without notice to either party, and the claim is made that this is not "due process of law." Were the commission a court, these objections would probably deserve serious consideration, especially the latter one. But, as we have seen, the commission is an administrative board merely. It is common knowledge that such boards are frequently given power to investigate and determine facts without notice to the parties of each successive step in the proceedings. The proceedings before such boards are not expected to be as formal and cumbersome as the proceedings of courts; indeed, the greater flexibility which such bodies must possess if they are to discharge their duties seems to demand greater freedom of action. If notice, either actual or constructive, of the commencement of the proceedings before such a body, be required to be given to the parties interested, and they be given full and free opportunity to be heard and present evidence, it is generally held sufficient, even though notice of intermediate steps in the proceeding be not required or given. Schintgen v. La Crosse, 117 Wis. 158, 94 N. W. 84. In case of a board like the present, which only acts on the rights of parties who have consented that it may so act, the reason of the rule is far stronger.

Some contention is made in the brief that minors cannot be treated in the same manner as adults, and that the provision of the law which declares that a minor who is legally entitled to work shall have the same power of contracting for service as an adult is objectionable, because it allows the employer to decide whether the law shall treat his minor employees as adults. The objection seems to us fanciful and elusive. There is no claim that the legislature may not endow minors with the right to make contracts otherwise lawful, and, if this be so, it seems to us to be the end of the discussion. After the minor is so endowed, he becomes for the purposes of the act an adult, or at least on the same plane. No adult employee of a private employer can elect to come under the act unless his employer has first elected to do so. So the employer has the power to decide whether any of his employees, infant or adult, shall have the privileges of the act if they continue to work for him. This is practically all there is of the matter, and we see no substantial distinction between the effect of the law upon the adult and its effect upon the minor.

The foregoing considerations are believed to fully meet and dispose of all the object-tions made to the law, which could reasonably be claimed to be fatal to the entire law if sustained. There are many objections made to single sections or clauses of the law, which we do not find it necessary or advisable to treat at this time. Even should some or all of them be sustained, it is our judgment that the sections or clauses so questioned could not be said to be so far compensations for or inducements to the balance of the law that the entire law must fall. In our judgment it is better to reserve these questions for consideration when an actual case arises which calls for the decision of the court upon them. It is well-nigh impossible for the human mind to call up and contemplate in advance all the considerations which ought to be considered in passing upon the validity of the various incidental clauses of a new and complicated law. The concrete case and its actual circumstances and effects are apt to throw much light upon the question, and suggest considerations wholly unthought of when viewing the matter abstractly in advance of any actual experience.

Among these contentions, which we now pass without decision, perhaps the most important is the contention that so much of § 2394—16 as provides that the board or any member thereof, or any examiner appointed thereby, shall have power to issue subpoenas, obedience to which shall be enforced by contempt proceedings in the circuit court. This seems to present a serious question, worthy of careful examination, and we intimate no opinion upon it now.

Other minor contentions, which we do not consider it necessary or advisable to pass upon now, are to the effect that the clauses are void which empower the commission (1) to declare and enforce penalties against the employer for failure to perform certain orders of the board made pending hearing (§ 2394—17); (2) to set aside or modify contracts of settlement previously made by the parties (§ 2394—15); and (3) to regulate the amount of contingent attorneys' fees, and permit one claimant to make a contract which it may refuse to allow another to make (§ 2394—22).

Before closing, we shall briefly refer to another question which was not much discussed on the argument, namely, the question whether the law applies, or was intended to apply, to persons who, like the plaintiffs, are employed under contracts of service made prior to the passage of the law, and which do not expire until some definite date in the future, and, if so, whether the law can apply to them without impairing the obligations of their contracts, and thus violating the Constitution. As 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

to the first branch of this question, we think that the language of the act leaves no doubt as to the intention of the legislature. The entire act by express terms was to become effective September 1, 1911. Its provisions are broad, and, without express exception, read according to their grammatical meaning, they include all employers and employees who occupy those relations at the time the law becomes effective. If there was an intention to exclude any from its terms, that intention has been carefully concealed. We conclude that it was intended to include all employers and employees, whatever the term of service. The question whether the act as so construed affects an existing contract of service expiring at some distant period in the future is easily answered in the negative, as it seems to us. Certainly the law does not affect the service to be rendered, or the wages to be paid in any way. Neither the obligation of the workman to faithfully do his work, nor the obligation of the employer to faithfully pay the stipulated wage, nor the remedy in case of breach by either party, is in any way affected. What, then, is affected? Plainly no provision of the contract; but, if the employer elects to come under the law, the employee must choose whether he will come under it or not, and if he does not wish to come under it, he may run the risk of being discharged, or, if he wishes to retain his employment, he may feel compelled to elect to come under the law, and thus lose his right to bring an action at law in case of a personal injury sustained in the employment.

But all this does not in any way affect the contract of employment. That remains absolutely unimpaired in all its terms. The right to bring an action in the future in case of a possible tort not yet committed is no part of the contract of employment. That right arises out of the relation of employer and employee, and is subject to change by the lawmaking power at any time. The employer does not contract that it shall remain intact. There is no vested right in a mere remedy for a hypothetical wrong. At most the law cannot be said to do more than change the remedy for a tort which is yet to happen, and may never happen. The legislature may change the remedies for torts yet to be committed at any time, and such changes cannot be said to make any change in mere contracts of service existing between the parties. This seems very patent. The legislature has, at many times within the last two decades, passed laws very materially changing the liabilities of employers to employees for injuries resulting from the negligent acts of the employer, e. g., the laws requiring the protection of machinery, abolishing assumption of risk in such cases, abolishing the coemployee rule as to railway companies, and changing the rules as to contributory negligence. In no case has the claim ever been made that these laws in any way affected or impaired existing contracts of service for terms expiring in the future, although many cases must doubtless have occurred where those laws were applied to parties who were under such contracts.

We have now discussed all of the contentions made against the law which we deem entitled to detailed treatment, and we find no serious difficulty in sustaining its fundamental and essential provisions. As said in the beginning of this opinion, this law forms the answer of the legislature to a very widespread demand. It is a legislative attempt to reach within constitutional lines some fair solution of a serious problem which other nations, not restricted by written constitutional inhibitions, have solved or partially solved years ago. Doubtless the law will need and will receive changes and amendments as time shall test its provisions and demonstrate its weak points. It would be unreasonable to expect that a law covering so important a subject, along lines not before attempted, should be perfect, or very near perfect, upon its first enactment. If experience shall demonstrate that it is practicable and workable, and operates either wholly or in great measure to put an end to that great mass of personal injury litigation between employer and employee, with its tremendous waste of money and its unsatisfactory results, which now burdens the courts, the long and painstaking labors of those legislators and citizens who collaborated in framing it will be fittingly rewarded by a result so greatly to be desired. That result will mean a distinct improvement in our social and economic conditions.

The effect of our conclusions upon the result in the present case is yet to be considered. The complaint was sustained, and the injunction granted, on the ground apparently that, the law being valid, the plaintiffs would be greatly injured if their employer elected to become bound by it, because they would be obliged either to break their existing contracts or lose their common-law remedies for their employer's torts. Granting all that plaintiffs claim as to the necessary results of their employer's election, it is very certain that no irreparable injury results to them. If their employer breaks his contract of employment because they decline to accept the new law, they have adequate legal remedies for the recovery of damages. If, on the other hand, they elect to come under the law themselves, they lose no vested or contract right, and are not damaged in the eyes of the law by the change in their remedies for future torts. In either event there is no cause of action in equity, and no ground for an injunction. The complaint should have been dismissed on the pleadings.

Barnes, J., concurring (filed November 16, 1911):

I concur in the opinion of the Chief Justice, except in so far as it is said in effect that our Constitutions may mean one thing to-day and something different to-morrow, depending on whether conditions and ideals have in the meantime undergone a change. I regard our Constitutions as immutable, except when changed in the manner therein prescribed. Judges, in interpreting our fundamental laws, may at one time reach conclusions different from those which would be reached at another time. This does not argue that the constitutional provision under consideration has undergone any change, but demonstrates that judges, being finite beings, made a mistake at one time or the other. No act of the legislature should be declared unconstitutional unless it is clearly so. This is elementary. By hewing closely to this line, there is little danger of the courts committing any serious blunders in interpreting our organic laws. If a legislative act, measured by this standard, trenches on the Constitution, it should be held void, regardless of whether or not the provision violated is out of harmony with twentieth century conditions and ideals. To hold otherwise is to say that the courts may change our fundamental laws. This would be a clear usurpation of power, never vested nor intended to be vested in the courts, and one which was reserved to the people themselves. I am a firm believer in constitutional government. I do not share the belief that our Constitutions have become archaic, or that they have outlived their usefulness. If the opinion of the court is intended to mean that it is a doubtful question whether our Constitutions should be preserved or thrown in the "scrap heap," I do not agree with it.

Marshall, J., concurring (filed November 22, 1911):

The result itself meets with my unqualified approval. Some language in the court's opinion, however, respecting the Constitution, I fear will be construed in a different way than the writer thereof, or any member of the court, intended or would sanction, tending to impair the lofty character of the fundamental law as significantly maintained by this court. I am not alone in that. Other language appears which does not express my personal views. True, none of such is matter of decision or even judicial dicta, but, if left unchallenged, it is liable to misleadingly indicate a trend of judicial thought here which, I am safe in saying, does not exist. I choose to avoid responsibility therefor. It, seemingly, is my duty to do so. In discharging that duty I wish not to take from the dignity of the court's able opinion on the vital questions presented for solution. I do not understand they involved any new constitutional, or any, question of difficulty, giving rise, under any circumstances, to desire a broader fundamental spirit than has been long firmly entrenched in the jurisprudence of this country.

The law approved is a very mild piece of legislation. While I would not suggest it is too moderate for now,—for that is not within my province,—yet I would not indicate that the legislature responded as fully as it might to the need for a system as directly as practicable laying the personal injury burdens of production upon the things produced where they belong, as should have been efficiently recognized long ago, and would have been, had the lawmaking power appreciated that it is its province, not that of courts, to cure infirmity in the law. If criticisms, unjustly and freely directed toward the latter and the human instrumentalities thereof, merely because of their fidelity to duty to maintain the laws as given, had been turned upon the former for failure to better conserve human happiness in the industrial field in the light of twentieth century conditions, untold suffering might have been prevented, which only the people's representatives could prevent. Tardy recognition of such duty casts no reflection upon legislative actors of to-day. Who can say but that they would have had the same ideals as now, and effected the same results long ago, if opportunity had been offered them to do so? It has been, in the past, far easier to criticize a power which was helpless to supply a remedy, than to suggest one, or move legislative power to adopt one.

I am constrained to write the foregoing, to give deserved credit to the patient, earnest, efficient labor of the lawmakers who placed the enactment in question upon the statute book of this state. It would give them too little credit to record, merely, that they bowed to public demand, and too little credit to this court to leave room for the thought that it has been influenced by any such demand to give the Constitution 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

any new shade of meaning to sustain the enactment, or that it would change, or arrogate to itself power or disposition to change, fundamentals in any sense, by judicial interpretation.

As to the subject of the enactment, advanced thinkers in economics, law, and legislation have been at the front, and the public has been slow to follow. It took the industrious, able, patient, tactful legislative committee over two years of activity, to educate the people up to willingness to accept on trial the mild law before us. Opposition had to be overcome by education on all sides. The legislature responded, not so much to a general demand, as to a constitutional command, to conserve, in the light of the present, the public welfare.

The remarks in the court's opinion which may suggest to some that a different meaning is to be read out of the Constitution now than formerly; that it may have meant one thing when framed and later another, and now be held differently, according to judicial interpretation, to meet social necessities as recognized by human instrumentalities in the particular environment,—probably were not so intended, but I sense danger of a contrary impression going out. Such ability to bend the fundamental law in the name of judicial interpretation—the idea that an eighteenth century construction for an eighteenth century condition may not, and at the hands of the court does not have to, fit a twentieth century condition,—has been advanced by some, but not, significantly at least, by any court. On the contrary, it has met with universal condemnation. That it is wrong, every man of eminence that has ever written upon the subject in the past, as well as the very nature of the case and the very logic and limitations of judicial interpretation, bear witness. The fertile method of dealing with the Constitution has been characterized as one which has “furnished a mode of argument which would on the one hand leave the Constitution crippled and inanimate, or on the other hand give it an extent and elasticity subversive of all rational boundaries.” 1 Story, Const. 398.

Manifestly, there can be but one right interpretation or construction of the Constitution. It is said to have been constructed of general declarations, so that, in letter and spirit, it might abide indefinitely, and would have to so abide, dealing with all conditions and all ages, except as amended in the manner therein specified. Considerately with that, there can be but one view point for interpretation, and that is the one from which the framers of the system builded. That is unmistakably indicated in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch. 137, 2 L. ed. 60;

We speak of the Constitution in a general sense,—the American system, commencing with the Federal model and including the state Constitutions framed in harmony therewith. In all writings thereon, from Chief Justice Marshall to date, the idea that it cannot be properly judicially changed to suit the notions of the times, and that there will appear little need thereof when the real nature thereof is comprehended, is made prominent. It was that idea, largely, which moved one eminent writer to speak of it as the "greatest single achievement of the eighteenth century," and another to characterize it as the "most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." Truly, it cannot be said of that which was so unequaled in the eighteenth century, and, we may well add, was unequaled in the nineteenth, and has been since, that it can take the cast, so to speak, from time to time, of its environments as judicial instrumentalities may view it through the vista of conditions in presenti. All history says no. The very inconsistency of the contrary says no. The absence of any necessity for, and the destructive danger of, any such quality, say no.

A new remedy for a new condition within the boundaries of reason is within legitimate police authority. Who could wish more? How could more exist, and human liberty—natural, inherent rights—be safe? Would it not be well to recur to the classic rule for testing legitimacy of legislative enactments, given by the most eminent judicial expounder of the Constitution, of which the history of American jurisprudence bears record:

"Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421, 4 L. ed. 579, 605.

With that and the significance of the declared purpose and central thought of the Constitution in mind, much of the supposed difficulty which has stimulated suggestions of competency to, and necessity for, bending it by a usurpation method of interpretation, will disappear.

How are we to determine when the purpose of law, in the field of police power, and unaffected by any express prohibition, is legitimate? It seems the answer is easy. Look first to the purpose of the Constitution, found in the declaration, "Grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

secure its blessings, form a more perfect government, insure domestic tranquillity, and promote the general welfare," we "do establish this Constitution." [Const. Preamble.] Then to the central thought—the very substructure—upon which the whole was built: "All men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights; among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." [Art. 1, § 1.] There is voiced a broad spirit, covering, as this court has, in effect, many times said, a field as limitless as are human needs. The language was not used for mere rhetorical ornamentation or effect, but to suggest the permissible scope of legislation in the zone of general welfare, its extent and its limitations. Durkee v. Janesville, 28 Wis. 464, 9 Am. Rep. 500; State ex rel. Zillmer v. Kreutzberg, 114 Wis. 530, 58 L.R.A. 748, 91 Am. St. Rep. 934, 90 N. W. 1098; State v. Redmon, 134 Wis. 89, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 229, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 114 N. W. 137; 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 408; Bonnett v. Vallier, 136 Wis. 193, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 486, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1061, 116 N. W. 885.

So here, as it seems, the initial question was this: Is the purpose of the law legitimate, within the broad dominating spirit mentioned? The answer must be yes, as the manifest purpose is to promote every element of the central thought of the Constitution. Anything fairly within that has always been, and must necessarily always be, held legitimate. Keeping in mind that in the selection of means the legislature has a very broad comprehensive field in which to freely make a choice, the next question is, are the means contemplated reasonably appropriate to the end to be attained? Not are they the best means, but are they proper means, in that they are not within any express prohibition, and tend to conserve rather than to destroy? All must agree in the affirmative on that in harmony with the best thought of all the more civilized nations of Europe. The difficulty here has been want of appreciation of the great economic truth that personal injury losses incident to industrial pursuits, as certainly as wages, are a part of the cost of production of those things essential to or proper for human consumption, and the more directly they are incorporated therein, the less the enhancement of cost and the better for all.

True, the old remedies for losses mention have been inefficient and wasteful. They are, economically speaking, unscientific, and have always been. It is more apparent now than formerly, by reason of greater and more numerous modern activities and methods, that is all. In truth, the infirmity, from an economic standpoint, and from the standpoint of man's duty to his fellow men, has always existed, though the quantum of regrettable results and useless waste has greatly increased by the multiplication of human activities and physical instrumentalities.

So it will be seen, I think, that while particular means may be reasonably appropriate to a legitimate purpose under some conditions characterizing a particular period, and not have been at a prior time, no change in the Constitution is involved in remedying the misfit. The end being proper, the legitimacy of means may be dependable upon conditions, the question turning more on matter of fact than anything else. The change of mere means does not require a fundamental change, so long as legitimacy of end and reasonable appropriateness of means shall be kept efficiently in view.

Want of appreciation, in my judgment, of the Constitution from the view point suggested, has led some to advocate judicial changes to meet new conditions, while others have insisted that many amendments made in the prescribed way, practically substituting a new system for that of the fathers, are necessary or advisable, and still others have maintained the broad liberal view suggested, which was early intrenched in the jurisprudence of this country by the judicial writings of Chief Justice John Marshall. That idea renders changes of any kind unnecessary to legislative competency to legislate to any extent which reasonably promotes a constitutional object. Anything further would destroy, or tend to destroy, instead of promote, public welfare. Such idea is the safe one, and the right one from the view point, I think, of the fathers. It is the one sturdily maintained by this court. It is the one I feel competent to say all members of this court would now maintain, and that nothing in its opinion should be otherwise taken.

If the Constitution is to efficiently endure, the idea that it is capable of being re-squared, from time to time, to fit new legislative or judicial notions of necessities in presenti, instead of new legislation being tested by it, must be combatted whenever and wherever advanced, and wrong impressions in regard to the matter carefully guarded against. To even significantly speak of making the Constitution adaptable to new conditions by means of interpretation, when the selection of new and constitutional means adaptable to such conditions is meant, is liable to confuse and weaken that high regard all should have for the fundamental law, as a broad, definite, certain, comprehensive, unvarying, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) and unvariable system, other than by the means therein pointed out. Dark will be the day, if that day will ever come, for the people of this country, and dark to the people of all countries whose attention is directed here for lessons in constitutional government, when our system shall not be held up by the courts as speaking the same at one time as at another, except in so far as changes shall be made in the particular way. That is the doctrine of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60. No one can read that great exposition of our system without appreciating how illogical it is to speak of interpretation as an instrumentality for giving, from time to time, a different cast to the fundamental law. The whole spirit of the court's logic condemns such reasoning as heresy. Note the significance of this: "The exercise of this original right" to make a system of government "is a very great exertion, nor can it, nor ought it, to be frequently repeated. The principles therefore so established are deemed fundamental, and as the authority from which they proceed is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent." In that connection the court added, in unanswerable logic, that the Constitution is not only the paramount law, but is absolutely unchangeable by ordinary means; that laws adaptable to it are legitimate, and laws so called not so adaptable are not laws at all. It was designed to govern the legislature and the courts as well. That conception is of something high above either legislatures or courts, to vary it. How can that be done by indirection, miscalled interpretation and construction, —a method of rounding a syllogism with a conclusion based on false premises. Interpretation of that sort would enable courts to evade, and render useless, the most carefully drawn enactments, whether of fundamental or subsidiary law.

So, in short, I think the law in question is a reasonably appropriate means to effect a constitutional purpose; that the Constitution needs no bending whatever in order to sustain it in its essential features, and none would be proper if the contrary were the case.

The foregoing I can but regard out of harmony with this, in its letter: "Changed social, economic, and governmental conditions and ideals of the time, as well as the problems the changes have produced, must logically enter into the consideration and become influential factors in the settlement of problems of construction and interpretation,"—so far as it is pregnant with the thought that the fundamental law is judicially changeable. The words "problems" of "construction" and "interpretations" I think were unfortunately used, if the thought was merely of problems of whether new enactments to cope with new conditions are within or without the legitimate field of legislative activity, having regard to appropriateness of means to effect a constitutional end. The latter might be, as I have suggested at one time, and not a half century theretofore, because changed conditions may render an end legitimate, within the unchangeable scope of the fundamental law, which earlier was not; or the selected means to effect that end might be reasonably appropriate at one time, though not so a century, more or less, theretofore.

Why treat judicial interpretation of law as a process of following changing ideals, social problems, and ideas, since its sole office is to solve uncertainties as to the intent at the time of the enactment? Interpretation commences where begins uncertainty,—obscurity as to the meaning the lawgivers purposed putting into the enactment, and succeeded, discoverably, in expressing, literally or inferentially. In short, the gist of the matter is the intent when the law was made, not what one can make the language say in a different environment from that of its origin to accomplish a desired purpose. No bending is permissible for the latter purpose, but for the former the very letter may have to give way to the spirit. State ex rel. Heiden v. Ryan, 99 Wis. 123, 74 N. W. 544; State ex rel. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 137 Wis. 80, 117 N. W. 846; State ex rel. McGrael v. Phelps, 144 Wis. 1, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 353, 128 N. W. 1041. The expounder is to "look to the whole and every part of the law, to the intent apparent from the whole, to the subject-matter, to the effect and consequences, to the reason and spirit, and thereby ascertain the ruling idea present" in the lawgiving body's mind at the time of the enactment, and then, so far as such idea can reasonably be spelled out of the enactment, give effect to it, though it violates the letter. Wisconsin Industrial School v. Clark County, 103 Wis. 651, 659, 79 N. W. 422.

True, "the Constitution is a very human document," in the sense that it is a collection of words recognizing, characterizing, and guarantying the natural rights of man,—all that are essential to public welfare in the social state, but it is not so in the sense of creating such rights. The right to life, to liberty, to happiness, to equality one with another, are not of human creation. They are of divine origin, though by human instrumentality some one or more of them might be taken away. It is to prevent that, in the main, the Constitution was framed. So anything not expressly prohibited, which reasonably conserves those God-given rights, is within its saving grace. Anything which clearly or materially impairs or destroys any one of them is condemned by it. It were better to inculcate the idea that it is not subject to change with the change of times and conditions, though such new conditions, by logical process, may well be the deciding factor as to whether legislative means resorted to for a particular end are within or without the unchangeable constitutional principles. Manifestly it must have been the latter conception of the Constitution which so inspired statesmen of the first century of the Republic with veneration for it. That might well have inspired Webster to love it, "to have a profound passion for it," to "cherish it day and night," to "live on its healthful saving influence," and to "trust never, never to cease to heed it until" he should "go to the grave of his fathers," to "earnestly desire not to outlive it." It is good to draw inspiration from those lofty sentiments. I would not by word or deed, to any extent, give rise to the thought that the ancient dignity of our system, in judicial conception here, has changed.

At no period has appreciation of the great work of the fathers been more important than now. We need to sit anew, in thought, at their feet, revive knowledge that the result was wrought by a body of men, representatives of the great seats of learning of the English speaking races of two hemispheres, and otherwise men of broad experience, many of whom had been students of all Federal governments of all prior ages in preparation for the special task,—as the historian declared, "the goodliest fellowship of lawgivers whereof this world has record,"—a body dominated by specialists inspired "by enobling love for their fellow men," and the thought that they wrought not for their age alone, but for the ages to come, and so sought to avoid the infirmities of previous systems of government by the people, by carefully providing that no change in letter or spirit should occur, except in a particular and most deliberate and conservative way.

Appreciating that the report of this case will be widely read and commented upon within and without the field of judicial administration, I particularly desire to aid in creating and promoting correct impressions respecting the dignity of the abolished defenses and the responsibility of courts for their existence.

True, such defenses are of judicial origin, but not as that term, without explanation, might be understood by laymen. They are so in the same sense that a large part of the law, upon which rights and remedies depend, is of such creation. Nevertheless, all such is as much the law of this state, to be respected by the court as any part of the Constitution or any act of the legislature. It did not originate with the courts of our age or century. It has not been within the competency of this court at any time to change it. The defenses in question became a part of the law of the mother country through its judicial administration long before the Revolution. The law of such country, so far as adapted to our conditions here, was adopted when our independent government was formed, and became the common law of this country. It was in full force in the territory of Wisconsin when our state was admitted into the Union. All officers were sworn to maintain it,—that part relating to the law of negligence as well as the rest,—and were bound to do so with as much fidelity as if incorporated into the written law. When the Constitution was adopted, the unwritten law was substantially given the cast of written law, and as such firmly intrenched as fundamental, subject to legislative change, by § 13, art. 14, of the Constitution, in these words: "Such parts of the common law as are now in force in the territory of Wisconsin, not inconsistent with this Constitution, shall be and continue part of the law of this state, until altered or suspended by the legislature."

Every judge of every court has been sworn to maintain the common law as thus intrenched in our system, till changed by the legislature. So, from the view point of the present, the law of negligence—including the defenses in question—does not lose in dignity when compared with an act of the legislature, because ages ago it had judicial origin. It was, as we have seen, with deliberation adopted by the people when they organized our state government. No court in our time has had competency, we repeat, to change or create or destroy in that field. Power in that regard was expressly reserved to the legislature. It has been free to act in the matter, within such reasonable limits as not to violate guaranteed rights, for over sixty years, while the courts have been powerless to do more than to determine, to the best of their ability, the law as fundamentally adopted or subsequently changed, by the lawmaking power, and apply it.

Under the power reserved to the legislature as aforesaid, it was competent for it to abolish the defenses in question, and to do it in such a way as to create inducement for employers to voluntarily become parties to the new system designed to better conserve human life and human happiness. Call the method "constitutional coercion," 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

if thought best. That casts no discredit upon the method, for where coercion is necessary, reasonable coercion is legitimate, no guaranteed rights being infringed upon.

It is needless to add that I heartily indorse all said in the court's opinion regarding the importance of the legislation which has received approval. May it be the beginning of a well rounded out constitutional system, making everyone who consumes any product of labor for hire pay his proportionate amount of the cost of the creation, representing the personal injury misfortunes of those whose hands have enabled him to secure the objects of human desire, thus minimizing the sufferings which are the natural incidents of industry, and should be borne, so far as they represent pecuniary sacrifice, by the mass of mankind whose desires are administered to by such industry.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

SARAH M. CAWKER et al., Exrs., etc., of
E. Harrison Cawker, Deceased, Respts.,
v.

B. H. MEYER et al., Railroad Commissioners,
Appts.

(147 Wis. 320, 133 N. W. 157.)

Public utility — furnishing heat — regulation.

A building owner does not come within the meaning of a statute constituting a public utility everyone who shall furnish heat, light, or power, either directly or indirectly, to or for the public, by furnishing heat, light, and power to his own tenant and selling surplus to three neighbors.

(November 14, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Circuit Court for Dane County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to restrain defendants from enforcing against plaintiffs the provisions of the public utility act. Affirmed.

Statement by Vinje, J.:

Action to restrain the railroad commission of Wisconsin from enforcing the provisions of chapter 499, Laws of 1907 (§§ 1797m-1 to 1797m-108, Stats.) as against the plaintiffs. The complaint alleged:

"First. That these plaintiffs are, and at

Note. — Heating service as public utility.

A public use is a use which concerns the whole community as distinguished from a particular undivided or a particular number of individuals; public usefulness, utili-

all the times hereinafter mentioned were, duly qualified and acting as executors of and trustees under the last will and testament of E. Harrison Cawker, deceased, and under and by virtue of letters testamentary duly issued to them out of the county court in and for the county of Milwaukee, in the state of Wisconsin, and that these plaintiffs are, and at all times hereinafter mentioned were, as such executors and trustees, the owners in fee simple and in possession of certain real estate known and described as lot numbered eleven (11), and the south half of lot numbered twelve (12), in block numbered fifty-seven (57), in the fourth ward of the city of Milwaukee, county of Milwaukee, and state of Wisconsin.

"Second. That said defendants are, and for some time last past were, the duly appointed and qualified members of the railroad commission of Wisconsin.

"Third. These plaintiffs further show that, in or about the year 1896, these plaintiffs caused to be erected and constructed upon said premises a certain building known as the Cawker building, designed and intended by these plaintiffs to be rented for stores, offices, and light manufacturing purposes. That at the time of the erection of said building, as aforesaid, these plaintiffs caused to be installed therein a steam plant for the generation of heat, electric light and power, for the purpose of heating and lighting said building, and furnishing electric light and power to such of the tenants and occupants of said building as should desire the same.

"Fourth. That, in order to operate said steam plant with economy, it is necessary to operate the same so as to generate heat, light, and power to the full capacity of said plant, and that after the completion of said building and the installation therein of said steam plant, these plaintiffs found that they were unable to make use of the full capacity of said power plant in the heating and lighting of said building, and in furnishing to the tenants thereof as much light and power as said tenants desired to purchase, and that, in order to operate said plant with economy, it would be necessary for them to dispose of their surplus heat, light, and power to other persons.

"Fifth. These plaintiffs further show that, for the purpose of enabling them to operate their said plant with economy, they entered into contracts with three persons occupying premises adjacent to said Cawker building, to furnish them with light and power from their said plant, to wit, Otto Pietsch Dye Works, F. H. Feldman, and G. Logemann & Son Company, and that they also entered into a contract with said G. Logemann & Son Company to furnish to said G. Logemann & Son Company steam heat, for the purpose of heating the premises immediately adjoining said Cawker building on the north, and that the furnishing of such heat, light, and power to said three persons or corporations is merely incidental to the furnishing of heat, light, and power for their own use in said Cawker building, and for the use of the tenants occupying said Cawker building, and for the purpose of enabling these plaintiffs to operate their said power plant economically.

"Sixth. These plaintiffs further show that they have not at any time applied for or received any permit from the city of Milwaukee to make use of any street or alley in said city, nor have they ever held themselves out as able to or willing to furnish light, heat, and power to the public, or to any person or persons other than the persons above named, or their predecessors in the occupancy of the premises now occupied by said three persons. That there ty, advantage, or what is productive of general benefit, a use by or for the government, the general public or some portion of it. 32 Cyc. 1255.

But one case has been found which is similar to CAWKER v. MEYER, and that is Seaton Mountain Electric Light, H. & P. Co. v. Idaho Springs Invest. Co. 49 Colo. 122. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1078, 111 Pac. 834, holding that a rule adopted by a corporation organized to supply electric light and steam heat to the inhabitants of a municipal corporation, and which, under a franchise from the municipality, has placed conduits for that purpose in the public streets, to the effect that steam for heat will be supplied only to persons taking electricity from the company, is unreasonable, and cannot be enforced to deprive persons who do not take electricity, of the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

right to steam. The case also holds that an injunction will lie to prevent a public service corporation from wrongfully ceasing to furnish steam to a consumer for heating purposes, after the proper connections have once been made and the service has begun. The assumption essentially involved in this case, that this was a public service corporation, in no way conflicts with the CAWKER CASE, for in the former the heating company was organized to give public service in the broad sense, a condition which does not exist in the latter. As already shown, the former also involves the question as to the right of a public service corporation which performs two distinct kinds of service, to refuse to furnish one without the other, and a note on this point is appended to the case in 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1078, are two public utilities in said city of Milwaukee engaged in the production, transmission, delivery, and furnishing of heat and light, operating under intermediate permits.

"Seventh. These plaintiffs further show that said defendants have demanded of these plaintiffs that they comply with the provisions of chapter 499, Laws of 1907, and the various acts amendatory thereof, entitled 'An Act to Create §§ 1797m-1 to 1797m-108, inclusive, Statutes of 1898, Giving the Wisconsin Railroad Commission Jurisdiction over Public Utilities, Providing for the Regulation of Such Public Utilities, Appropriating a Sum Sufficient to Carry out the Provisions of This Act, and Repealing Certain Acts in Conflict with the Provisions Hereof,' and have threatened to cause the attorney general of the state of Wisconsin to prosecute these plaintiffs under the provisions of said act, in case of their failure or neglect to comply therewith; and these plaintiffs further show that they are advised and believe that said chapter 499 of the Laws of 1907, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, are not applicable to these plaintiffs, or to any person or persons operating a light, heat, and power plant under conditions similar to those under which these plaintiffs are operating their said heat, light, and power plant in said Cawker building; that the provisions of said act, if applied to these plaintiffs, would render the operation of their said plant so expensive and burdensome as to compel these plaintiffs to cease the operation thereof, or to operate the same at a considerable loss to these plaintiffs; that if said act should be construed to be applicable to these plaintiffs, these plaintiffs are liable under the provisions thereof to forfeit a sum not less than $100, nor more than $1,000, per day, for each and every day during which they have, since the passage and publication of said act, or shall in the future, fail to comply with the provisions of said act; that the penalties so imposed are unreasonable and void, and are so large that the enforcement of said penalties against these plaintiffs might amount to a confiscation of the entire trust estate in their hands, to the irreparable injury of these plaintiffs and of the beneficiaries under the trust, by virtue of which these plaintiffs hold the premises hereinafter described; and that these plaintiffs have no adequate remedy at law.

"Wherefore, these plaintiffs pray the judgment of this court that said defendants, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents, servants, and employees be forever restrained and enjoined from enforcing, or seeking to enforce, the provisions of said chapter 499, Laws of 1907, as against these plaintiffs, or from making any order or orders under and by virtue of the authority vested in them by said act, requiring these plaintiffs to do or perform any act required by the provisions of said public utility law, or from in any manner interfering with the operation by these plaintiffs of their said heat, light, and power plant, and for such other and further relief as may be just and equitable, and for their costs in this action."

The defendants demurred on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and from an order overruling the demurrer they appealed.

Messrs. L. H. Bancroft, Attorney General, and Russell Jackson, for appellants.

Mr. Lewis M. Ogden, with Messrs. Ryan, Ogden, & Bottum, for respondents:

The respondents are not operating a public utility within the meaning of chapter 499, Laws of 1907.

Hennepin County v. Brotherhood of Church, 27 Minn. 462, 38 Am. Rep. 298, 8 N. W. 595; State v. Luce, 9 Houst. (Del.) 396, 32 Atl. 1077; South Highland Land & Improv. Co. v. Kansas City, 172 Mo. 534, 72 S. W. 944; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 738; Wisconsin River Improv. Co. v. Pier, 137 Wis. 337, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 538, 118 N. W. 857.

Vinje, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the allegations of the complaint set out in the foregoing statement of facts, it appears that plaintiffs built a plant for the purpose of furnishing the tenants of their own building with heat, light, and power; that the completed plant proved to be large enough, when economically run, to furnish more heat, light, and power than the tenants of their own building required, and that they sold the surplus to three of their adjoining neighbors. Does the operation of such a plant, under such circumstances, constitute a public utility, within the meaning of the statute, §§ 1797m-1 to 1797m-108, Stats. (Laws of 1907, chap. 499)? Section 1797m-1 defines a public utility as follows: "The term 'public utility' as used in this act shall mean and embrace every corporation, company, individual, association of individuals, their lessees, trustees, or receivers appointed by any court whatsoever, and every town, village, or city that now or hereafter may own, operate, manage, or control any plant or equipment, or any part of a plant or equipment, within the state, for the conveyance of telephone messages or for the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat, light, water, or power, either directly or indirectly, to or for the public." The state claims that by furnishing heat, light, and power to the tenants of their own building, the plaintiffs became a public utility; that the furnishing of such commodities to anyone else than to one's self is furnishing it to the public, within the meaning of the statute. It is obvious that such a construction is too narrow, for it would constitute the owner of every building furnishing heat or light to tenants, as well as every householder who rents a heated or lighted room, a public utility. The legislature never contemplated such a construction to be given the words "public utility." They must receive a construction that will effectuate the evident intent of the legislature, and not one that will lead to a manifest absurdity. It was not the furnishing of heat, light, or power to tenants, or, incidentally, to a few neighbors, that the legislature sought to regulate, but the furnishing of those commodities to the public; that is, to whoever might require the same. Wisconsin River Improv. Co. v. Pier, 137 Wis. 325, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 538, 118 N. W. 857. The use to which the plan, equipment, or some portion thereof is put must be for the public, in order to constitute it a public utility.

But whether or not the use is for the public does not necessarily depend upon the number of consumers; for there may be only one, and yet the use be for the public, as where a plant is built and operated for furnishing power to the public generally, but for a time finds one consumer who uses it all. If the product of the plant is intended for, and open to the use of, all the members of the public who may require it, to the extent of its capacity, the fact that only one or two thereof consume the entire product renders the plant none the less a public utility. On the other hand, a landlord may furnish it to a hundred tenants, or, incidentally, to a few neighbors, without coming either under the letter or the intent of the law. In the instant case, the purpose of the plant was to serve the tenants of the owners, a restricted class, standing in a certain contract relation with them, and not the public. The furnishing of power, light, and heat to a few neighbors was incidental merely, and limited to them. Should plaintiffs, however, enlarge their field of service, it is by no means certain that they would remain exempt from the operation of the law. And, having come within its provisions, they would be required, to the extent of the capacity of their plant, to serve anyone making a demand upon them, under such regulations as the railroad commission might lawfully prescribe. Ibid.

It is very difficult, if not impossible, to frame a definition for the word "public" that is simpler or clearer than the word itself. The Century Dictionary defines it as: "Of or belonging to the people at large; relating to or affecting the whole people of a state, nation, or community; . . . not limited or restricted to any particular class of the community." The New International defines it as: "Of or pertaining to the people; relating to or affecting a nation, state, or community at large." The tenants of a landlord are not the public; neither are a few of his neighbors, or a few isolated individuals with whom he may choose to deal, though they are a part of the public. The word "public" must be construed to mean more than a limited class defined by the relation of landlord and tenant, or by nearness of location, as neighbors, or more than a few who, by reason of any peculiar relation to the owner of the plant, can be served by him.

While we find it quite easy to ascertain the true spirit and intent of the law, yet we deem it inexpedient and unsafe to attempt to define in more specific terms than the statute what does and what does not constitute a public utility. Each case will depend upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances, and must be tested by the statute in the light of such facts and circumstances. The law should receive a construction that will effectuate its true purpose, however difficult that may be. No resort should be had to any arbitrary standard, or to any fixed line of demarcation, on the ground that they are easy of application, or for any other reason. The statute was intended to include those, and only those, who furnished the commodities therein named to or for the public. It was not intended to affect the relation of landlord and tenant, or to abridge the right to contract with a few neighbors for a strictly incidental purpose, though relating to a service covered by it.

The conclusions we have arrived at render it unnecessary to determine whether or not the statute unreasonably abridges the right to contract, and whether or not that portion of it prescribing penalties is unconstitutional, on the ground that they are excessive.

Order affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

NOVELTY THEATER COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
LOTTIE WHITCOMB.

(47 Colo. 110, 106 Pac. 1012.)

Master and servant — actors' frolic — contributory negligence.

1. An actress who, during the presentation of her part upon the stage, unneces-

Note. — Applicability of master and servant doctrines to case of injured actor.

There is apparently no reason why the ordinary rules pertaining to the relation of master and servant should not apply to an actor while engaged in his occupation, and acting within the scope of his employment. Indeed, the few reported cases which involve injuries to actors apply such rules, generally without discussing the peculiar nature of the plaintiff's employment.

A woman engaged in the chorus in a pantomime was held, in Burr v. Theatre Royal, 76 L. J. K. B. N. S. 459, [1907] 1 K. B. 544, 96 L. T. N. S. 447, 23 Times L. R. 299, to be the servant of the manager of the theater.

And members of the chorus have been held fellow servants of the stage hands engaged in shifting the scenery and in doing other work of that character upon the stage. Ibid.; Hahn v. Conried Metropolitan Opera Co. 126 App. Div. 815, 111 N. Y. Supp. 161.

In Davenport v. Oceanic Amusement Co. 132 App. Div. 368, 116 N. Y. Supp. 609, it was held that a woman who contracted to allow herself, as part of an exhibition, to be carried down a rope from the fourth floor of a burning building, assumed the risk of another employee grasping the end of the swinging rope and throwing her and her rescuer against the burning building. And in Conyes v. Oceanic Amusement Co. 202 N. Y. 408, 95 N. E. 801, in which the plaintiff was the employee who performed the rescuing act, it was held that the master had performed his duty when he furnished a sufficient rope; that the plaintiff was in a better position than the master to know when the rope became unsafe for further use; and that consequently, if the injury was caused by a worn-out condition of the rope, the master would not be liable therefor.

A bridge constructed by the stage hands, and used as part of the paraphernalia, was held in Hahn v. Conried Metropolitan Opera Co. supra, to be a mere appliance, and not a place furnished for the servant, for the defective condition of which the master would be liable.

And in an early English case it was held that since the plaintiff was not obliged to enter into a contract with the owner of a theater "to act, sing, and perform as a chorus singer," she must accept things as sarily mounts a chair, which is not required by her engagement, at a time when the actors are engaged in a frolic, throwing shoes, cans, and other missiles about, and thereby becomes particularly conspicuous, is guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law, which will prevent her holding her employer liable for an injury due to being hit by a missile.

Same — assumption of risk.

2. An actress who continues her performance after the other actors have begun a she found them; and that the owner was under no obligation to light the stage or fence a hole in the floor by any means not employed in the ordinary course of his business. Seymour v. Maddox, 5 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 265.

One or two other cases not involving personal injuries may be considered for the light which they throw upon the question herein discussed.

Thus, in Re Winter German Opera Co. (1907) 23 Times L. R. 662, an opera company having gone into liquidation, the question arose whether or not an artist who had been engaged to sing during the season for a certain sum for each performance was a "servant," and whether his remuneration was "wages or salary in respect of services rendered," within the meaning of the preferential payments in bankruptcy act 1888, so as to entitle him to be paid in priority to other creditors. It was argued for the other creditors that if the artist in question should be considered a servant, then other great singers, such as Patti, Melba, and Caruso, engaged to sing for, say, three nights during the year, would be mere servants, and that their remuneration would constitute wages or salary; but the court held that cases of this character must turn upon the terms of the particular contracts; and according to the terms of the contract in question the artist was to be considered a servant, and entitled to the preference provided in the act.

And in McKay v. Buffalo Bill's Wild West Co. 17 Misc. 601, 40 N. Y. Supp. 592, it was held that an employee of the Wild West Company, employed to maintain order and discipline in the car used for lodging various members of the show, was a fellow servant of another employee whose particular duty was that of watchman at the gate, and that therefore, the former could not recover for the value of his personal effects, which were burned when the watchman overturned an oil stove in the car and set fire to it.

As to the liability of the master for injuries inflicted upon an employee maliciously or in sport, by other employees, see the note to Medlin Mill. Co. v. Boutwell, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 109.

As to the master's liability for injury from the sportive manner in which a servant performs an act done in the discharge of his duty, see the note to Soderlund v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1193.

frolic in which they throw missiles about assumes the risk of being hit and injured by one of them.

Same — scope of employment.

3. The owner of a theater is not liable for injury to an actor employed by him, which is caused by a missile thrown by another actor at a time when all the employees, including the stage manager, are engaged in a frolic, since such acts are entirely outside the scope of the employment, and the employer is not answerable for them.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Pueblo County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James J. McFeely and E. O. Stimson, for appellant:

There can be no recovery, as the servant was not acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the alleged injury.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is to recover damages for personal injuries sustained under these circumstances and conditions: The plaintiff below, appellee here, Lottie Whitcomb, with her husband, were employed to perform as actors by the Novelty Theater Company, appellant here, defendant below, in the city of Pueblo, at the Empire Theater, for the week ending April 3, 1904. The act which the plaintiff and her husband presented consisted in the imitation by them of the action and noises of certain barnyard fowls, as the rooster and hen, interspersed with singing and dancing. A portion of the fifth paragraph of the complaint, which sets forth her first cause of action, and that is the one upon which recovery was had, is as follows:

"Fifth. That unknown to plaintiff the said defendant wrongfully and negligently arranged for what was termed a charivari on the closing night of plaintiff's engagement at said Empire Theater, and on April 3, 1904, at about 10:30 P. M. on the closing night of said plaintiff's engagement at the said Empire Theater, and while said plaintiff was on the stage in the capacity of actress in the employ of defendant, in the regular line of her duty, the said defendant, in furtherance of its plan and scheme in connection with the said charivari, wrongfully, negligently, and carelessly threw cans and other missiles on the stage where said plaintiff was performing at said theater, and wrongfully and negligently turned out the lights on said stage, and in a rough, rude, and reckless manner the said defendant, in pursuance of its said charivari plan, struck or caused said plaintiff to be struck on the ankle by a can thrown in furtherance of said plan for said charivari, which said can struck the said plaintiff with great force and violence about her right ankle, causing the same to be sprained and permanently injured."

For the defense to the cause of action, beside the general issue which the defendant tendered and the plea of contributory negligence, there was a separate further defense as follows:

"That on the night of April 3, 1904, this plaintiff, in connection with her co-actors at said theater, planned a little amusement among themselves, without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, and outside of their employment, said amusement consisting, among other things, of throwing tin cans and other missiles at each other, and that none of the cans or other missiles so thrown at this plaintiff struck her on or near her ankle, or caused her any injury whatever.

"That this plaintiff is a very large and heavy person, and while on the stage, and without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, and outside of her duty, according to her employment, she mounted a chair on said stage, said chair being about 20 inches high, from the floor of the stage on which she was performing, and in getting down from said chair to the stage of said theater, she jumped from the said chair of her own free will, and struck the stage floor in a manner which caused her ankle to become injured."

The plaintiff replied, joining issue upon all new matter. Trial was had with a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,000, and after the overruling of a motion for a new trial, judgment was rendered thereon. Defendant brings the case here for review.

It is contended by the defendant:

First. That if the injury complained of occurred through the negligence and improper conduct of other employees of the company, as alleged, such conduct was without their employment, unauthorized by the company, and that it may not be legally held for the damages resulting therefrom.

Second. That the plaintiff had full knowledge of what was going on, but still continued to act her part, and so, by remaining at her post, voluntarily assumed the risk incident thereto; and,

Third. That the plaintiff was guilty of conduct contributing to the injury, and may not therefore recover.

It is admitted that in the presentation of the respective parts of the plaintiff and her husband no chair was necessary, and that up to the night in question none had been used, while on this occasion the plaintiff in her performance mounted one that stood about 20 inches above the stage, and thus placed herself in a position of increased danger. It is also undisputed that, after she had begun her act, and for a considerable time before the injury occurred, the boisterous and unruly conduct of the other actors, which it is alleged finally resulted in damage to the plaintiff, had been in progress. It also appears that while she stood upon the chair she was imitating a hen, with her husband dancing around her imitating a rooster, and that her action in mounting a chair was wholly voluntary and without the scope of her employment and beyond the purview of her part, as theretofore rendered. Such conduct of necessity must have attracted particular attention to herself, and doubtless substantially contributed to the result complained of. It could not fail to make her more conspicuous than ordinarily, and must have increased the zest and zeal with which oyster cans, old shoes, and other missiles were thrown. She simply by her own action in this respect made herself a special target for her companions. The injury was sustained as she stepped to the stage from the chair. Had she remained upon the floor, as in previous performances, it is altogether possible that no damage would have been inflicted. Under the admitted facts, plaintiff was clearly guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in our view of the situation.

It is contended by defendant, and there is proof to show, that prior to going upon the stage that evening for her own part, plaintiff had actively engaged in similar conduct toward other performers, and seemed to be enjoying herself along with the rest. This, of course, is denied. Be that as it may, in any event, it is clear that, with full knowledge of what was going on, and the character of the amusement in which the other actors were indulging at her expense, for several minutes before any harm befell her, the plaintiff voluntarily continued in her performance, and thereby, as is contended by the defendant, assumed all risk of injury to herself.

At the close of plaintiff's testimony a motion for a nonsuit, on substantially the same grounds now urged in argument, was interposed and denied. We are of opinion that this motion should have been sustained, for each of the reasons suggested. The acts complained of, which occasioned the injury, if they in fact did so, were clearly without the scope of the authority of the fellow actors, including the stage manager. Manifestly the whole affair was a frolic among the performers themselves, for their own amusement, edification, and diversion, and while the plaintiff now denies any knowledge of, or part in, that jollification, such denial is contrary to human experience, reason, and observation, and is probably contrary to the fact, as we view the matter. Anyhow it is settled that for a considerable period while this side play was in progress, after plaintiff's appearance upon the stage, she still remained at her post and continued her act, with as full knowledge of the danger incident thereto as anybody else could possibly have had, when she might easily have withdrawn and avoided it all. By failing to do this, under such circumstances, she assumed the risk attendant upon her remaining. She thus plainly made possible the injury, which could not otherwise have occurred, and thus contributed thereto by her own negligent conduct.

The conduct complained of on the part of her fellow actors amounted to a wilful battery, and it may safely be assumed, from common knowledge, that such acts are not fairly within the scope of the actor's employment. No more has a stage manager the power to authorize such acts of his own volition, and thus bind the company. It would be absurd to so hold. To bind the company for damages resulting from such conduct and actions on the part of its employees, they must have been expressly or impliedly authorized; and if by implication, then in such manner as to leave the matter free of doubt. No such authorization, either express or implied, has been shown.

There appears to be no doubt, upon a full consideration of all of the testimony, that these stage people were all fellow servants. Any of the acts complained of, which the stage manager is charged with having committed, were not within the scope of his employment; but, on the contrary, were entirely outside of it. It does not appear from the testimony, or from anything in the record, that he was acting in any such capacity as to entitle him to be considered a vice principal.

"All who serve the same master, work under the same control, derive authority and compensation from the same source, and are engaged in the same general business, although it may be in different grades or departments, are fellow servants, each taking the risk of the other's negligence." 26 Cyc. 1282, and cases cited.

The rule, as we gather it from the best reasoned cases, is that, for the acts of the vice principal, done within the scope of his employment, and such as properly devolve upon the master in his general duty to his servants, the master is liable, while for all such acts as relate to the common employment and are on the level with the acts of the fellow laborer, the master is not liable. In other words, the test of liability is the character of the act, rather than the relative rank of the servants. Deep Min. & Drainage Co. v. Fitzgerald, 21 Colo. 533-543, 43 Pac. 210; Poorman Silver Mines v. Devling, 34 Colo. 37, 44, 46, 81 Pac. 252.

There is no liability on the part of the principal as to matters beyond the scope of the authority of the superior servant. In order that the master's liability may be established, it must be shown that the superior servant had authority, either express or implied from the nature of his functions and the regular course of the business, to do the act or give the order alleged to be negligent. Authority to commit acts of personal violence amounting to battery cannot be inferred. Larger powers cannot be imputed to an agent than the principal himself possesses. Labatt, Mast. & S. § 537, pp. 1539, 1540, and cases cited.

If a servant whose negligence visits an injury on another servant is acting outside and beyond the line of his duty at the time, and doing that which he was not employed to do, the master will not be liable. Southern Cotton-Oil Co. v. De Vond, — Tex.

Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 43; Sammis v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 97 Ill. App. 28; Pettigrew v. St. Louis Ore & Steel Co. 14 Mo. App. 441.

The law seems to be settled that where a servant continues to work with knowledge, actual or constructive, of danger to which an ordinarily prudent person refuses to subject himself, such a one is guilty of contributory negligence. 26 Cyc. 1239, and cases cited.

Or, stated in another way, to render a master liable for injuries to his servant, the latter must have exercised ordinary and reasonable care; and if the injured party might, by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care under the circumstances, have avoided the consequences of defendant's negligence, he cannot recover. Last Chance Min. & Mill. Co. v. Ames, 23 Colo. 167, 47 Pac. 382; 26 Cyc. 1261.

These statements of the law describe accurately and precisely the situation of the plaintiff, having reference to the conditions under which she was injured. Upon the facts shown it is plain that she might readily have withdrawn from her position of danger. Had she done so, all chances of harm to her would have been removed. She appears, however, to have been willing to remain with full knowledge of the situation, and thus subject herself to an apparent danger, and should and must be charged with the consequences of her voluntary act.

We cite as being instructive upon the question here involved, and as upholding the general conclusion reached, the following: Segers v. Nuckolls, 3 Colo. App. 95, 32 Pac. 187; Orphan Belle Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pinto Min. Co. 35 Colo. 564, 85 Pac. 323; Iowa Gold Min. Co. v. Diefenthaler, 32 Colo. 391, 76 Pac. 981; *Lord v. Pueblo Smelting & Ref. We have given the case full and careful consideration from every view point, and interpreting the testimony most favorably to the plaintiff, we are of the unalterable conviction that the defendant is not legally liable, and the judgment rendered cannot be permitted to stand. It is therefore reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to dismiss the complaint.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

W. N. AULD, Admr., etc., of Eliza Auld, Plff. in Err.,

v.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carrier — crossing platform of moving train — negligence.

1. The act of crossing from one car platform to another on a moving train is not per se negligence, in the absence of a rule or notice warning the passengers from such act. A passenger who undertakes to go from one car to another while the train is in motion assumes only the risks incident to such undertaking in the ordinary operation of the train; and if such passenger is injured by being thrown from the platform by a sudden jerk, questions of negligence of the defendant in causing the injury and of the passenger's contributory negligence are for the jury.

Evidence — custom — crossing platform of moving train.

2. In a suit against a carrier for an injury to a passenger from being precipitated from a moving train while crossing from one coach to another, testimony of a known usage or custom of passengers to cross is competent evidence, not to justify or ex-

Headnotes by EVANS, P. J.

Note. — Passing from one car to another of a moving train as contributory negligence.

The earlier cases upon this question will be found in a note to McAfee v. Huidekoper, 34 L.R.A. 720.

For cases involving injuries received while on vestibuled platforms, see Clanton v. Southern R. Co. 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 253, and Johnson v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 313, and the notes appended to these cases.

For questions as to the liability of a carrier for injuries to passengers upon the platforms of cars under various circumstances, see note to Norvell v. Kanawha & M. R. Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 325, and the other notes referred to therein.

As shown in the earlier note, the general rule is that it is not negligence per se to pass from one car to another of a moving train. Galveston. H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Patillo, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 572, 101 S. W. 492; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Keitt, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 76 S. W. 311.

Thus, in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Morris, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 60 S. W. 813, it is held that a passenger who is unable to find a seat in one car is rightfully upon the platform in passing to another car to find one, and in an action for being thrown therefrom, it devolves upon the carrier to show contributory negligence.

In Andrist v. Union P. R. Co. 30 Fed. 345, where an emigrant train which had been stopped for a considerable time was cuse the passenger from attempting to cross when it would be an obviously hazardous act, but as illustrating the character and nature of the act as bearing on the passenger's alleged contributory negligence in crossing.

Same — opinion — inference to be drawn by jury.

3. If data supplied by a witness can be placed before the jury in such a way that they may draw the inference, as well as the witness, it is superfluous to add by way of testimony the inference which the jury may well draw for themselves.

(May 10, 1911.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for De Kalb County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in a suit to recover dam-started without warning, and plaintiff, who, with others, was off the train, hurriedly boarded the first coach, and was crossing the platform to get to his seat when the cars were parted without warning, for the purpose of switching, it was held that he was not guilty of negligence per se.

And in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Leftwich, 54 C. C. A. 1, 117 Fed. 127, the court held that a passenger who boarded the front of the train showed no want of reasonable or ordinary care in passing through the train, and even left it to the jury to say whether he was negligent in grasping the hand-holds and going upon the step for the purpose of spitting.

In Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, 54 C. C. A. 196, 116 Fed. 324, it is held that deceased was not chargeable with negligence per se in passing into the dining car over a platform which he knew to be unvestibuled, but recovery was denied on other grounds, on appeal reported in 192 U. S. 440, 48 L. ed. 513, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 408.

In Boston & M. R. Co. v. Stockwell, 77 C. C. A. 19, 146 Fed. 505, it was held that plaintiff was not negligent as matter of law, where, after entering the train at a station where there was no agent, he deposited his baggage in the baggage car according to custom, and started to go into the passenger car, when his hat was blown off, and he was thrown from the platform as he released his hold on the door knob.

And in Gaunce v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 20 Tex. Civ. App. 33, 48 S. W. 524, evidence on the part of plaintiff that while passing from one coach to another to get a drink of water he was thrown from the platform by an unusual jerk and the giving away of a hand-hold, though contradicted, was held to be sufficient to require that the case be submitted to the jury.

But while it is not negligence as matter of law for a passenger to pass from one car to another of a moving train, in the absence of a rule of the carrier prohibiting it, he nevertheless assumes the risk of injury caused by the movements of a train of good construction and repair passing over a track in good condition. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Leftwich, 54 C. C. A. 1, 117 Fed. 127, 128 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ages for the alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Burton Smith, for plaintiff in error:

The evidence was enough to justify the jury in believing that deceased was thrown from the train.

Southern R. Co. v. Webb, 116 Ga. 152, 59 L.R.A. 109, 42 S. E. 395.

Her conduct in passing from one coach to another was not so negligent as to bar recovery.

However, he assumes only ordinary risks. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Choate, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 618, 56 S. W. 214. For former appeals, see 90 Tex. 82, 36 S. W. 247, 37 S. W. 319, and 91 Tex. 406, 43 S. W. 537, 44 S. W. 69.

And if the danger is not obvious, it is not negligence for a passenger to attempt to pass from one coach to another upon being requested by the conductor to do so. Central R. Co. v. Carleton, 163 Ala. 32, 51 So. 27.

However, the circumstances may be such that it will be considered contributory negligence for a passenger to pass from one car to another of a moving train.

Thus, in Dougherty v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 84 Miss. 502, 36 So. 699, it was held to be negligence barring recovery for a passenger voluntarily to attempt to pass from one car to another of a train while it was moving rapidly on a curve.

In Sawtelle v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 15 Blatchf. 216, Fed. Cas. No. 12,392, which was an action on an insurance policy which provided against liability for injury incurred through negligence of the insured, it was held that passing from car to car of a rapidly moving train, without some necessity for doing so, was such negligence as to preclude recovery.

In McDonnell v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 35 App. Div. 147, 54 N. Y. Supp. 747, appeal dismissed in 159 N. Y. 524, 53 N. E. 1127, where plaintiff had passed through the train and was returning, although there were seats he could have occupied, when he was thrown from the platform by the train parting, it was held that the jury was justified in finding him guilty of contributory negligence.

And in Hunter v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 72 S. C. 336, 110 Am. St. Rep. 605, 51 S. E. 860, a passenger who went through the train looking for water, and stepped off the unguarded platform of the rear car, thinking there was another car, was held to be guilty of negligence barring recovery.

Messrs. McDaniel, Alston, & Black for defendant in error.

Evans, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. N. Auld, administrator of Mrs. Eliza Auld, brought suit in the superior court of De Kalb county, against the Southern Railway Company, to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of the plaintiff's intestate. The injury resulting in Mrs. Auld's death occurred in the state of South Carolina, and the action was in virtue of a South Carolina statute authorizing suit by an administrator. The plaintiff was nonsuited.

The substance of the evidence was that Mrs. Auld, a married woman, forty-four years of age, the mother of seven children, on the day previous to her death had been discharged from a sanatorium, and was returning to her home in company with her husband and brother. She had been in failing health for two or three years before being sent to the sanatorium. She was despondent, morose, and gloomy. At the time of her injury her mental and physical health was a great deal better than it had been. Her party boarded the cars of the defendant at Toccoa, Georgia. The particular coach in which she entered was vestibuled. The coach in the rear was not vestibuled. The train was about two hours behind time. The country traversed by the defendant's road was mountainous. The train was running fast, trying to catch up the lost time. A passenger testified that the husband and brother of Mrs. Auld were in the rear coach; that he observed her leave her seat, and go to the rear of the car, and pass through the door. "As she left the door there was a sudden plunge or jerk of the train, and we all had to hold our seats, just at the point she was thrown from the train." She was found lying near the track in an unconscious condition, and died from her injuries. One of the plaintiff's witnesses testified that "the train was about two hours late that night," and in the absence of any other testimony on the subject we infer that the injury occurred at night.

1. It is not negligence as matter of law for a passenger to pass from one coach to another while the train is in motion. Whether or not a passenger is negligent in so doing depends upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Cottrell v. Savannah & T. R. Co. 84 Ga. 687, 11 S. E. 553; Augusta Southern R. Co. v. Snider, 118 Ga. 146, 44 S. E. 1005. Some early cases may be found in other jurisdictions in which it is said that a passenger's attempt to cross the platforms between the coaches while the train was running was a negligent act. The later cases are harmonious that it is not per se negligence for a passenger to go from one coach to another while the train is in motion. The modern view results from the great improvement in constructing cars; the tacit or implied invitation by railroad companies in the make-up of the trains, including a smoking car, a dining car, and other coaches, that the passenger may pass from one to the other for his comfort or convenience. A passenger who undertakes to pass from one coach to another while the train is running assumes the risk of injury caused by the ordinary movements of the train. If he is injured in his effort to go from one car to another, and the railway company is not guilty of negligence proximately causing the injury, the passenger cannot recover. Hicks v. Georgia Southern & F. R. Co. 108 Ga. 304, 32 S. E. 880. Or, if the railway company is negligent, and the plaintiff could have avoided the consequences thereof by the use of ordinary care and diligence, he cannot recover. Blitch v. Central R. Co. 76 Ga. 333; Southern R. Co. v. Strickland, 130 Ga. 779, 61 S. E. 826. The circumstances attending the injury to the plaintiff's intestate, as developed on the trial, were sufficient to make a prima facie case against the carrier, and the burden was upon it to overcome the imputation of negligence or to show the passenger's contributory negligence. It appeared from the testimony that the train was behind time and running fast to catch up the lost time, and that it gave a sudden plunge and jerk as Mrs. Auld passed to the platform. These facts are not conclusive that Mrs. Auld was thrown or fell from the train by a jerk usual and incident to the ordinary operation of the train. Under the rule just stated, it was a question for the jury to determine whether the defendant was negligent in the operation of the train, and whether, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of such negligence in undertaking to pass from one coach to another as would defeat a recovery. Branan v. Southern R. Co. 135 Ga. 24, 68 S. E. 793.

2. A witness was examined by interrogatories. He was asked: "If you say anything about her moving from one place to another, state how and where she moved. State whether or not there was any custom with reference to moving. If so, what was the custom? Answer fully." To which he replied: "I saw her get up and start back through the car, and as she passed the door I did not see her any more. It is the custom of passengers to go from one car to another whenever they want to, and go to the toilet whenever they want to go." The court excluded the following part of the answer: "It is the custom of passengers to go from one car to another whenever they want to, and to go to the toilet whenever they want to go." We do not think that the question was too indefinite to apprise the defendant of an effort to prove a custom or usage among the passengers to go from one car to another of a moving train. It is competent to show a known usage or custom of passengers to pass from one car to another while in motion, not so much as an act of license by the defendant, but as explanatory of the custom and usage of passengers on moving trains. If passengers commonly go from one car to another, the very commonness of the custom tends to show that it is known to the defendant. Of course, no custom to do an obviously dangerous act will excuse contributory negligence; but, as we have seen, this court cannot say as matter of law that it is negligence to go from one car to another.

3. The court refused to allow a witness to testify that, from certain facts which he enumerated, it was his opinion that the jerk of the car threw Mrs. Auld from the train. There was no error in this. The jury were as competent to draw the deduction from the facts as the witness. Taylor v. State, 135 Ga. 622, 70 S. E. 237.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

RE RUSSELL M. BENNETT et al.

RUSSELL M. BENNETT et al., Appts.,

v.

WILLIAM HARRISON et al., Respts.

(115 Minn. 342, 132 N. W. 309.)

Statute of frauds — oral agreement to convey land — part performance.

1. A "part performance," to take an oral agreement to convey real estate out of the statute of frauds, must be substantial, and of such a nature that the refusal to enforce the agreement would result not merely in the denial of the right which the agreement was intended to confer, but in an "unjust and unconscientious" injury.

Same — effect as mortgage.

2. One having no interest in land, legal or equitable, at the time a deed was executed by the owner to a third party, cannot assert the rights of a mortgagee therein against the grantee, solely by virtue of an oral agreement made by the grantee to convey the land to him upon payment of a certain sum.

Fraud — agreement to convey — part performance — equitable mortgage.

3. In this case, land was conveyed by the owner to the applicants; they having orally agreed to thereafter convey an interest to the defendant upon payment by him to them, at any time within three years, of a specified sum. The defendant had no interest, legal or equitable, in the land at any time prior to the conveyance thereof to applicants. Held:

(a) That the fact that the defendant had a possible broker's opportunity to find other purchasers for this land, and that he acted for applicants in negotiating a purchase, was not such a change of defendant's situation in "part performance" of the oral agreement as to render the same enforceable.

(b) That through such transaction the defendant did not acquire in the land included in the agreement the equitable interest or title of a mortgagor.

(Lewis, J., dissents.)

Note. — Necessity and character of one's previous interest in land essential to his claim as an equitable mortgagor.

The cases discussed in this note have been limited to those in which it is sought to have decreed as a mortgage a deed absolute of lands to which the person claiming the rights of a mortgagor had no title. The cases in which land is deeded directly from a debtor to his creditor are thus excluded, as well as those in which an execution debtor at a judicial sale has entered into an

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Van Derlip & Lum for appellants.

Messrs. John G. Williams, C. O. Baldwin, and W. G. Bonham, for respondents:

The agreement constituted a mortgage.

Stitt v. Rat Portage Lumber Co. 96 Minn. 27, 104 N. W. 561; Jones v. Gillett, 142 Iowa, 506, 118 N. W. 314, 121 N. W. 5; Beebe v. Wisconsin Mortg. Loan Co. 117 Wis. 328, 93 N. W. 1103; Phelan v. Fitzpatrick, 84 Wis. 240, 54 N. W. 614; King v. McCarthy, 50 Minn. 227, 52 N. W. 648; Heaton v. Darling, 66 Minn. 262, 68 N. W. 1087; Grout v. Stewart, 96 Minn. 230, 104 N. Reed, 123 Wis. 488, 101 N. W. 682.

The mortgage was an enforceable obligation.

Grout v. Stewart, 96 Minn. 230, 104 N. W. 966; Jones v. Gillett, 142 Iowa, 506, 118 N. W. 314, 121 N. W. 5; Krebs v. Lauser, 133 Iowa, 241, 110 N. W. 443; Terry v. Wilson, 50 Minn. 570, 52 N. W. 973.

agreement with another who purchased the property, either at the sale or afterwards, to hold it as security for the sum thus advanced, unless it appears that the period for redemption has expired, in which case, the former owner would not longer have any interest in the property.

It is a general rule that the intent of the parties will determine the nature of the transaction, irrespective of the form which may have been used. 27 Cyc. 991.

It is necessary that the distinction between a mortgage and a land contract be kept clearly in mind. The mortgagor is something more than a vendee, i. e., he has certain rights that the vendee does not have, such as the right to redeem after default, and in equity at least, and in some jurisdictions at law, he is regarded as the holder of the legal title with the rights consequent thereto. A person therefore occupying the relation of a mortgagor has thus acquired a higher and better right than a mere vendee.

It will be noted that the dissenting opinion in RE BENNETT does not dissent from the proposition that there must exist an interest to entitle one to the right of an equitable mortgagor. The dissent is from the proposition taken in the majority opinion as to when this interest must exist. In holding that the interest is necessary, the opinion is in accord with the majority of the cases that have passed on this point.

Thus, in Conkey v. Rex, 212 Ill. 444, 72 N. E. 370, a person who had entered into a written agreement with the purchaser of land to go into possession and pay interest on the purchase money, and upon payment of a stated sum to receive a conveyance of the premises from such purchaser, was held not to be entitled to the rights of a mortgagor, for the reason that he had no interest in the premises. It was urged in this case that the person claiming to be mortgagor had negotiated with the original grantor for a conveyance, but it is stated in the opinion that it was to be a conveyance to the purchaser, and not to the claimant. See Watts v. Kellar, 5 C. C. A. 394, 12 U. S. App. 274, 56 Fed. 1, infra.

So, in Heaton v. Gaines, 198 Ill. 479, 64 N. E. 1081, one who was in possession of lands under a person who purchased them of a third person was held not to have shown the existence of an intention to mortgage; and in the course of the opinion the court says that a conveyance of lands by a third person to a person under whom one held possession could not be a mortgage, unless it appeared in some way that the person thus holding possession had an interest as owner.

In Caprez v. Trover, 96 Ill. 456, one in possession of real estate as a lessee, who orally agrees with another that the latter shall purchase the real estate and take title thereto, and that the former be given a deed upon paying the purchaser the entire cost and interest, was held not to be entitled to the rights of a mortgagor, and in the course of the opinion the court states that such lessee had no interest in the property susceptible of being mortgaged.

In Greene v. Cook, 29 Ill. 186, where it was agreed that one person should enter government land and give another a bond for title upon the execution of an agreement to pay a certain sum, which was done, and thereafter, upon the failure of the other party to pay the note, a new bond and note had been executed, and this forfeited, the obligee in the bond was held not entitled to the rights of a mortgagor as against one purchasing the land in good faith. In the course of the opinion the court states that this appears to have been an ordinary sale, and further, that the debtor never had any interest in the land to mortgage. This case, however, seems to be based more on the theory that it was not the intention of the parties to create a mortgage.

In Burgett v. Osborne, 172 Ill. 227, 60 N. E. 206, where a person purchased a certificate at an execution sale, and agreed with the execution debtor after the period for redemption had expired, that he would take title to the property, and that the debtor could buy it back at a stated sum, the transaction was held not to be a mortgage, so as to give the execution creditors of such debtor the right to redeem. In the

There was an oral agreement to convey on certain terms, and appellants ought in equity to be required to convey, because of the partial performance by Chesebrough, and his offer of full performance by the tender which the court finds he made. This partial performance is enough to take the case out of the statute of frauds, if the statute otherwise applied.

Simpson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application to register title to lot 5, township 58 north, range 15 west. After issue joined and trial, the court, by amended findings and decree, determined that Russell M. Bennett was the owner of course of the opinion the court says that the debtor had no interest in the property, no debt was due, and the transaction could not be regarded as a mortgage.

So, in Carpenter v. Plagge, 192 Ill. 82, 61 N. E. 530, where mortgaged property belonging to an estate was sold at foreclosure, and after the period of redemption had expired an heir entered into an agreement in writing with another that he should purchase the property and hold the same for his own benefit, unless such heir should repay him within a stated time, the transaction was held not to be a mortgage. In the course of opinion the court says: "Inasmuch, therefore, as appellants had no interest in the property by reason of the expiration of the twelve months (the period for redemption), there was no title in them which they could mortgage." This seems not to have been necessary, however, as a subsequent agreement was conceded to have made the transaction a mortgage.

In Loomis v. Loomis, 60 Barb. 22, one whose property was sold under foreclosure, who agreed with the purchaser to buy it back, and who procured his brother to furnish the money and take the title as security, was held not to have the rights of a mortgagor, the court stating that he had no interest in the property, and no consideration passed and therefore no mortgage existed. Apparently the period of redemption had expired in this case.

In Payne v. Patterson, 77 Pa. 136, where, by parol agreement between the former owner and a third person, the latter was to buy the property from the purchaser at a previous sheriff's sale, and the former was to remain on the property and have it back on payment of the purchase price and interest, it was held that he was not entitled to the rights of a mortgagor; and in the course of the opinion the court says: "We have already shown that he had no interest whatever in the land. He had no estate therein which could be bound by a mortgage or to which a mortgage could attach." It does not clearly appear from the report whether the period of redemption had expired in this case, but apparently it had. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Stephenson v. Thompson, 13 Ill. 186, an execution debtor whose land had been sold, and who after the time for redemption had expired had secured another to purchase the property, and had entered into a parol understanding that it should be conveyed to him upon reimbursement to such purchaser for his advances, was held not to have such an interest in the property as can be asserted in a court of equity, and an execution creditor of the debtor can claim no greater right. The court discussed the theory of mortgages, and held that it was not applicable to the facts of this case.

In Sterck v. Germantown Homestead Co. 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 336, a person desirous of purchasing property, who applied to a building and loan association, which thereupon purchased the property taking title thereto in its own name, and afterwards executed a contract with such person that, upon the payment of certain sums, she was to have a deed to the property, was held not to be entitled to the rights of a mortgagor, as at the time she had no interest in the property. In this case a statute abolishing oral defeasances was considered, and held to prevent recovery, even if the transaction should have been a mortgage.

In Schriber v. Le Clair, 66 Wis. 579, 29 N. W. 570, however, a surveyor engaged in the business of a woodsman, locating lands and ascertaining the amount and value of timber upon them, who, having made an estimate of the timber on certain government lands, entered into an agreement with another to advance the purchase price necessary to enter such lands, and to take title in his own name as security, was held entitled to the rights of a mortgagor. On the question of interest the court says: "True, as claimed, the defendant had no interest in the lands before the parties met. Neither had the plaintiff, but, as conceded, the defendant had hunted up the lands, made minutes of their descriptions, and estimated the amount and value of the timber upon them. This certainly was of value in securing the lands."

In Schneider v. Reed, 123 Wis. 488, 101 N. W. 682, the owners of property, part of

are two public utilities in said city of Milwaukee engaged in the production, transmission, delivery, and furnishing of heat and light, operating under intermediate permits.

"Seventh. These plaintiffs further show that said defendants have demanded of these plaintiffs that they comply with the provisions of chapter 499, Laws of 1907, and the various acts amendatory thereof, entitled 'An Act to Create §§ 1797m-1 to 1797m-108, inclusive, Statutes of 1898, Giving the Wisconsin Railroad Commission Jurisdiction over Public Utilities, Providing for the Regulation of Such Public Utilities, Appropriating a Sum Sufficient to Carry Out the Provisions of This Act, and Repealing Certain Acts in Conflict with the Provisions Hereof,' and have threatened to cause the attorney general of the state of Wisconsin to prosecute these plaintiffs under the provisions of said act, in case of their failure or neglect to comply therewith; and these plaintiffs further show that they are advised and believe that said chapter 499 of the Laws of 1907, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, are not applicable to these plaintiffs, or to any person or persons operating a light, heat, and power plant under conditions similar to those under which these plaintiffs are operating their said heat, light, and power plant in said Cawker building; that the provisions of said act, if applied to these plaintiffs, would render the operation of their said plant so expensive and burdensome as to compel these plaintiffs to cease the operation thereof, or to operate the same at a considerable loss to these plaintiffs; that if said act should be construed to be applicable to these plaintiffs, these plaintiffs are liable under the provisions thereof to forfeit a sum not less than $100, nor more than $1,000, per day, for each and every day during which they have, since the passage and publication of said act, or shall in the future, fail to comply with the provisions of said act; that the penalties so imposed are unreasonable and void, and are so large that the enforcement of said penalties against these plaintiffs might amount to a confiscation of the entire trust estate in their hands, to the irreparable injury of these plaintiffs and of the beneficiaries under the trust, by virtue of which these plaintiffs hold the premises hereinafter described; and that these plaintiffs have no adequate remedy at law.

"Wherefore, these plaintiffs pray the judgment of this court that said defendants, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents, servants, and employees be forever restrained and enjoined from enforcing, or seeking to enforce, the provisions of said chapter 499, Laws of 1907, as against these plaintiffs, or from making any order or orders under and by virtue of the authority vested in them by said act, requiring these plaintiffs to do or perform any act required by the provisions of said public utility law, or from in any manner interfering with the operation by these plaintiffs of their said heat, light, and power plant, and for such other and further relief as may be just and equitable, and for their costs in this action."

The defendants demurred on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and from an order overruling the demurrer they appealed.

Messrs. L. H. Bancroft, Attorney General, and Russell Jackson, for appellants.

Mr. Lewis M. Ogden, with Messrs. Ryan, Ogden, & Bottum, for respondents:

The respondents are not operating a public utility within the meaning of chapter 499, Laws of 1907.

Kansas City, 172 Mo. 534, 72 S. W. 944; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 733; Wisconsin River Improv. Co. v. Pier, 137 Wis. 337, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 538, 118 N. W. 857.

Vinje, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the allegations of the complaint set out in the foregoing statement of facts, it appears that plaintiffs built a plant for the purpose of furnishing the tenants of their own building with heat, light, and power; that the completed plant proved to be large enough, when economically run, to furnish more heat, light, and power than the tenants of their own building required, and that they sold the surplus to three of their adjoining neighbors. Does the operation of such a plant, under such circumstances, constitute a public utility, within the meaning of the statute, §§ 1797m-1 to 1797m-108, Stats. (Laws of 1907, chap. 499)? Section 1797m-1 defines a public utility as follows: "The term 'public utility' as used in this act shall mean and embrace every corporation, company, individual, association of individuals, their lessees, trustees, or receivers appointed by any court whatsoever, and every town, village, or city that now or hereafter may own, operate, manage, or control any plant or equipment, or any part of a plant or equipment, within the state, for the conveyance of telephone messages or for the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat, light, water, or power, either directly or indirectly, to or for the public." The state claims that by furnishing heat, light, and power to the tenants of their own building, the plaintiffs became a public utility; that the furnishing of such commodities to anyone else than to one's self is furnishing it to the public, within the meaning of the statute. It is obvious that such a construction is too narrow, for it would constitute the owner of every building furnishing heat or light to tenants, as well as every householder who rents a heated or lighted room, a public utility. The legislature never contemplated such a construction to be given the words "public utility." They must receive a construction that will effectuate the evident intent of the legislature, and not one that will lead to a manifest absurdity. It was not the furnishing of heat, light, or power to tenants, or, incidentally, to a few neighbors, that the legislature sought to regulate, but the furnishing of those commodities to the public; that is, to whoever might require the same. Wisconsin River Improv. Co. v. Pier, 137 Wis. 325, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 538, 118 N. W. 857. The use to which the plan, equipment, or some portion thereof is put must be for the public, in order to constitute it a public utility.

But whether or not the use is for the public does not necessarily depend upon the number of consumers; for there may be only one, and yet the use be for the public, as where a plant is built and operated for furnishing power to the public generally, but for a time finds one consumer who uses it all. If the product of the plant is intended for, and open to the use of, all the members of the public who may require it, to the extent of its capacity, the fact that only one or two thereof consume the entire product renders the plant none the less a public utility. On the other hand, a landlord may furnish it to a hundred tenants, or, incidentally, to a few neighbors, without coming either under the letter or the intent of the law. In the instant case, the purpose of the plant was to serve the tenants of the owners, a restricted class, standing in a certain contract relation with them, and not the public. The furnishing of power, light, and heat to a few neighbors was incidental merely, and limited to them. Should plaintiffs, however, enlarge their field of service, it is by no means certain that they would remain exempt 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

from the operation of the law. And, having come within its provisions, they would be required, to the extent of the capacity of their plant, to serve anyone making a demand upon them, under such regulations as the railroad commission might lawfully prescribe. Ibid.

It is very difficult, if not impossible, to frame a definition for the word "public" that is simpler or clearer than the word itself. The Century Dictionary defines it as: "Of or belonging to the people at large; relating to or affecting the whole people of a state, nation, or community; . . . not limited or restricted to any particular class of the community." The New International defines it as: "Of or pertaining to the people; relating to or affecting a nation, state, or community at large." The tenants of a landlord are not the public; neither are a few of his neighbors, or a few isolated individuals with whom he may choose to deal, though they are a part of the public. The word "public" must be construed to mean more than a limited class defined by the relation of landlord and tenant, or by nearness of location, as neighbors, or more than a few who, by reason of any peculiar relation to the owner of the plant, can be served by him.

While we find it quite easy to ascertain the true spirit and intent of the law, yet we deem it inexpedient and unsafe to attempt to define in more specific terms than the statute what does and what does not constitute a public utility. Each case will depend upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances, and must be tested by the statute in the light of such facts and circumstances. The law should receive a construction that will effectuate its true purpose, however difficult that may be. No resort should be had to any arbitrary standard, or to any fixed line of demarcation, on the ground that they are easy of application, or for any other reason. The statute was intended to include those, and only those, who furnished the commodities therein named to or for the public. It was not intended to affect the relation of landlord and tenant, or to abridge the right to contract with a few neighbors for a strictly incidental purpose, though relating to a service covered by it.

The conclusions we have arrived at render it unnecessary to determine whether or not the statute unreasonably abridges the right to contract, and whether or not that portion of it prescribing penalties is unconstitutional, on the ground that they are excessive.

unable to obtain any commission, and that he desired to acquire for himself an interest therein; that said applicants, Bennett and Longyear, were desirous of obtaining title to said Atwell interest; that it was thereupon agreed orally between said applicants, Bennett and Longyear, and said defendant Chesebrough, that said defendant should and would do what he was able to do in securing a transfer and conveyance of the Atwell interest; that said property should be purchased of said Atwell in the name of said applicants, Bennett and Longyear, or in the name of the clerk of one of them; that said Bennett and Longyear should pay the purchase price thereof; that said defendant Chesebrough should have a two-ninths ( $\frac{2}{9}$ ) interest in the two-

So, where the purchaser of land secured the title to be taken in the name of a third person as security to such third person for a debt owing him by the purchaser, and took an agreement back to convey the land upon the payment of such debt, such purchaser is entitled to the rights of a mortgagor. Parmer v. Parmer, 88 Ala. 545, 7 So. 657; Weed v. Stevenson, Clarke, Ch. 166.

But in Fowler v. Rice, 17 Pick. 100, one who purchased premises and had the title to the same taken in the name of another, to secure him against loss on a note of the purchaser on which he was surety, taking back a bond for reconveyance, was held not to be entitled to the rights of a mortgagor, and the person to whom he had mortgaged the premises not entitled to the right to redeem them. This case, however, is based on the limited equity powers of the court.

In Malloy v. Malloy, 35 Neb. 224, 52 N. W. 1097, one who had leased lands from the state and assigned the lease to another, under an agreement that the assignee should purchase the lands and pay the purchase price, and give the assignor the privilege of repurchasing them by paying the amount of such purchase price, was held entitled to the rights of a mortgagor.

In McPherson v. Hayward, 81 Me. 329, 17 Atl. 164, a purchaser from the state on a conditional deed on which he had made some payments, who executed a mortgage to another who completed the payments and took a deed from the state, is held entitled to the rights of a mortgagor, and those who succeeded him upon his death are held entitled to the right to redeem as against a purchaser with notice from the assignee in bankruptcy, the mortgagee.

In Dwen v. Blake, 44 Ill. 135, an assignee of land warrants, in the name of whose assignor title is taken to secure the payment of the purchase price, such assignor giving bonds for the reconveyance of such lands is held entitled to the rights of a mortgagor.

In Green v. Maddox, 97 Ark. 397, 134 S. W. 931, where one purchased at a judicial sale a piece of land, but had not made all the payments at the time of his death, and thereafter another paid the balance and received a deed for such land, subject to the right to redeem of the heirs of such purchaser, such person is held a trustee for the heirs, and the transaction in effect an equitable mortgage.

E. 148, a beneficiary under a will, who purchases land of the estate at an executor's sale thereof, and who thereafter agrees with another that title is to be taken in his name as security for the payment of the purchase price, occupies the position of a mortgagor.

In Krebs v. Lauser, 133 Iowa, 241, 110 N. W. 443, a lessee of land who gave the purchaser thereof notes aggregating the exact amount of the purchase price, and at the expiration of his lease took a written lease from the purchaser with a clause therein that he was to have the privilege of buying the land at a stated price, and providing that the rent shall be interest on such purchase money, was held not to have the rights of a mortgagor, as the facts proved were not sufficient for the court to declare the transaction a mortgage.

In Benge v. Benge, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 514, 23 S. W. 668, one who made a verbal agreement with another to purchase property and take title thereto in her own name as security for the purchase price was held not entitled to the rights of a mortgagor for the reason that he did not make the deed, and was not bound by it.

In Grout v. Stewart, 96 Minn. 230, 104 N. W. 966, a person who had a contract for purchase, and had a deed executed to the person loaning the money as security, and such person agreed to reconvey on the payment of the purchase price, was held entitled specifically to enforce the agreement.

In Weed v. Stevenson, supra, one who obtains property to be deeded to another to secure a debt, and who takes a defeasance or contract by which the creditor agrees to convey upon the payment of such debt, is held a mortgagor.

It is held in Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 34 Pac. 113, that a person who advances the purchase price of certain real estate, and takes title in his own name, and thereafter loans other sums to the purchaser, holds the land in trust for the purchaser, subject to a lien for the amount thus advanced by him, and may enforce the same by foreclosure.

In Starks v. Redfield, 52 Wis. 349, 9 N. W. 169, a person who had a void tax deed to premises, and who conducted negotiations for the purchase of such lands in the name of a third person, by whom the deed was taken upon an agreement to reconvey the same upon payment of the debt, was held to be a mortgagor in an action to restrain him from cutting timber on the lands.

thirds ( $\frac{2}{3}$ ) interest of said Atwell, being a four twenty-sevenths ( $\frac{4}{27}$ ) of the whole fee of said lands, and should pay two-ninths of the purchase price thereof to said Bennett and Longyear at any time within three years from said date, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum; that upon such payment said Chesebrough should have a deed of such interest from said Bennett and Longyear, or from the person in whose name title should be taken."

Facts further found in detail, briefly stated, are: Upon completion of the purchase, a contract was to be given Chesebrough containing the foregoing agreement, and Chesebrough was to give Bennett and Longyear, as security for the payment to be made by him, certain royalty agreements. Chesebrough, in attempting to secure a transfer of the Atwell interest, learned it could not be secured for less than $35,000. Bennett and Longyear thereupon agreed with him that it should be purchased at that price under the same arrangement. Chesebrough then had Cook procure a deed of the Atwell interest made to Bennett and Longyear's clerk, who later conveyed to Bennett and Longyear, and Bennett and Longyear paid the $35,000 purchase price.

After receiving such deed, Bennett and Longyear refused to execute a contract to Chesebrough pursuant to the agreement, and refused to convey an interest in the land to Chesebrough, although Chesebrough demanded such contract, "after doing all the things required of him by said agreement." And, further, "that when said Bennett and Longyear entered into said oral agreement with said Chesebrough, they intended in good faith to abide by it and to carry out its terms."

It is further found that the defendant Chesebrough thereafter transferred to the defendant Harrison one half of his interest under such agreement.

By his memorandum the trial judge indicated that the theory on which the right of Chesebrough and Harrison to a deed of an undivided four twenty-sevenths of the land was adjudged is that the facts found created an equitable mortgage.

The defendants take the position that the transaction constitutes an equitable mortgage, but, if not, that the facts establish an oral agreement to convey land, which is taken out of the statute of frauds by the part performance on the part of Chesebrough.

The applicants take the position, first, that no equitable mortgage was created because, at the time of the transaction claimed to constitute a mortgage, Chesebrough had no estate or right in the land, has never had any mortgageable interest therein, and the arrangement made was within the statute of frauds; second, that specific performance of the oral agreement to convey cannot be decreed because there was no such partial performance of the agreement as to take it out of the statute of frauds.

The findings of fact are relied upon by the defendants as sufficient to sustain the conclusion upon either position taken by them; that is, as showing an equitable mortgage or an oral promise to convey. There is no specific finding that the claimed interest of Chesebrough was agreed to be held as security, or that it was so held. Chesebrough's version of the conversation which constituted the agreement contains some phrases tending to characterize it as a mortgage, and others equally apt to characterize it as a privilege to buy in the future at a specified price. The applicants claim that from the evidence nothing could be found beyond an oral promise to sell an undivided interest to Chesebrough, if they acquired the land, made on the representation of Chesebrough that he would be unable to obtain a commission from the seller. The applicants further claim from the evidence that Chesebrough, contrary to such representation, did receive $1,000 as a commission from Cook, and that they thereupon refused to carry out their oral agreement, but offered to pay to Chesebrough an additional sum to make a full broker's commission. The trial court made no finding as to whether or not Chesebrough did receive $1,000 as a commission, and, if so, the circumstances of such payment; but in the decision Chesebrough and Harrison are required to pay, in consideration of a conveyance of the specified interest, $1,000 in excess of two ninths of the amount paid for the Atwell interest. The controversy arising out of the claimed receipt by Chesebrough of $1,000, and the subsequent refusal on the part of Bennett and Longyear to carry out the oral agreement, and the charges and countercharges of bad faith, are not material to the decision of the legal status of the parties, and presumably, for that reason, the facts with reference thereto are not fully found, and the question need not here be discussed. While a number of the errors assigned by the applicants go to the refusal of the trial court to change or add to the findings, yet their main claim is, as stated above, that the facts found do not sustain the decision on any theory, and counsel for the defendants and applicants have discussed fully their conflicting claims as to the decision being sustained by the facts found upon either theory,—that of an equitable mortgage, or a right to specific performance of a promise to convey. We will dispose of the case as thus submitted. It will not be necessary, therefore, to consider whether, under the evidence, the findings should be limited to a finding of the existence of one or the other agreement.

Considering, first, the claim chiefly urged by counsel for defendant Chesebrough, that the decision made may be sustained as a decree for the specific performance of an agreement to convey land: This claim assumes that the oral promise made by Bennett and Longyear to convey to Chesebrough an undivided two ninths of the Atwell interest was so in part performed by Chesebrough as to take the agreement out of the statute of frauds. The equitable doctrine thus invoked rests on the ground of fraud. "The underlying principle is that, where one of the contracting parties has been induced or allowed to alter his situation on the faith of an oral agreement within the statute, to such an extent that it would be a fraud on the part of the other party to set up its invalidity, equity will make the case an exception to the statute." Brown v. Hoag, 35 Minn. 373, 29 N. W. 135. The courts have not attempted to define what extent or character of change in the situation induced by the oral agreement will be sufficient to estop the party inducing such change from questioning the validity of the oral promise. It must be a change of such character and to such an extent that the interposing of the defense of the statute would be a fraud. The mere denial of the right promised by the oral agreement, the loss of that which existed only by virtue of the oral promise, being deprived of the bargain, does not create an exceptional situation as to the statute, but the very situation the statute covers. To take a case out of the statute because of such resulting loss or injury annuls the statute. The injury or loss which would result from the enforcement of the statute must arise from the acts done in performance or in pursuance of the oral agreement, and such acts must so far alter the situation of the parties seeking to avoid the statute that it would be unjust and against conscience to allow the other party, who has permitted such change to take place in pursuance of his oral agreement, to thereafter refuse to perform on his part. Ibid; Slingerland v. Slingerland, 39 Minn. 197, 39 N. W. 146; Thomas v. Rogers, 108 Minn. 132, 133 Am. St. Rep. 421, 121 N. W. 630.

no interest in the Atwell land. He had a broker's chance to attempt to buy it if he found someone ready to buy, for whom he could act. His knowledge of or information as to the situation was that one Cook was in position to negotiate with the owner, and that the land probably could be bought. Under these circumstances, Chesebrough stating that he would be unable to get a commission from the owner, Bennett and Longyear made the oral agreement with him that, if he succeeded in buying the Atwell title for them, they would give him a contract for the purchase of an undivided two ninths. Thereafter he did successfully negotiate, through Cook, the purchase by Bennett and Longyear of the Atwell title. Clearly neither the services performed by Chesebrough in negotiating the purchase, nor the loss of the opportunity to buy the undivided two ninths from Bennett and Longyear, by their refusal to carry out the oral agreement, takes the agreement out of the statute under the rule invoked. Thomas v. Rogers, 108 Minn. 132, 133 Am. St. Rep. 421, 121 N. W. 630; Townsend v. Fenton, 32 Minn. 482, 21 N. W. 726; Levy v. Brush, 45 N. Y. 589; Russell v. Briggs, 165 N. Y. 500, 53 L.R.A. 556, 59 N. E. 303.

It is urged, however, that Chesebrough, in reliance on the oral promise of Bennett and Longyear, lost an opportunity to buy the land himself, or to find other purchasers who would give him an interest in the land. While this opportunity affords a wide range of conjecture and speculation as to possible results, its surrender does not bring Chesebrough within the principle here invoked. He lost a broker's chance to find a buyer and get in touch with Cook and make a sale,—a chance open to others. Every broker who succeeds in closing a deal evidences a somewhat favorable position with reference to that deal. This opportunity was clearly something indefinite, general, and unsubstantial. There must be a definite and substantial change in situation, in performance, or in furtherance of the oral agreement, before it can be said that it would be a fraud to invoke the statute against such agreement. Browne, Stat. Fr. §§ 445, 460; Lanz v. McLaughlin, 14 Minn. 72, Gil. 55; Thomas v. Rogers, 108 Minn. 132, 133 Am. St. Rep. 421, 121 N. W. 630; Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 491, 29 L. ed. 703, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486.

In the cases (Slingerland v. Slingerland, 39 Minn. 197, 39 N. W. 146, and White v. Poole, 74 N. H. 71, 65 Atl. 255) greatly relied on by respondents' counsel as sustaining his claim herein, acts clearly resulting in a substantial definite change in situation were performed in pursuance of the oral agreement. In this fundamental particular, these cases differ from the instant case.

The other ground on which it is claimed the decision may be sustained is that the transaction between Chesebrough, on the one hand, and Bennett and Longyear, on the other, constituted an equitable mortgaging of two ninths of the Atwell title by Chesebrough to Bennett and Longyear. By the decision, the right of Chesebrough and Harrison to a conveyance and deed of an undivided two ninths of the Atwell two thirds of lot 5 is adjudged. Prior to the making of the oral agreement, Chesebrough had no title to or interest in the Atwell land. Through the Atwell deed to Bennett and Longyear's clerk, Chesebrough lost, conveyed, or allowed to lapse no equitable or legal title or interest in the property included in the Atwell deed. Atwell, when he deeded, neither intended to nor did convey any right or interest belonging to Chesebrough, nor intended to nor did convey any right or interest to Chesebrough. If any right or interest in the land ever did vest in Chesebrough, it is solely through the oral promise of Bennett and Longyear, that is, through the oral promise of the persons against whom the promise is sought to be enforced. Upon this point there can be no difference in statement under the facts of this case. But it is claimed that, because Bennett and Longyear's promise to Chesebrough was to hold the land as security, thereby such oral promise to convey on payment by Chesebrough becomes enforceable against the persons making the promise, as conferring an equity of redemption. The very apparent departure from recognized rules governing the transfer of interests in realty involved in this claim, coupled with the fact that the court below makes it the basis for a decree transferring a considerable interest in lands, invites a careful consideration of the principles governing the creation of equitable mortgages.

It is elementary that any interest in real estate which may be sold or assigned may be mortgaged; and, conversely, that some estate or interest capable of being mortgaged, held by the mortgagor, is essential to the existence of a mortgage. When a transaction constitutes a mortgage, therefore, there must be, either independently of the transaction, some interest in the mortgagor capable of being mortgaged, or through the transaction itself such interest must be acquired by the mortgagor. Courts of equity have long been concerned with preserving from forfeiture this interest in the mortgagor. The designation given that interest—equity of redemption—suggests the history of its preservation rather more clearly than its nature. In accord with other principles of equity affording protection to the interest of the mortgagor, it is the established law that where an interest in land is parted with as security, equity will, regardless of the form of the transfer, treat it as a mortgage. The generally accepted and announced rule is: A deed or conveyance of land, absolute and unconditional on its face, but intended by the parties to be security, will be regarded and treated in equity as a mortgage. The form of the transaction will not preclude an inquiry into its true nature. "Nor need the deed even be made by the debtor. It is sufficient if the debtor, who claims to occupy the position of a mortgagor with the right of redemption, has an interest, legal or equitable, in the premises, and the grantee of the legal title acquired it by the act and assent of the debtor, and as security for his debt." 27 Cyc. 993.

As stated in Fisk v. Stewart, 24 Minn. 97: "Nor is it at all important as affecting the rights and obligations of the party taking the conveyance, that he received it from another who happens to hold the legal title, instead of the borrower, in whom is vested the equity of redemption, so that it is obtained through the instance and request of the latter and for his benefit."

And in Niggeler v. Maurin, 34 Minn. 118, 24 N. W. 369: "Plaintiff, being vested with the equitable title to the land, had an interest capable of being mortgaged. . . . It is entirely immaterial, under such circumstances, whether the trustee of the legal title should convey to the mortgagee directly by the arrangement of the parties, or that it should pass to him through the mortgagor." Randall v. Constans, 33 Minn. 329, 23 N. W. 530; St. Paul Division No. 1 v. Brown, 9 Minn. 151, Gil. 141; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 915, 943; Jones, Mortg. §§ 136, 331.

The nature or extent of the interest in the premises, or the manner in which it is evidenced, is unimportant; but under the rule as stated, there must be some interest in the claimed mortgagor which, but for the protection of a court of equity, would be surrendered and lost through the transaction. In the instant case, at the time of making the oral agreement with Bennett and Longyear, Chesebrough had no right or interest, legal or equitable, in the land. He was a stranger alike to Atwell and to Atwell's title at that time.

Therefore there was nothing belonging to Chesebrough, either actually or potentially, which he could mortgage, and therefore nothing a court of equity could protect from the operation of an instrument or a transaction intended as a mortgage, but in form something else. Through the transaction here involved, Chesebrough transferred, surrendered, or lost no interest or right connected with the land involved. If it is determined that he now has no right in the land, his complaint could only be that by the transaction he did not acquire an interest,—the interest orally promised by Bennett and Longyear. The requirement of some interest in the land mortgaged is, of course, satisfied, if, as part of the carrying out of the transaction constituting the mortgage, such interest is transferred by any lawful means to the mortgagor. Such would have been the instant case if, to carry out or as part of the transaction, Atwell had deeded to Chesebrough, and he, in turn, had deeded to Bennett and Longyear, or if Bennett and Longyear had given to Chesebrough a written contract evidencing an interest in the land, or if there had been "part performance" by Chesebrough of the oral agreement.

It is claimed on the part of the defendants that certain recent cases, including one in this state, show a departure from or denial of the rule that an interest in the mortgagor, created or evidenced by something outside of the oral mortgage agreement, is essential to the finding of an equitable mortgage. The decisions of other courts so relied upon are: Starks v. Redfield, 52 Wis. 349, 9 N. W. 168; Schriber v. Le Clair, 66 Wis. 579, 29 N. W. 570, 889; Jourdain v. Fox, 90 Wis. 99, 62 N. W. 936; Schneider v. Reed, 123 Wis. 488, 101 N. W. 682; Jones v. Gillett, 142 Iowa, 506, 118 N. W. 314, 121 N. W. 5; Krebs v. Lauser, 133 Iowa, 241, 110 N. W. 443; Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 34 Pac. 113; Watts v. Kellar, 5 C. C. A. 394, 12 U. S. App. 274, 56 Fed. 1; Hall v. O'Connell, 51 Or. 225, 94 Pac. 564.

The decision in one of these cases goes to the extent necessary to sustain the position of the defendants in the instant case. In each one the claimed equitable mortgagor was related to the title by some means other than the oral promise of the mortgagee,—the person against whom the promise was sought to be enforced. The opinions in these cases do not, as we understand them, announce the rule that without such relation, solely on the oral promise of the mortgagee, an interest in the land may be transferred to the mortgagor. A failure to distinguish the cases in which the equitable mortgage may be found, because, as 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

part of the transaction, by written instrument or other effectual means, an interest in the mortgaged land is transferred to the mortgagor, from the cases in which the creation of the equitable mortgage must depend upon a prior interest of the mortgagor, has caused some confusion of statement in the cases.

In the cases of Stitt v. Rat Portage Lumber Co. 96 Minn. 27, 104 N. W. 561, and Grout v. Stewart, 96 Minn. 230, 104 N. W. 966, this court had under consideration transactions constituting equitable mortgages, but the decision in neither case goes to the extent necessary to sustain the title of the defendants in the instant case. In the Stitt Case the parties claiming as equitable mortgagors contracted with the owners for the purchase of the lands involved; the money for such purchase being advanced by the other party, in whose name title was taken as security for the repayment of the purchase price so advanced. Further, under the arrangement, the claimed mortgagors, "pursuant to the agreement, procured deeds to the lands involved, went into possession thereof, built camps, cleared out logging and tote roads, constructed dams, cleaned out streams, opened up part of the lands as a farm, and raised crops." They paid on the mortgage indebtedness a large sum. From these facts the conclusion that there was a part performance of the oral agreement was properly reached. Upon this argument it is urged that an examination of the record in the Stitt Case discloses that in three tracts of the land the claimed mortgagors did not acquire an interest through contracts with the owners. If such be the fact, the decision of this court rendered in that case as to these three tracts is fully sustained within the general rule first stated, because of the part performance of the contract. In the Grout Case the person who claimed as mortgagor had an interest in the land mortgaged prior to the transaction constituting the equitable mortgage.

A state of facts very similar to the facts in the instant case was before the supreme court of Illinois in the recent case of Heaton v. Gaines, 198 Ill. 479, 64 N. E. 1081. The court in that case thus announces the rule which we deem applicable to the facts in the present case: "Without an ownership in lands, there can be no mortgage of them. Payne v. Patterson, 77 Pa. 136; Carpenter v. Plagge, 192 Ill. 82, 61 N. E. 530; Burgett v. Osborne, 172 Ill. 227, 50 N. E. 206. Edward Smith Heaton cannot be said to have owned any equity of redemption which was kept alive by any agreement between Ford and the appellee. Heaton had no interest in the property which could sus-tain a parol agreement by appellee to buy the property for his benefit, and to convey it to him when required. Inasmuch as such an agreement, even if it existed, created an interest in land by parol, it could not be sustained under the statute of frauds. A naked promise by appellee to buy lands in his own name, pay for them with his own money, and hold them for the benefit of Edward Smith Heaton, could not be enforced in equity. Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624, 24 L. ed. 1027; Stephenson v. Thompson, 13 Ill. 186; Perry v. McHenry, 13 Ill. 227; Magnusson v. Johnson, 73 Ill. 156; Caprez v. Trover, 96 Ill. 456; Wilson v. McDowell, 78 Ill. 514." Carpenter v. Plagge, 192 Ill. 82, 61 N. E. 530.

And in Conkey v. Rex, 212 Ill. 444, 72 N. E. 370: "Defendant in error calls our attention to the fact that a court of equity disregards form, and seeks the substance of the transaction, and argues that it is therefore immaterial that the title to the land in controversy was never in Rex. We are referred to a number of authorities in support of this proposition, and find that in each of those cases, where the court has given the matter any consideration, the party in whom the right of redemption was held to exist had some interest in the real estate, legal or equitable, prior to the execution of the deed from the third party to the person held to be a mortgagee. . . . In the case at bar, at the time of the execution of the deed from Carr to Conkey, Rex had no interest, legal or equitable, which he could assert, in the real estate; and as he had nothing which could be mortgaged, the deed in question cannot be regarded as a mortgage from him to Conkey."

No matter how much obscurity may arise from the application of the doctrine to complicated facts, the doctrine of equitable mortgages cannot be made effectual to convey or transfer a title to the mortgagor, but finds its full scope in protecting the interest of the mortgagor—any legal or equitable right or interest in the land—by preserving a right of redemption.

This principle, that some right or interest of the mortgagor in the land mortgaged is a prerequisite to the creation of an equitable mortgage, finds its importance not merely as a definition of a mortgage, nor because it adds to the equities of the mortgagor. Many situations disconnected from any interest in the land may present equally serious and quite similar hardships, if the form of the writings control the nature of the transaction in a given case. But if the rule were relaxed or abrogated to the extent necessary to sustain a finding of an equitable mortgage in the instant case,—that is, a right to the fee in Chesebrough 37 L.R.A. (N.S.), and a mortgage lien right in Bennett and Longyear,—a fundamental change would thereby be made in the law governing the transfer of interests in land, and a change directly in conflict with the statute of frauds. It is frequently and correctly stated that the statute of frauds has no application to parol proof of an equitable mortgage, but this is for the obvious reason that such proof, by establishing an equitable mortgage, does not transfer to the mortgagor an interest in land. The oral proof simply limits the effect of a conveyance absolute in form to the agreed effect,—a transfer as security. Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 3 Am. Rep. 418; Campbell v. Dearborn, 109 Mass. 130, 12 Am. Rep. 671.

Such is the stated rule in Stitt v. Rat Portage Lumber Co. supra: "That a deed, absolute on its face, can be shown by parol evidence to be in fact a mortgage, is elementary. . . . Parol evidence is admissible for this purpose, notwithstanding the statute of frauds."

But if a parol agreement, though containing the terms of a mortgage, is relied on to transfer the fee to the mortgagor, to such agreement the statute of frauds is exactly applicable. Such agreement, in so far as it transfers an interest to the mortgagor, is not properly described as an agreement for an equitable mortgage. Equity never transferred a title to the mortgagor by the doctrine of equitable mortgages. That doctrine fulfils its purpose by protecting the title vested by other means in the mortgagor. In effect, the defendants' claim is that solely by parol agreement,—an agreement supported by a consideration, but not in writing,—they are vested with the estate or interest of the mortgagor in a tract of land. That such interest is an equitable estate matters not, for it is thereby potentially a legal estate. The form of the decree in this case is that the right of the defendants to have a conveyance and deed of the property in question upon the payment of a specified sum is adjudged. The complete legal title is transferred without a writing signed by the party required to make the transfer, or without any right acquired from any other party having an interest in the land. It is apparent that the fact that the title in the present case comes from a third party is not a distinguishing feature; the claimed mortgagors confessedly having no relationship to such third party, or through him, with the land. Chesebrough derives all his rights from Bennett and Longyear's title, and their oral agreement. His services as broker furnish sufficient consideration for the promise to convey, but it in no way establishes any relationship with the source of their title.

If a title can be decreed in Chesebrough under these circumstances, then equally, if Bennett and Longyear, for a good consideration, made the same oral promise as to a tract of land which they had long owned, the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee would equally be created, and a mortgagor's title vested in Chesebrough. In legal principle there is no distinction between the instant case and any case where the owner of land orally agreed to convey the same to another for a specified price, promising to hold the land as security until the payment of the price.

It is unnecessary to discuss the wisdom of the legislation requiring contracts for a transfer of real property to be in writing. The statute of frauds expresses the fixed legislative policy of the state, and the court should not, by the extension of any equitable doctrine beyond established limits, interfere with such legislative policy. The instant case illustrates one of the very situations that the statute was passed to avoid. A valuable interest in land is made dependent upon the conflicting oral evidence of the interested parties. The trial court, while determining the nature of the transaction as claimed by the defendants, resolved the dispute as to the extent of interest promised in accordance with the claim of the applicants. The statement made by one of the counsel for the defendants, in his brief, that the titles to many valuable tracts of ore-bearing lands were continually being transferred in the northern part of the state in fulfillment of oral promises, suggests the inadequacy of any system of law to protect those who may suffer loss through intentional voluntary disregard of well-understood legal requirements.

The facts found do not sustain the decision adjudging the defendants, on payment of a specified sum, entitled to a conveyance of an undivided four twenty-sevenths of the land involved in the application for registration, on either theory advanced by the defendants. The trial court was clearly correct in the opinion expressed that the facts found do not show a joint venture or partnership between Bennett and Longyear and Chesebrough in the Atwell land; nor could Bennett and Longyear be adjudged thereunder to hold an interest for Chesebrough as trustees. We conclude the decision of the court below is not sustained by the findings of fact.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions that the conclusion of law and decision be amended in accordance with this opinion, and judgment entered therein.

Lewis, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The decision reached by the majority is based upon the premise that it is essential to the existence of an equitable mortgage that some estate or interest in the debtor shall exist at the time of the creation of the mortgage relation. If this premise is sound, then the facts of this case are not within the rule, and the decision of the majority is correct. But, if the doctrine of equitable mortgage is not based upon the fact of a pre-existing interest in the mortgagor, then the argument of the opinion and the conclusions reached are not justified by the facts. In most of the cases where the doctrine has been discussed, it was conceded that the mortgagor or debtor had an interest, or owned the land, and the title was conveyed under an agreement to hold it as security for a loan, and the discussion of the general principles involved in those decisions did not necessarily reach back to the roots of the doctrine. For instance, in Niggler v. Maurin, 34 Minn. 118, 24 N. W. 369, there was no question but what Mr. Niggler was the owner in fee of the property when he deeded it to Mr. Maurin, and the expression of the court that the plaintiff was vested with the equitable title and had an interest capable of being mortgaged was sufficient for the occasion.

It is admitted that Bennett and Longyear agreed to carry Chesebrough for the amount represented by two ninths of the two thirds purchased. They advanced the money for him, and agreed to hold the title in their own names as part security for the loan. There was talk of Chesebrough furnishing additional security, and the moneys coming in on the royalties were to be applied in part payment. The transaction clearly amounted to a joint purchase of the two-thirds interest in the proportion of two ninths by Chesebrough, and seven ninths by Bennett and Longyear, they to hold his interest as security for the advancement by them. The transaction was not a purchase of the entire interest by Bennett and Longyear, and then a resale of the two ninths to Chesebrough. Let us suppose that Atwell had conveyed the two-ninths interest to Chesebrough and the seven-ninths interest to Bennett and Longyear, and that Chesebrough had executed a mortgage upon his two-ninths interest to Bennett and Longyear to secure them for the advancement to pay for his interest, would the transaction have been any more a mortgage than was accomplished by what actually did take place? Under the arrangement Chesebrough acquired an interest in the purchase the instant Bennett and Longyear became the grantees, and the agreement that Bennett and Longyear hold that interest as security became at once effective. The transaction resulted in creating an equitable mortgage in favor of Chesbrough, although his interest and the mortgage relation were created at the same time by the same transaction.

In the majority opinion, reference is made to Schriber v. LeClair, 66 Wis. 579, 29 N. W. 570, 889, and to other cases from Wisconsin, Iowa, California, and Oregon, and it is stated that no one of the cases goes to the extent necessary to sustain the position of the decision in this case. It all depends upon the point of view. As I read most of those cases, they stand for the doctrine that the interest of the mortgagor may be created simultaneously with the agreement to hold that interest as security for a loan; that such an agreement is just as effective to create an equitable mortgage as where the title has been conveyed by the debtor under an agreement that it be held as security. In Schriber v. LeClair, the court ignored the writing and went back to the original agreement, which was proved by parol.

The principle is stated in Krebs v. Lauer, 133 Iowa, 241, 110 N. W. 443, but it was held that the evidence was insufficient to meet the rule that an absolute deed cannot be established as a mortgage, except upon clear and satisfactory evidence. The doctrine was applied later in Jones v. Gillett, 142 Iowa, 506, 118 N. W. 314, 121 N. W. 5. In that case Jones, desiring to purchase the land from one Davidson for $1,760, applied to Gillett for a loan of a part of the purchase money; it being verbally agreed between them that the defendant would advance the necessary amount at 7 per cent and take a deed for the land from Davidson as security. Subsequently the defendant agreed to advance the entire purchase price, and took a deed from the owner with that understanding, and secured himself for the payment of the interest by a nominal lease of the land at a rental which amounted to 7 per cent of the purchase price, and finally defendant repudiated the contract and attempted to hold the land. The court said that parol evidence was admissible to show that the deed was subject to an agreement that the defendant should hold the title as security only. To the same effect is Hall v. O'Connell, 52 Or. 164, 95 Pac. 717, 96 Pac. 1070. The facts were essentially the same as here, with the exception that in this case Chesbrough bought only a part, instead of the entire, interest.

As I understand the case of Stitt v. Rat Portage Lumber Co. 96 Minn. 27, 104 N. W. 561, this principle was applied to the three 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tracts of land known as the "Loper & Rumery," the "Murray," and the "Houlton," with respect to which Mr. Stitt had no interest, legal or equitable, and it was held that it might be shown by parol evidence that the company had taken title to those lands under an agreement to hold them as security. That part of the opinion dealing with the doctrine of equitable estoppel was written advisedly, and the case was not disposed of on the ground that the contract had been partly performed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

JACOB LAMPERT, Resp't.,
v.

JUDGE & DOLPH DRUG COMPANY et al.,
Appts.

(238 Mo. 409, 141 S. W. 1095).

Damages — punitive — infringement of trademark — nominal.

1. Punitive damages may be allowed for the infringement of a trademark, although the actual damages are only nominal.

Same — legal malice — substituting cigars.

2. The placing by a retailer of inferior cigars in trademarked boxes, and making sales therefrom, is legal malice, which will justify punitive damages in favor of the owner of the trademark.

(November 14, 1911.)

CERTIFICATION by the St. Louis Court of Appeals to the Supreme Court of question arising upon appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the infringement of a trademark. Affirmed.

Note. — Punitive damages for infringing trademark, tradename, or copyright, where amount of actual damages not established.

As to damages recoverable for infringement as affected by loss of profits, see note in 51 L.R.A. 801.

As to the right to recover damages for infringement, as distinguished from profits, where proceeding is in equity to enjoin the infringement, see note in 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 528.

It is stated generally in 13 Cyc. 109, that although the courts have not been uniform in awarding exemplary damages where the injury is purely nominal, yet where the law implies sufficient damages to sustain the action, it has been held sufficient ground to warrant the imposition of vindictive damages, but as a rule it must be shown by the evidence that actual damages are due.

Although questioned in Taylor v. Carpen-

Statement by Roy, C.:

This is a suit instituted February 23, 1904, in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, for damages for the infringement of a trademark. On a jury trial, October 19, 1904, plaintiff had a verdict for 1 cent compensatory damages, and $500 punitive damages, and judgment accordingly. On appeal to the St. Louis court of appeals, the judgment was reversed in an opinion reported in 119 Mo. App. 693, 100 S. W. 659. One of the judges of that court being of the opinion that the decision is in conflict with Kennedy v. North Missouri R. Co. 36 Mo. 351, the cause was certified to this court.

The Judge & Dolph Drug Company, one of the defendants, is a corporation engaged in selling drugs and cigars at retail in St. Louis for a good many years. Defendant Taylor was the cigar clerk of the company from October, 1900, to the time of the trial.

Plaintiff claimed in his petition that he had been making and selling cigars in St. Louis for fifteen years under a trademark which was composed of the words "Flor de Lampert" and the picture of the plaintiff, which trademark was by the plaintiff, on February 26, 1892, filed and recorded in the United States Commissioner of Patents Office; that, by reason of the quality of the tobacco used, and the efforts of plaintiff in advertising the same, the plaintiff's cigars sold under said trademark had gained great reputation on account of their excellent quality; and that during all that time plaintiff had received large profits from the sale of the cigars; that plaintiff, during the time from March 11, 1902, to February 15, 1904, sold to defendants cigars so manufactured by plaintiff, on the boxes of which was said trademark, and said cigars were so sold to defendants to be sold at retail to their customers; that during all that time defendants, well knowing the reputation of plaintiff's cigars for excellent quality, did wrongfully, wilfully, and wickedly substitute and place other cigars of cheap and inferior quality in the boxes bearing said trademark, and sold them to their customers as and for cigars manufactured by the plaintiff, thereby intending to injure the plaintiff and to injure the reputation of plaintiff's cigars, and to cheat and defraud the public and their customers. The actual damages were alleged at $5,000, and the punitive damages at the same amount. The answer admitted the corporate existence of the drug company, but was, in effect, otherwise a general denial. The evidence tended to establish all the allegations of the petition, and tended to show several sales by Taylor, as such clerk, of substituted, inferior cigars from boxes having said trademark.

Defendant Taylor was arrested and fined in the Federal court for violation of the ter, 2 Woodb. & M. 21, Fed. Cas. No. 13,785, the doctrine is clear that under some circumstances, as where the infringement involves an actual fraud, in an action at law for damages for an infringement of a trademark, tradename, or copyright, in addition to actual damages, punitive or exemplary damages are recoverable. Warner v. Roehr, Fed. Cas. No. 17,189a; Hennessy v. Wilmerding-Loewe Co. 103 Fed. 90, and see also Cusimano v. Olive Oil Importing Co. 114 La. 312, 38 So. 200, holding that, although the evidence is not sufficient to enable the court to render a judgment for any specific amount of damages for loss of sales caused by an infringement, yet the court, being empowered in infringement cases to fix the amount of damages as it may deem just and reasonable, may take into consideration all the circumstances, and use discretion in fixing the damages.

And at least where the damages are actual, even though the evidence thereof is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover more than nominal damages, if the infringement complained of is fraudulent and wilful, it seems clear that, in addition to nominal damages, punitive or exemplary damages are recoverable. In addition to LAMPERT v. JUDGE & D. DRUG Co., which sustains this doctrine, it finds support in Press Pub. Co. v. Monroe, a circuit court of appeals case, 51 L.R.A. 353, 19 C. C. A. 429, 38 U. S. App. 410, 72 Fed. 196. In 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

this case a poem by the plaintiff was accepted by the World's Fair Association of Chicago, to be delivered on the opening day of the World's Fair, the defendant in some manner not explained, prior to this occasion, obtained a copy of the poem, and with knowledge of the rights of the author and of her objection to its being published prior to the date mentioned, published the same. Under these circumstances, although the wrong done the plaintiff was incapable of being measured by a money standard, and hence only nominal damages were otherwise recoverable, the right in addition to such damages, to recover exemplary damages, was sustained. This case is referred to and quoted from in LAMPERT v. JUDGE & D. DRUG Co. It is also referred to with approval in Hennessy v. Wilmerding-Loewe Co. supra, and distinguished, the distinction being made between an action at law for damages and a bill in equity to restrain an infringement, the court holding that while exemplary damages are recoverable in an action at law, they are not recoverable in equity.

While this particular question was not discussed in Addington v. Cullinane, 28 Mo. App. 238, it was there held that the evidence, while showing actual damages, did not furnish a sufficient basis for determining the same, and that hence only nominal damages were recoverable for an infringement of a trademark.

revenue laws in such sales. The revenue officers testified to finding the substituted cigars in boxes having plaintiff's trademark, in the defendants' store, and at the same time finding plaintiff's genuine cigars in another such box. The president of defendant drug company loaned Taylor $25 to pay his fine in the Federal court, and retained him in its employ.

Mr. Bierman, deputy collector of internal revenue, testified that he bought three of the substituted cigars, and that two were left in the box; he went out and gave the cigar to Mr. Lampert, and when he went back there were sixteen cigars in the box. On cross-examination by defendants' counsel, Mr. Atwood, deputy collector of internal revenue, testified that complaints had been made to him by various other cigar makers that defendants were substituting their cigars. Mr. Farrar, a real estate man, testified that the substituted cigars were like "these machine cigars, so they call them; smooth, round, straight, light cigars that haven't any taste,—no flavor."

There was no direct evidence to show that anyone connected with the drug company, except Taylor, had any knowledge of the infringement. Mr. Judge, president of the drug company, disclaimed any knowledge of any substitution of cigars, and testified that the company carried a $90,000 stock of goods, with $80,000 insurance, and was worth net $10,000, with $15,000 capital stock.

The fourth and fifth instructions were as follows:

"(4) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendants wilfully and maliciously, between the dates of November 1, 1903, and February 15, 1904, sold cigars which were not manufactured by plaintiff, from boxes having thereon the trademark and picture of plaintiff, as cigars manufactured by plaintiff, and if the jury further finds from the evidence that the plaintiff is entitled to compensatory or actual damages in any sum whatever, as defined in other instructions given to them, then they are at liberty to find in addition to said actual damages such further sum in the way of exemplary or punitive damages, by way of punishment to defendants, and as an example to others, as, in their sound judgment, under all the evidence in the case, they believe the defendants ought to pay, not exceeding $5,000.

"(5) The jury are instructed that malice is the wilful or intentional doing of a wrongful act without legal justification or excuse."

Roy, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

The trial court properly refused defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence. The evidence fully covered the plaintiff's case as made by the pleadings, except that there was no evidence as to the quantum of damages. It is the clearly established law that for every infraction of his legal right the party injured is entitled to at least nominal damages, and we adhere to the opinion of the court of appeals on that point.

2. Whether exemplary damages are recoverable where there are allowed only nominal actual damages is a question as to which the authorities are divided; the courts of this state and the Federal courts, as well as legal reason, and the greater weight of authority, being in favor of such recovery. Some of the decisions of the courts speak of nominal damages as being something else than actual damages, whereas the nominal damages assessed for the violation of a legal right, where there is no showing as to the quantum of damages, are actual or compensatory damages. This court has spoken very clearly on that subject in Hoagland v. Forest Park Highlands Amusement Co. 170 Mo. loc. cit. 345, 94 Am. St. Rep. 740, 70 S. W. 880, where it is said: "The jury in finding for plaintiff in effect found that defendants arrested the plaintiff, and cursed and abused him without any lawful excuse or reason therefor, and upon that finding he was entitled to have actual damages in some amount assessed in his favor. Under such circumstances, at the common law he is entitled to pecuniary reparation by way of damages, at least nominal, and as much more, if anything, as the jury may think him entitled to under the evidence." The consensus of authority is to the effect that punitive damages are not recoverable where no actual damages are allowed. But that is a very different thing from holding that they are not recoverable in connection with nominal actual damages. There are comparatively few cases holding that nominal actual damages will not support exemplary damages.

The leading case in opposition to the allowance of punitive damages where only nominal actual damages are allowed is Stacy v. Portland Pub. Co. for libel, 68 Me. 279. The court in that case cited no authorities, and its reasons for so holding were based almost entirely on the peculiar facts of that case, and in the conclusion the following language is used: "There may be cases, no doubt, where the actual damages would be but small, and the punitive damages large. But this case is not of such a kind." That case was followed and 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) approved in Maxwell v. Kennedy, 50 Wis. 645, 7 N. W. 657.

The cases cited by appellants from Illinois and Michigan turned on the construction of statutes against the sale of intoxicants to inebriates, and have no application here. The Iowa cases (Kuhn v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 137, 37 N. W. 116, and Schwartz v. Davis, 90 Iowa, 324, 57 N. W. 849) were based on the Illinois cases, the Iowa court seemingly overlooking the fact that the Illinois cases only applied to suits brought under the statute.

On the other hand, the supreme court of New York, in Prince v. Brooklyn Daily Eagle, 16 Misc. 186, 37 N. Y. Supp. 250, after citing the Stacy Case, said: "But I do not think it is the law of this state; a person may be of such high character that the grossest libel would damage him none; but that would be no reason for withdrawing his case from the wholesome, if not necessary, rule in respect of punitive damages. It is in such cases that the rule illustrates its chief value and necessity."

In Press Pub. Co. v. Monroe, in the United States circuit court of appeals, 51 L.R.A. 353, 19 C. C. A. 429, 38 U. S. App. 410, 73 Fed. 196, it is said: "There is room for argument against the allowance of exemplary damages at all as anomalous and illogical. Some courts have held that it is unfair to allow the plaintiff to recover not only all the loss he has sustained, but also the fine which society imposes on the offender to protect its peculiar interests. But, if it be once conceded that such additional damages may be assessed against the wrongdoer, and, when assessed, may be taken by the plaintiff,—and such is the settled law of the Federal courts,—there is neither sense nor reason in the proposition that such additional damages may be recovered by a plaintiff who is able to show that he has lost $10, and may not be recovered by some other plaintiff who has sustained, it may be, far greater injury, but is unable to prove that he is poorer in pocket by the wrongdoing of defendant." And in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Sellers, 93 Ala. 9, 30 Am. St. Rep. 17, 9 So. 375, the court, after quoting from the Stacy Case, said: "The position of the supreme court of Maine can be sustained in principle, it seems to us, only by assuming that which is manifestly untrue, namely, that no act is criminal which does not inflict individual injury capable of being measured and compensated for in money."

The supreme court of Kansas, in Hefley v. Baker, 19 Kan. 9, which was a suit in trespass to the realty, held that plaintiff "was only entitled to nominal damages and to such exemplary damages as the jury might think proper to give him."

In Flanagan v. Womack, 54 Tex. 45, 51, the court said: "It is a general rule that for every unlawful trespass the injured party is entitled to at least nominal damages. Certainly this should be so if the trespass was of such character as to authorize exemplary damages. This nominal damage would be the measure of the actual damage, if no other is shown, and must necessarily arise in every case in which exemplary damages could be given."

The United States circuit court for the district of Kansas held, in Wilson v. Vaughn (C. C.) 23 Fed. 229, in favor of the rule allowing punitive damages in connection with nominal damages.

We come now to a consideration of the decisions in this state on the question. The first in order of time is Favorite v. Cottrill, 62 Mo. App. 119, in which Judge Biggs said, after quoting from the Stacy Case: "But there is a line of decisions equally respectable which hold to the contrary."

In Ferguson v. Evening Chronicle Pub. Co. 72 Mo. App. 462, a libel case, Judge Bond clearly and satisfactorily upholds the right to punitive damages in such cases, and his opinion is quoted and commended in 2 Sutherland on Damages, § 406. To the same effect is Mills v. Taylor, 85 Mo. App. loc. cit. 115. And it was said in Brennan v. Maule, 108 Mo. App. loc. cit. 338, 83 S. W. 284: "It is now settled in this state that actual damage in at least a nominal sum must be found as a condition for the recovery of exemplary or punitive damages." It may be interesting in this connection to call attention to Courtney v. Blackwell, 150 Mo. loc. cit. 277, 51 S. W. 668, in which the damages for slander were assessed at a lump sum as punitive damages; there being no finding as to actual damages on account of oversight in the form of the verdict given to the jury. This court refused to reverse the case on account of the failure to find actual damages.

Our attention has been called to many infringement cases in equity, in which the courts refused to order an accounting where plaintiff's damages were nominal or very small. The remedies in equity and at law are radically different. Equity gives as damages the profits of the defendant; while the law limits them to the loss suffered by plaintiff. Equity restrains future wrongs by injunction. Law seeks to prevent such future violations by inflicting exemplary damages for past offenses.

We hold that a verdict for nominal actual damages will support a verdict for punitive damages.

3. It is insisted by appellants that exemplary damages are not recoverable in this case, for the alleged reason that there is no showing of malice or oppression. On that proposition we are forced to a different conclusion from that reached by the court of appeals. We concede that the cases there cited require that there shall be malice in the case. There are two kinds of malice; malice in fact, and malice in law. Legal malice, as distinguished from actual malice, will justify exemplary damages in this state.

In Goetz v. Amba, 27 Mo. 28, 33, the court says: "If the injury is not intentional, but results simply from a want of proper care, nothing more should be recovered than will compensate for the actual damage; but if the act is wilful or intentional, then 'the idea of compensation is abandoned, and that of punishment is introduced.' It is said generally that malice must exist to entitle the plaintiff to anything more than reparation for the injury; but it will be found that the word 'malice' is always used in such connections, not in its common acceptance of ill-will against a person, but in its legal sense,—'wilfulness; a wrongful act, done intentionally, without just cause.'" "To entitle the plaintiff to recover punitive damages, he must show that the act complained of was unlawful; and, further, that it was a wanton or malicious act. In other words, he must show an unlawful act coupled with an intentional wrong." State use of McClenden v. Jungling, 116 Mo. 162, 165, 22 S. W. 688, 689. "The average layman would believe that 'malicious' means ill-will; spite; hostility towards the other party. This is not the legal meaning. Those feelings may or may not be present in the legal meaning of the term. The legal meaning of the term is 'the intentional doing of a wrongful act, without just cause or excuse.'" McNamara v. St. Louis Transit Co. 182 Mo. loc. cit. 681, 66 L.R.A. 486, 81 S. W. 881. The Supreme Court of the United States held, in Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. ed. 374, that punitive damages could be allowed in actions for torts where the injury is wilful, or is the result of that reckless indifference to the rights of others which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them. We therefore hold that the question of malice and punitive damages was properly submitted in the fifth instruction.

4. We come now to the consideration of the question as to whether cases for the infringement of trademarks are outside the rule allowing exemplary damages. Appellants claim they are. They call our attention to a long line of patent cases which were held by the courts not to be within the rule as to exemplary damages; and appellants claim that trademark cases are governed by the same rule as in patent cases. An examination of those cases, however, will reveal the fact that in 1836 it was provided by act of Congress that the jury should not, in patent cases, allow vindictive damages, but that the court should have the power to inflict punitive damages within the limits of trebling the actual damages found by the jury. Seymour v. McCormick, 16 How. 480, 14 L. ed. 1024. It will thus be seen that those cases rest solely on the act of Congress, and are not authority for appellants' contention.

The Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (vol. 2, p. 438) holds that exemplary damages cannot be recovered, citing Taylor v. Carpenter, 2 Woodb. & M. 1, loc. cit. 22, Fed. Cas. No. 13,785, decided by the United States circuit court at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1846. In that case the court said: "So in very corrupt or flagitious wrongs, if a criminal prosecution lies for the public offense, I do not see much justification for what are called vindictive damages there, or smart money in a civil suit, as the criminal one covers them." That reasoning is opposed to the well-established law in this state, as this court has uniformly held that the right to exemplary damages is not removed by the fact that the same wrongful act is punishable criminally. Corwin v. Walton, 18 Mo. 71, 59 Am. Dec. 285; Gray v. McDonald, 104 Mo. 303, 16 S. W. 398; Buckley v. Knapp, 48 Mo. 152.

The only other case found which lends color to appellants' contention on this point is Addington v. Cullinane, 28 Mo. App. 238. That was an action at law for damages for the infringement of a trademark. There was an instruction telling the jury that the measure of damages was the net profits made by defendants, unless there was malice on the part of defendants, in which case they might find exemplary damages. The learned judge who wrote the opinion in that case held the instruction erroneous, because it made the defendants' gain, instead of plaintiffs' loss, the measure of actual damages. He did not discuss the subject of exemplary damages, and we do not construe that case as expressing any opinion on that subject.

Hopkins on Trademarks (page 356) says that the better rule is in favor of such allowance, and that it is difficult to see how the result stated in Taylor v. Carpenter 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) and Addington v. Cullinane, supra, was reached, adding: "They are wholly without precedent and opposed to the rule of damages which obtained at common law."

Judge Blodgett, in Warner v. Roehr, Fed. Cas. No. 17,189a, a case for the infringement of a trademark, in the northern district of Illinois, instructed the jury that exemplary damages might be allowed "in cases of this character, where you are satisfied from the proof and from the admissions in the case, that the fraud—the intention to defraud—is at the bottom of the matter." Paul, Trademarks (§ 324) and Browne, Trademarks (§§ 519 and 520) hold in favor of such allowance.

If the jury found all that the evidence tended to prove, they found that the clerk, Taylor, was making a practice of substituting cheap cigars in boxes with plaintiff's trademark thereon, and also in place of the cigars of other makers, to such an extent that various makers of cigars complained to the revenue officers; that Taylor was fined in the Federal court for such substitution, and the president of the company loaned him the money to pay the fine and retained him as such clerk, showing that if the higher officers of the company knew nothing of his wrongdoing while it was going on, they did not repudiate him after learning all about it; that the well-earned reputation of various brands of cigars was being besmirched, and customers were being disappointed and disgusted with cheap substitutes for their favorite smoke. In other words, Taylor, as such clerk, was running amuck in the cigar world, destroying reputations, and offending tastes, all done wilfully, intentionally, and without any sort of justification or excuse, for dishonest gain. Yet, from the very nature of the trade, it was practically impossible to prove more than nominal actual damages.

It must be remembered that this case has been briefed on both sides on the undisputed theory that the acts and intent of the clerk in making said sales bind the drug company as effectually as if done by the president of the company himself.

The judgment is affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

JOHN B. BALL and Wife, Respts.,
v.

NELLIE W. BALL et al., Appts.

(— N. J. —, 81 Atl. 724.)

Deed — to avoid prosecution — validity.

A deed by parents to avoid prosecution of their child upon a charge which is in fact unfounded, but which the accuser honestly believes that the child has subjected itself to, will be set aside.

(November 20, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Chancery in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to set aside two deeds made by complainants to avoid prosecution of their child. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pitney, Hardin, & Skinner, for appellants:

If there were threats, they were not such as constitute duress, and the conveyances in question should not be set aside because of them.

Note. — Contracts procured by threats of prosecution of relative.

The earlier cases upon this question are collected in notes to Williamson-Halsell Frazier Co. v. Ackerman, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 484, and City Nat. Bank v. Kusworm, 26 L.R.A. 48.

A conveyance of land made by a wife under the influence of threats of a criminal prosecution of her husband may be avoided by her where the grantee received the deed with actual knowledge of such threats although taking no actual part therein. 13 Cyc. 585.

In Ellyson v. Schooler, 149 Iowa, 332, 128 N. W. 551, foreclosure of a mortgage was denied because it appeared that it and the note accompanying it were obtained from defendant through fear of prosecution of her husband for forgery.

In Martin v. Evans, 163 Ala. 657, 50 So. 997, a deed obtained from a mother under threat of prosecution of her son for embezzlement was set aside on the ground of duress, though the threats were conveyed to the mother by the son and his adviser, and not by the grantee personally.

In Nebraska Central Bldg. & L. Asso. v. McCandless, 83 Neb. 536, 120 N. W. 134, where a lawyer had converted money belonging to a client to his own use, and a representative of the client went to his home in his absence, and by threats of commencing proceedings so worked upon the fears of his wife that she met her husband at the train and prevailed upon him to go at once with her to his office, where she executed a mortgage to secure the amount, it was held that the mortgage was not enforceable. Messrs. Riker & Riker, for respondents.

The threats were of such a nature as to render the conveyance involuntary.

Lomerson v. Johnston, 44 N. J. Eq. 93, 13 Atl. 8; Bayley v. Williams, 4 Giff. 638, 11 Jur. N. S. 236, 11 L. T. N. S. 110, 13 Week. Rep. 533; Eadie v. Slimmon, 26 N. Y. 9, 82 Am. forceable in equity, because obtained by duress, though the mortgagor did have the benefit of the presence of her husband at the time it was executed.

In International Harvester Co. v. Voboril, 110 C. C. A. 311, 187 Fed. 973, it is held that notes signed by a married woman because of threats to arrest her husband were signed under duress, though the husband had in fact committed no offense, and no officer was present or warrant issued or proceeding commenced against him.

But in Bianchi v. Leon, 138 App. Div. 216, 122 N. Y. Supp. 1004, reversing 63 Misc. 73, 118 N. Y. Supp. 386, where a woman whose husband had been arrested on a civil warrant for a claim of $800 obtained by fraud executed deeds in trust to secure the payment of that and other debts to the extent of $7,100, it was held that they were not obtained by duress, inasmuch as she was told that he could be released on $500 bail, and was given opportunity to secure independent counsel.

And in Mallory v. Royston Bank, 135 Ga. 702, 70 S. E. 586, it was held that a representation by bank officers to the father of a former officer of the bank, that the borrowing of money from the bank by the son while an officer, to be used for speculative purposes, although such loan was with consent of the directors and was entered on the minutes, was a criminal offense, for which he was liable to prosecution, although such was not the fact, was not such duress as would entitle them to avoid a note given under the erroneous belief that such representation was true, as the threats were made without color of authority to make them effective.

Gummere, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was filed to set aside two deeds of conveyance made by the complainants to Sidney S. Ward, the defendants' decedent, upon the ground that they were executed under duress exercised upon the grantors by Mr. Ward; the duress complained of consisting of threats of the immediate arrest and imprisonment of their son, Arthur D. Ball, for obtaining money from Mr. Ward under false representations.

We concur in the conclusion reached by the learned vice chancellor that the complainants established by a fair preponderance of proof the validity of their claim that these conveyances were made as a result of the threat to have their son arrested, and for the purpose of preventing that threat from being carried into effect. The analysis of the testimony made by the vice chancellor, and set out in his opinion, is complete and accurate, and leaves nothing to be added by us. The vice chancellor further concluded from the proofs submitted that the money advanced by Ward to the son of the complainants was not, in fact, obtained under false pretenses, although Mr. Ward probably believed that this was the case when he made the accusation to the complainants. We concur in this conclusion of the vice chancellor, and for the reasons which he states in his opinion.

Having reached these conclusions upon the facts, the vice chancellor in his opinion then takes up the consideration of the question whether a conveyance made by parents to a creditor of their son, under the pressure of a threat to have the son criminally prosecuted, is valid, when it appears that the creditor honestly believed that the son had subjected himself to such a prosecution, although the contrary was the fact. He reaches the conclusion that the grantors of a conveyance made under such conditions are entitled to have it set aside. We concur with him in this view. In discussing this latter question, however, the learned vice chancellor goes outside of the lines of the question, and the conclusion declared by him is broader than the decision of the case required. He thus states it: "In my judgment, the equitable rule to be applied in this case is that it is against equity and good conscience for the creditor to extort from the parent payment or security for the debt of the son, for which the parent is not responsible, by threats of criminal prosecution of the son, even if imprisonment be lawful." The question whether a conveyance made by a parent to prevent the imprisonment of a child who has, in fact, been guilty of a criminal offense, may afterward be set aside at the option of the parent, is one upon which judicial views are not in harmony. It is not presented under the facts found by the vice chancellor, and concurred in by us, and any expression of view upon the question by this court would, consequently, be obiter. For this reason we neither assent to, nor dissent from, what was said by the learned vice chancellor upon this point.

The decree under review will be affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

UNITED STATES BANKING COMPANY
v.

ANNA WILSON VEALE, Appt.

(84 Kan. 385, 114 Pac. 229.)

Pleading — foreign laws.

1. Foreign laws differing from our own, and relied on to support a cause of action or a defense, must be pleaded and proved.

Husband and wife — Mexican law — guaranty of debt.

2. Under the proof, it is held that in Mexico a wife may become a surety for her husband, and guarantee the payment of his debts.

Duress — securing execution of note.

3. An obligation signed by a wife in renewal of one given by her husband, by reason of a statement of one who was a surety on her husband's obligation, to the effect that if she did not then sign the obligation, it would be a great detriment to her husband, and result in loss and damage to him, is held, under the attending circumstances, not to have been constrained by duress.

Same — threatening suit.

4. Ordinarily, it is not duress to bring or threaten to bring an action to enforce a valid obligation, nor to do that which a party has a legal right to do.

(March 11, 1911.)

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The United States Banking Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the Republic of Mexico and doing business in the city of Mexico, brought this action against Anna Wilson Veale to recover on a promissory note for 9,243.57 pesos and another for 282.29 pesos, and also for interest and attorneys' fees on each, stipulated for in case the notes were not paid at maturity. It was alleged that the pesos mentioned were of the value of 50 cents in legal tender of the United States. The defendant answered that the notes had been paid; that they were barred by the lapse of time; that there was no consideration for her signature; that she had no authority from her husband to sign her own name to the notes, nor that of her husband; and that he had not since the signing of the notes consented to her action. She also alleged that John J. Judd, whose name is also signed to the notes, informed her that her husband's notes had fallen due at the bank, "and that she must sign his name to the renewal note, and also sign the same herself, and, if she failed to do so, that it would be to the great injury, loss, and damage of her husband; that, believing such statement to be true, she signed her husband's name to said notes and also her own." The reply was a denial of the averments of the answer, and it contained a verified denial of the averment that Judd acted as the agent of the bank in procuring the signing of the notes. When the cause came on for trial, the parties submitted the following stipulation: "A trial by jury of the general issues and a general verdict from the jury is waived, and all of the issues in this case submitted to the court, except the court, if he thinks the evidence warrants, shall submit to the jury the question of the execution of the note by the defendant under duress, and the finding of the jury upon that question shall be received and considered the same as the finding of the jury upon any question of fact in a law case." A jury was called by the court as to the charge of duress, but, after the testimony had been received, the trial judge determined that he was not warranted in submitting the question to the jury, and all the questions in the case were taken and decided by the court.

The evidence disclosed that appellant and her husband, Walter J. Veale, were citizens of Kansas, but had been residing in the Republic of Mexico since the year 1896, and that while there he had become indebted to the appellee, and had given his note for the debt, and that John J. Judd had signed it as surety. When the note became due, Veale and Judd were both absent from the city of Mexico. Veale telegraphed Judd that he was unable to pay the note, and requested him to intercede for and procure a renewal. Judd returned to the city before Veale did, which was several days after the note was due. He called on Mrs. Veale, and, according to her testimony, he told her of the situation; that the renewal notes had to be signed that day, and, when she inquired if he could not wait for the return of her husband, he told her that it could not be postponed till her husband came home; that it would be a great detriment to her husband if it was not fixed that day, and so she went to the bank with Judd and signed her husband's name to the notes, and also signed her own name as surety. Mr. Veale returned to the city shortly after the execution of the notes, and learned of the action taken, but it does not appear that he made any objection to the bank or to Judd in regard to the execution of the renewal notes, but, on the other hand, he repeatedly promised to pay them. About three years later he made a payment of $450 to the bank, for which a credit was given on the notes. Although appellant did not plead the laws of Mexico relating to the capacity of a married woman to sign notes for her husband or herself, or to enter into contracts, testimony on the subject was received, and, based on that, the court found as follows: "The law of Mexico at the time the notes in suit were executed was that the husband is the legal representative of his wife, and that, except in the cases provided by law, the wife cannot obligate herself without the express authorization of her husband. The law of Mexico at the time the notes in suit were executed further provided, as an exception to the law stated above, that a wife could obligate herself as a guarantor or surety for her husband. At the time the notes in suit were executed, and continuously to the date of trial, the law of Mexico was that, if the husband expressly or tacitly ratified the acts of his wife, no one could bring a suit for a nullity; a suit for a nullity being the remedy afforded by the Mexican law for the redress from a voidable contract. At the time the notes in suit were given, and ever since, the failure of the husband, with the knowledge of the unauthorized action of his wife in personally assuming an obligation, to object thereto, was a tacit ratification within the meaning of the Mexican law, and a voluntary payment on such obligation by him, with such knowledge, was an express ratification, and either such tacit or express ratification would validate such unauthorized act. Walter J. Veale returned to his home in the city of Mexico in two or three weeks after the execution of the notes by his wife, as narrated in finding No. 3, and was immediately notified of his wife's said action. No objection was ever made by said Walter J. Veale, or by anyone for him, to said bank, or to said Judd, or to any other person, on account of said action of his wife in executing said notes, until after this suit was commenced, and said Walter J. Veale repeatedly promised and agreed to pay the same, giving his financial inability as his only reason for not doing so, and on January 21, 1907, did pay to said bank on said notes the sum of $450, Mexican, which sum was by the bank credited on said indebtedness and indorsed on said principal note."

On the findings of fact the court concluded that the appellant had legal capacity under the laws of Mexico to execute the notes, and that appellee was entitled to judgment for the amount demanded. As to the capacity to execute the notes, there is little ground for contention. It is true that the laws of Mexico, as proven, merge the individuality of the wife into that of her husband, and give a married woman but few rights and privileges. The husband is the representative of the wife, and he may ratify her acts, either expressly or tacitly. As the trial court correctly held, there is an exception to the disqualification of women, in that they may be sureties "if they obligate themselves in respect of a thing which belongs to themselves, or in favor of their ancestors, descendants, or husbands." Here Mrs. Veale became a guarantor or surety for her husband, and, so far as the matter of the consideration for her obligation is concerned, the agreement to extend the time of the payment of her husband's indebtedness is a sufficient consideration for her guaranty of its payment. Fuller v. Scott, 8 Kan. 25; Winans v. Gibbs & S. Mfg. Co. 48 Kan. 777, 30 Pac. 163; Harrison Nat. Bank v. Leslie, 72 Kan. 401, 83 Pac. 984. The provision quoted is part of the Civil Code which provides for the marital relations of husband and wife, and which defines the powers and privileges of women. Attention is called to a provision of what is termed the "Commercial Code," to the effect that a married woman cannot carry on commerce without express authority from her husband, but manifestly this provision relates to the running of a business on her own account; that is, she cannot be a merchant or storekeeper, or engage in a particular branch of commerce, unless she has the express authority of her husband. It does not apply to single transactions like that in question. If his consent and authority were necessary to her right to execute the paper under the laws of that country, their absence has been supplied and the defect cured. Among the provisions relating to husband and wife are the following:

"Art. 203. The nullity of the acts of the wife, founded on the want of a marital or judicial license, cannot be set up except by herself, by her husband, or by the heirs of both. If the husband has expressly or tacitly ratified the acts of his wife, no one can bring a suit for a nullity."

"Art. 1677. When the contract is null through incapacity, intimidation, or error, it may be ratified on the defect or cause of the nullity ceasing, there being no other cause which invalidates the ratification.

"Art. 1678. The ratification and voluntary fulfillment of an obligation by means of payment, novation, or otherwise, executed with the same formalities, is held to be a ratification, and cannot be impugned."

If the appellant could not bind herself without the consent of her husband, and if ratification was needed to give her act validity, he effectively ratified it when he made a voluntary payment of a substantial amount upon the notes. Under provisions quoted, it is competent for him to ratify her contracts either for incapacity or for intimidation. The common-law authorities cited by appellant on ratification are not applicable here, as this contract, having been made in Mexico, is to be interpreted, and its validity determined, by the laws of that country, and it is well known that the common law of that country is based on the civil and Spanish laws, and is something quite different from the common law of this country and of this state. As was said in Banco De Sonora v. Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co. 124 Iowa, 576, 104 Am. St. Rep. 367, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

100 N. W. 532: "We know that Mexico was a Spanish province for about 300 years, and then became, and still is, a Republic. At no period of its history has it been under British sovereignty. Its institutions are Latin, and not Anglo-Saxon, and the common law is not presumed to be in force in any state or country where English institutions have not been established." P. 587. One of the witnesses, who testified in regard to the law of ratification in Mexico, stated that payment on a note was an active ratification of its execution, while a tacit ratification was a failure to object or contest it in the courts of the country. There was testimony, too, that under the laws of that country the husband is the legitimate representative of his wife, and that he may ratify her acts expressly or tacitly, directly or indirectly, provided no third party is thereby damaged.

Complaint is made of the action of the court in refusing to submit to the jury the testimony relating to duress. It is doubtful whether, under the stipulation, there would have been error in such a refusal, even if substantial testimony of duress had been offered. It is a peculiar stipulation, wherein a general verdict is waived, and wherein the court is vested with discretion to call a jury for the decision of a single issue. It does not provide that the court shall absolutely leave that question to the jury, but rather that it may do so if, after receiving and considering the testimony, it feels warranted in submitting it to the jury. The situation is somewhat similar to an equity case where the court at its option may call in a jury for advice and to answer special questions of fact, and is then at liberty to approve or reject the answers as its judgment may direct. But, if it be treated as an absolute reservation of the right of a jury trial on that issue, no substantial error was committed by the court in taking the question from the jury. Under the circumstances of this case, it cannot be held that either the averments of the answer or the testimony of appellant shows that there was duress in the execution of the notes. Her husband's notes had matured in his absence, and Judd, a surety on the paper, had been telegraphed by him to intercede with the bank for an extension of the paper. He could obtain an extension by procuring her to sign the notes, and visited her for that purpose. The only averment of the answer which had the semblance of pressure or constraint was the statement that, unless she signed the notes, it would result in injury and loss to her husband. This result would necessarily follow if the holder of the note would begin proceedings to enforce the collection of the debt. In her testimony she stated that Judd told her that "it had to be fixed up to-day that it would be a great detriment to my husband, and I didn't know what might happen, to fix up the notes to-day, so I had to go with him." When she went to the bank to execute the notes, no objection was made by her to the signing of the paper, and it does not appear that anyone connected with the bank talked with her about the matter, or even knew of the conversation between her and Judd prior to the execution of the paper. In view of the relations between the Veales and Judd, it can hardly be conceived that what was said by him operated to deprive her of the exercise of free will, or to render her incompetent to contract. Friendly relations existed between the parties before and after the signing of the notes, and up to the time the action was brought. They visited together, but no complaint was made either by her or her husband that undue influence had been exerted upon her. She was an intelligent woman who had a bank account of her own, and drew checks upon the bank, and was able to transact business for herself. To suggest that a failure to arrange for her husband's default would bring trouble and loss hardly amounts to a threat, and is little more than to say, if the matter is not adjusted, the bank will institute judicial proceedings, something which it had a right to do, and something which she would know and expect. Duress "is that degree of constraint or danger, either actually inflicted or threatened and impending, which is sufficient in severity or in apprehension to overcome the mind and will of a person of ordinary firmness." McCormick v. Dalton, 53 Kan. 146, 35 Pac. 1113. It is not easy to say that Judd's conduct was wrongful or fraudulent, and still more difficult to say that it overcame her will or measured up to duress as defined by law. That neglect of the overdue debt would bring litigation and loss was doubtless anticipated without suggestion from anyone, and ordinarily it is not duress to threaten to do that which a party has a right to do; and even if the bank itself had told her that it would resort to legal proceedings to collect the debt if renewal, or provision for payment, was not made, it would not have constituted duress. Gabbey v. Forgeus, 38 Kan. 62, 15 Pac. 866; Shelby v. Bowman, 64 Kan. 879, 68 Pac. 1131; Electric Plaster Co. v. Blue Rapids City Twp. 77 Kan. 580, 96 Pac. 68; Kiler v. Wohletz, 79 Kan. 716, 101 Pac. 474. No material error was committed on the exclusion of testimony on this subject, nor in relation to the Mexican statute of limitation. The answer did not plead a statute of limitation of that country, and hence proof of such statutes was not admissible. The laws of another country, as well as another state, are unknown to the courts of the state in which the action is brought, and, where such statutes are material to the controversy and relied on as a defense, they must be pleaded as well as proven before they can be given consideration. Alexandria, A. & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Johnson, 61 Kan. 417, 59 Pac. 1063; Loyal Mystic Legion v. Brewer, 75 Kan. 729, 90 Pac. 247; 36 Cyc. 1240. In the absence of pleading and proof of the limitation laws of Mexico, the laws of Kansas will govern, and under our laws the notes were not barred.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

(— Ark. —, 140 S. W. 981.)

Bills and notes — draft — forged indorsement — effect of payment.

The payment by the drawee of a draft with bill of lading attached, drawn payable to the order of a bank, upon a forged indorsement, does not satisfy the account.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due for goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — That the rule under which LEWIS MERCANTILE Co. v. HARRIS was decided is so certainly established may account for the fact that no other case in point has been found.

Nor has any case been found passing upon the question whether the bank to which a draft has been sent for collection is chargeable with the act of an unauthorized person who obtains possession of the draft and collects it from the drawee.

As to the right of a drawee of forged check or draft to recover money paid thereon, see the notes to First Nat. Bank v. Bank of Wyndmere, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49; Title Guarantee & T. Co. v. Haven, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1308; and State Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 100. E. M. S.

Messrs. Moore, Smith. & Moore and H. M. Trieber, for appellant:

An indorsement of the payee is necessary to pass title to the paper as a voucher, and the maker of a note or drawee of a draft pays at his peril upon the forged indorsement of the payee.

Messrs. Manning & Emerson for appellee.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant, N. Harris, is engaged in the secondhand clothing business in the city of Little Rock, and in August, 1910, he purchased a bill of goods from plaintiff, O. J. Lewis Mercantile Company, a corporation engaged in the wholesale business in St. Louis. The bill amounted to $403.04, and defendant paid $50 in cash, reducing it to $353.04, and it was agreed that the plaintiff should ship the goods to Little Rock, and forward its draft on defendant, with bill of lading attached, through the German National Bank of Little Rock, for the amount of the bill. This was done on August 31, 1910, the draft being in ordinary form, payable to the order of the German National Bank, and the same was duly deposited in the mails, addressed to that bank. Subsequently plaintiff instituted this action against defendant in the circuit court of Pulaski county to recover the amount of said account, claiming that the draft had never been paid. Defendant answered, pleading payment of the draft, and upon this issue the case was tried before a jury.

The defendant produced the draft in question with the following indorsement stamped thereon with a rubber stamp: "German National Bank. Paid September 2d, 1910.—Little Rock, Ark." Defendant testified that between 4 and 5 o'clock on the afternoon of September 2, 1910, a young man appeared at his place of business, representing himself as a collector for the German National Bank, and presented this draft for payment, and that, after borrowing part of the amount from two of his neighbors, he paid the amount to the young man, and the draft was surrendered to him. He stated that he was not acquainted with the young man, and had never seen him before nor since. He introduced another witness who corroborated his statement as to the payment of the draft. It was agreed that the German National Bank had never accounted to the plaintiff for said amount or any part thereof, and that the plaintiff had never received anything in satisfaction of the draft or the account. Four of the employees of the bank were introduced, who testified that they had exclusive charge and control of the bank's collection department, that they had no recollection of any such draft having passed through the bank, and that there was no trace thereof upon the records of the bank. Other evidence tended to show that the daily mail coming to the bank was placed in charge of the head of the collection department, who was one of the witnesses and who opened it. Other testimony also tended to show that it was possible for other employees of the bank to come in contact with the mail before it actually passed into the hands of this witness who opened it. The testimony of one of the witnesses tended to show that there was no such stamp used by the bank similar to the one which made the impression on the draft in defendant's hands. In this state of the proof the trial judge instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant.

We are of the opinion that the court erred in giving this instruction, and that the question as to payment of the draft should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions. The evidence tended to establish the fact that the bank never received the draft, and that it was paid by the defendant, if at all, on an unauthorized or forged indorsement. The testimony was sufficient to warrant a finding to that effect, and this would have called for a judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

It is now too well settled to need citation of authority that the holder of commercial paper, payable to order, must trace his title through a genuine indorsement, and that the drawee of a draft payable to order, who pays upon a forged or unauthorized indorsement, does so at his peril. Sims v. American Nat. Bank, 98 Ark. 1, 135 S. W. 356; First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 343, 24 L. ed. 229; Shipman v. Bank of State, 126 N. Y. 318, 12 L.R.A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821, 27 N. E. 16. If the draft, which was sent through the mail, never reached the bank, it remained the property of the plaintiff, and title thereto could not be divested through a forged indorsement. Garthwaite v. Bank of Tulare, supra.

If it actually reached the bank and was fraudulently or wrongfully abstracted, indorsed, and collected by some unauthorized person, neither the bank nor the plaintiff was bound thereby. Kellogg v. Norris, 10 Ark. 18; Walker v. Scott, 13 Ark. 644; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Burns, 61 Neb. 793, 86 N. W. 483; Doubleday v. Kress, 50 N. Y. 410, 10 Am. Rep. 502; Shipman v. Bank of State, 126 N. Y. 318, 12 L.R.A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821, 27 N. E. 371. The case of Barnett v. Ringgold, 80 Ky. 289, was very similar to the present case, and the court, in disposing of it, said: "[The indorsement on the note] . . . was a special authority to the bank authorizing it to make the collection of the note, and . . . the bank, or its agents authorized to act for it, were the proper parties to whom the payment should have been made, and by whom the note could have been legally presented for payment. . . . The payment by the appellant to an unknown holder or stranger who had no right to collect it, either as agent in fact or bona fide owner, in the face of the special indorsement to the bank for collection by the appellees, was made at his own risk, as the possession with such an indorsement was notice to him that none but the bank or its agents . . . were authorized to present the note or receive the money thereon. The appellees adopted the natural and proper method of informing the appellant of the fact that they had constituted the bank their agent for collection, and had he taken the precaution which ordinary prudence dictates, and read the indorsement plainly written upon the back of the note, he could have ascertained whether the person presenting it was the proper person to whom payment should have been made; and having paid the note to a fraudulent holder, if, indeed, he paid it to anyone, the appellant must suffer the loss, because he took the risk."

Learned counsel for defendant rely on Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Click, 93 Ark. 162, 124 S. W. 764, as sustaining the ruling of the court in giving a peremptory instruction. That case is not, however, in point. There the plaintiff relied, as evidence of payment, on a receipt which was admitted to be genuine, and defendant insurance company contended that the receipt was mailed to the insured by mistake, and that payment had not been made. Several witnesses, employees of defendant, testified ¶7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to that effect, and it was insisted by defendant that, notwithstanding the receipt in the hands of the plaintiff, the proof was undisputed that no payment had in fact been made, and that the court should have given a peremptory instruction in its favor. We said that possession of the receipt raised a presumption of payment, and that it devolved on defendant, in order to overcome it, so as to make the proof undisputed, to "close up by affirmative proof every avenue through which payment could have been made." We did not hold that possession of the receipt was conclusive evidence of payment, or that defendant had to close up "every avenue through which payment could have been made," in order to be entitled to go to the jury on the question of payment.

The court having erroneously taken the case from the jury by a peremptory instruction, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

W. J. MITCHELL.

(— Ark. —, 142 S. W. 168.)

Carrier — accepting stock beyond facilities.

1. A carrier which accepts stock for transportation knowing that its facilities are so overloaded that loss will result to the shipper is liable for the loss.

Same — consent of owner — effect.

2. A carrier of live stock is not absolved from liability for loss due to its refusal to unload when necessary, by the fact that the owner, when informed of that fact, consented that the stock might be immediately forwarded from the point where unloading became necessary.

Same — custom — reliance on.

3. Where a carrier has established the custom to unload stock at a particular place for their proper care and necessary preservation, a shipper, in delivering stock to the carrier without notice of change of custom, may rely on its being observed, and the carrier will be liable for loss resulting from its breach.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Carriers are under no legal obligation to unload stock for rest, feed, and water, upon the request of the owner, without regard to the necessity for the demand or request.

Co. 49 La. Ann. 1579, 22 So. 835.

Messrs. Lamb & Caraway, for appellee:

If a railway company receives live stock or perishable freight, it cannot exempt itself from liability for delays in shipment, or failing to care for, or affording the shipper reasonable opportunity to care for, the property after receiving it.

2 Hutchinson, Carr. §§ 634, 638.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 4th day of December, 1909, the appellee loaded two carloads of hogs in a 36-foot car at Pekin, on the line of the Jonesboro, Lake City, & Eastern Railway, about 10 miles east of Jonesboro. There were 158 hogs, weighing from 120 to 130 pounds, put in one car, and 144 hogs, averaging about 165 pounds, were put in the other car. The temperature at the time of this shipment ranged from 56 to 42 degrees. The hogs arrived on the connection between the Jonesboro, Lake City, & Eastern Railway and the appellant's line about 9:30 p. m., and were received by the appellant about 11 p. m., and shipped out of Jonesboro to destination at 12:15 a. m. next day. The shipment was made by appellant under a contract wherein the appellee agreed that the defendant should be exempt from liability for loss arising from heat, suffocation, overloading, carrying, and other accidents not arising from its negligence. And the appellee in the same contract assumed all risk, the expense of unloading, feeding, and watering and otherwise caring for the stock 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

while in the yards or pens. The stock arrived at Illmo, Missouri, on December 5, 1909. The appellee brought this suit against the appellant to recover damages for the loss of his hogs, alleging that, when the two cars arrived at Jonesboro, he demanded that they be unloaded before being forwarded to their destination, and that the appellant refused to unload the hogs, or permit them to be unloaded, and that, by reason of the refusal of the appellant to unload the hogs, they died en route between Jonesboro and Illmo, and that appellee was damaged thereby in the sum of $471.75. The appellant's answer admitted that it received the hogs for shipment at time mentioned, but denied that appellee requested them to be unloaded, and denied that it refused to permit the hogs to be unloaded, and alleged that they died either from disease or from overloading them. The appellant also set up the contract above mentioned.

The testimony on behalf of appellee tended to prove that between 5 and 6 o'clock on December 4, 1909, appellee told the shipping clerk and agent of appellant at Jonesboro that the hogs had been shipped from Pekin and would arrive that evening, and that he wanted appellant to unload them when they arrived at Jonesboro, and that the custom of appellant had been with hogs delivered to it from the Lake City road to unload them at night, at Jonesboro, and let them rest until the next morning, and then ship them out on the fast stock train, and that appellee requested that his hogs be unloaded in accordance with this custom. It appeared that it would require from thirty minutes to an hour to load a car of hogs at Jonesboro. The appellant refused to unload the hogs, giving as a reason for its action in so doing, that the pens were full and that they had no room for them, and that the hogs would either have to remain on the side track during the night or be moved on the first outgoing train. The appellee consented for the hogs to be shipped on the first train out of Jonesboro, rather than have them remain in the standing cars until the next morning.

There was testimony on behalf of appellee tending to show that the hogs were not overloaded, and also that they were not diseased, and the verdict of the jury on these questions must be taken as conclusive against appellant. The testimony on behalf of appellant tended to show that the appellee did not make any request of its agents and servants at Jonesboro to have the hogs unloaded, and that, on account of the crowded condition of its stock pens on that night, it could not and did not receive or accept the hogs, except upon the condition that they should be shipped out that night on the first train; that the accumulation of stock in its stock yards on that evening was not and could not have been anticipated by appellant, as it was an unusual condition; that the hogs were overloaded before it received them for shipment, and that appellant had no notice of that fact.

We have held that a carrier is not required to provide in advance for any unprecedented and unexpected rush of business, and that he will therefore be excused for delay in shipping or in receiving goods for shipment until such emergency can, in the regular and usual course of business, be removed,—citing St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Clay County Gin Co. 77 Ark. 357, 92 S. W. 531,—but that is not this case. Where a common carrier accepts live stock for transportation, knowing at the time that the condition of its facilities is such that a loss will result to the shipper by the reason of the shipment, then such carrier will be responsible for the loss, because carrier will be negligent in undertaking the shipment under such conditions. The jury might have found from the evidence in this record that such was the case here.

The appellee testified that it had always been the custom to unload at Jonesboro, because they got a better run; if they unloaded them, they got on a stock train in the morning that got out about 7:30. Appellant had established the custom presumably for the reason that it was necessary in the proper transportation of hogs. It was shown that the hogs of appellee when they were received by appellant for shipment were in good condition, that they were free from disease, and that they were not overcrowded in the cars; in other words, that the cars were not overloaded.

The testimony of appellee tended to show that his hogs that died were the largest and fattest ones, and that it was necessary to unload such hogs at Jonesboro in order to prepare them for shipment through to St. Louis.

One witness stated that, when hogs were loaded in cars when standing still, they soon get hot if the air is not stirring, and, of course, they soon suffocate if the weather is not awful cold, and that, when cars are moving, hot air passes out, and they get the breeze. The usual and ordinary effect on hogs in a car nineteen or twenty hours is that they are apt to get too hot and die. There were several stops of thirty or forty minutes between Jonesboro and Illmo. There was ample evidence to sustain the finding of the jury to the effect that, if the hogs had been unloaded at Jonesboro, as it was the custom of appellant to do, they would not have died. There was evidence to support the verdict that the loss of the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) hogs was caused through negligence of appellant.

The appellant's liability as a common carrier of live stock began the moment it received the hogs of appellee for transportation. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Lesser, 46 Ark. 236; Fordyce v. McFlynn, 56 Ark. 424, 19 S. W. 981.

And as this was an interstate shipment, it could not by any contract with appellee limit its liability for loss caused by it.

Appellant, having received the hogs for transportation, could not relieve itself of liability for loss caused by its failure to unload same at Jonesboro, on the ground that appellee had consented for the hogs to be shipped out of Jonesboro on the train that night. No consent of appellee, and no contract with appellee, either before or after the hogs were delivered to appellant for transportation, would exempt appellant from liability for a failure to unload the hogs at Jonesboro, if such failure on its part was the cause of the loss. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Miles, 92 Ark. 573, 123 S. W. 775, 124 S. W. 1043; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Carl, 91 Ark. 97, 134 Am. St. Rep. 56, 121 S. W. 932. Therefore the court did not err in instructing the jury as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant railway company received two carloads of hogs from the Jonesboro, Lake City, & Eastern Railway Company for transportation to East St. Louis, knowing that its stock pens at Jonesboro were so overcrowded that said stock could not be unloaded, then the fact, if it be a fact, that said stock pens were so overcrowded, will not excuse the railway company if it is otherwise liable." On the question of negligence the following principles apply to the facts of this case:

It is the duty of a common carrier of live stock to furnish all necessary facilities for the proper rest, exercise, and refreshment of the animals received by it for transportation. The times when, and places where, rest and refreshment may be necessary, must be left to the judgment of the carrier, and not the shipper.

The shipper cannot arbitrarily demand of the carrier that it unload the live stock at any particular time or place, but where the carrier has established a usage of unloading at a particular place for the proper care and necessary preservation of certain live stock, the shipper, in delivering his stock to the carrier for transportation without any notice of a change of usage, has the right to expect that such usage on the part of the carrier will be observed, and if it is not observed, resulting in loss to the shipper, he may hold carrier responsible for such loss. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Peterson, 68 Miss. 454, 14 L.R.A. 550, 10 So. 43; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Clark, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 189, 79 S. W. 827; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heggie, 86 Ga. 210, 22 Am. St. Rep. 453, 12 S. E. 363; McAlister v. Chicago, R. I. P. R. Co. 74 Mo. 351; Hutchinson, Carr. § 638, and cases cited in note. Under the pleadings and evidence adduced in support of the respective contentions, it was a question for the jury as to whether the loss sued for was caused by the negligence of the appellant in failing to unload hogs at Jonesboro, or by the negligence of the appellee in overloading the cars.

The issues were submitted to the jury under instructions that were really more favorable to appellant than the law warrants, and of which it has no cause to complain.

The judgment therefore was correct, and it will be affirmed.

RE ESTATE OF GIUSEPPE GHIO, Deceased.

SALVATORE L. ROCCA, Consul General of Italy, Appt.,
v.

GEORGE F. THOMPSON, Public Administrator, Respnt.

(157 Cal. 552, 108 Pac. 516.)

The foreign consul is not entitled to administer upon the estate of a citizen of his country dying within one of the United States, in preference to the public administrator of such state, under a treaty provision that if any citizen of either country

Note. — Jurisdiction and power of consuls to administer on estates.

A consular officer is, by the law of nations and by statute, the provisional conservator of the property within his district belonging to his countrymen deceased therein. 2 Cyc. 271.

The early cases upon the question here considered are gathered in the note to Telefsen v. Fee, 45 L.R.A. 496, and the present note includes only the decisions which have passed upon the point since the writing of that note.

The right of consuls to administer under the treaty provisions involved in RE GHIO was finally settled by the affirmance of this case by the United States Supreme Court in Rocca v. Thompson, 223 U. S. 317, 56 L. ed. —, 32 Sup. Ct. APPEAL by the consul general of Italy from an order of the Superior Court for San Joaquin County granting letters of administration to respondent as public administrator upon the estate of Giuseppe Ghio, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ambrose Gherini, Clary & Loutitt, and R. K. Barrows, for appellant:

The Italian consul general is entitled under the treaty provisions to letters of administration upon the estate of an Italian citizen dying intestate in this country.

Messrs. John E. Budd, Cullinan & Hickey, and John J. O'Toole, for respondent:

The language of the Argentine treaty does not give to the consul general the right to letters of administration.

the estate of an Italian citizen dying intestate in one of the United States, to the exclusion of the one authorized by the local law to administer, because of the privilege conferred by the Argentine treaty upon consular officers of the respective countries as to citizens dying intestate, "to intervene in the possession, administration, and judicial liquidation of the estate of the deceased, conformably with the laws of the country, for the benefit of the creditors and legal heirs," since this provision, if applicable, could not be construed as intended to supersede the local law as to the administration of such estates. The court said: "In this country the right to administer property left by a foreigner within the jurisdiction of a state is primarily committed to state law. It seems to be so regulated in the state of California, by giving the administration of such property to the public administrator. There is, of course, no Federal law of probate or of the adminis-

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Salvatore L. Rocca appeals from an order of the superior court granting to George F. Thompson, as public administrator of San Joaquin county, letters of administration upon the estate of Giuseppe Ghio, deceased, and refusing the application of said appellant for such letters. The appeal was submitted to the district court of appeal of the third district, and decided in favor of the respondent. A rehearing in the supreme court was ordered, because, as treaty rights were involved, it was deemed advisable that the highest state court should consider the matter. Giuseppe Ghio, at the time of his death, was a resident of San Joaquin county, California, and a citizen of the Kingdom of Italy. He left a small estate situated in San Joaquin county. His heirs at law are his wife, Maria, and three minor children. All of them reside in Italy. The appellant is the consul general of the Kingdom of Italy for California, Nevada, Washington, and Alaska territory. The deceased died intestate on April 27, 1908, in San Joaquin county.

The sole question for consideration is whether or not, where a citizen of Italy, being a resident of California, dies intestate, leaving property in this state, and his lawful heirs all reside in Italy and are citizens of that country, the consul general of Italy is entitled to letters of administration upon his estate, in preference to the public administration of estates, and, assuming for this purpose that it is within the power of the national government to provide by treaty for the administration of property of foreigners dying within the jurisdiction of the states, and to commit such administration to the consular officers of the nations to which the deceased owed allegiance, we will proceed to examine the treaties in question, with a view to determining whether such a right has been given in the present instance.

This determination depends, primarily, upon the construction of art. 9 of the Argentine treaty of 1853, giving to the consular officers of the respective countries, as to citizens dying intestate, the right 'to intervene in the possession, administration, and judicial liquidation of the estate of the deceased, conformably with the laws of the country, for the benefit of the creditors and legal heirs.' It will be observed that, whether in the possession, the administration, or the judicial liquidation of the estate, the sole right conferred is that of intervention, and that conformably with the laws of the country. Does this mean the right to administer the property of such decedent, and to supersede the local laws as to the administration of such estate? The right to intervene at once suggests the privilege to enter into a proceeding already begun, rather than the right to take and administer the property. . . . Emphasis is laid upon the right, under the Argentine treaty, to intervene in possession, as well as administration and judicial liquidation; but this term can only have reference to the universally recognized right of a consul to temporarily possess the estate of a citizen of his nation, for the purpose of protecting and conserving the rights of those interested, before it comes under the jurisdiction of the laws of the country for its administration. The right to intervene in administration and judicial liquidation is for the same general purpose, and presupposes an administration or judicial liquidation instituted otherwise than by the consul, who is authorized to intervene. So, looking at the terms of the treaty, we cannot perceive an intention to give the original administration of 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) an estate to the consul general, to the exclusion of one authorized by local law to administer the estate. . . . Our conclusion, then, is that, if it should be conceded for this purpose that the most favored nation clause in the Italian treaty carries the provisions of the Argentine treaty to the consuls of the Italian government in the respect contended for (a question unnecessary to decide in this case), yet there was no purpose in the Argentine treaty to take away from the states the right of local administration provided by their laws, upon the estates of deceased citizens of a foreign country, and to commit the same to the consuls of such foreign nation, to the exclusion of those entitled to administer as provided by the local laws of the state within which such foreigner resides and leaves property at the time of decease."

Prior to this decision the cases had generally supported the right of consuls under these treaty provisions to administer upon the estates of their deceased countrymen.

Thus, under these provisions it was held that the Italian consul was entitled to administer upon the estate of a deceased Italian whose entire estate was distributable to citizens resident of Italy, in preference to one who claimed to administer as the general guardian, brother, and creditor of the deceased. Re Silveti, 66 Misc. 394, 122 N. Y. Supp. 400.

And by virtue of this treaty it was held in Re Arduino, 9 Ohio N. P. N. S. 369, 20 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 461, that the Italian consul had the preference in determining to whom administration should be granted on the estate of a deceased Italian subject who left no kin in the United States, notwithstanding the fact that the only property left was a right of action for wrongfully causing his death.

And in Carpigiani v. Hall, — Ala. —, 55 So. 248, it was held that the Italian consul was entitled to administer upon the estate of an Italian subject who died intestate in his consular territory.

And in Re Scutella, 129 N. Y. Supp. 20, the words "the right to intervene" in this treaty were held to entitle the Italian con-administrator of the county of his residence.

The appellant bases his claim to such letters upon the provisions of the treaty of May 8, 1878, between Italy and the United States. The clauses relating to this subject are articles 16 and 17, which are as follows:

"Art. 16. In case of the death of a citizen of the United States in Italy, or of an Italian citizen in the United States, who has no known heir or testamentary executor designated by him, the competent local authorities shall give notice of the fact to the consul or consular agents of the nation to which the deceased belongs, to the end that information may be at once transmitted to the parties interested.

"Art. 17. The respective consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, and consular agents, as likewise the consular chancellors, secretaries, clerks, or attachés, shall enjoy in both countries all the rights, prerogatives, immunities, and privileges which are or may hereafter be granted to the officers of the same grade of the most favored nation." 20 Stat. at L. 732.

Under article 17, the appellant, as consul general of Italy, claims the rights which are given to consuls general of the Argentine Republic by the treaty between that country and the United States, concluded July 27, 1853 (10 Stat. at L. 1005). The last clause of article 9 of that treaty is as follows: "If any citizen of either of the two contracting parties shall die without will to letters of administration upon the estate of an Italian killed in this country, in preference to a creditor of such person.

And the right of consuls to administer under these treaty provisions was also upheld in Re Fattosini, 33 Misc. 18, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1119; Re Lobrasciano, 38 Misc. 415, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1040; Re Logiorato, 34 Misc. 31, 69 N. Y. Supp. 507; McEvoy v. Wyman, 191 Mass. 276, 114 Am. St. Rep. 601, 77 N. E. 379; and Lanfer v. Ritchie, 9 La. Ann. 96, which are set out by the court in Re GHIO.

In The Gen. McPherson, 100 Fed. 860, it was held that article 8 of the consular convention between the United States and Germany, of December 11, 1871, authorizing German consuls to act as legal representatives of German subjects, did not constitute the consul administrator of the estate of a deceased person, or authorize him to recover the wages of a deceased seaman who was a German subject without showing that he represented German subjects who were entitled to the money. The court said: "But that article does not constitute a German consul administrator of the estate of a deceased person. On the contrary, it only authorizes German consuls to act as legal representatives of the German Emperor's subjects. Now, Mr. Schultz ceased to be a subject of the Emperor when he departed from this mundane sphere, and he has no rights for which the German consul need have a care, for his rights were terminated with his death. If he has any heirs, they may be Germans or citizens of the United States. The court will not presume anything as to their identity or nationality."

In Re Davenport, 43 Misc. 573, 89 N. Y. Supp. 537, it was held that the word "intervene" in the treaty with the Argentine Republic included the right of the Italian consul to receive from the public administrator the balance of the estate of an Italian for the benefit to the sole heir, who was an Italian subject.

And in Re Bristow, 63 Misc. 637, 118 N. Y. Supp. 686, it was held that the Italian consul had the right to represent by a delegated attorney an alien minor, next of kin of a deceased Italian subject, upon an accounting by the administrator of the deceased, and that the appointment of a special guardian for such minor was therefore improvident.

So, in Rabasse's Succession, 47 La. Ann. 1452, 49 Am. St. Rep. 433, 17 So. 867, it was held that the treaty with France providing that in case of death of a citizen of that country in the United States without any testamentary executor by him appointed, the consul should have the right to appear personally or by delegate in all proceedings on behalf of the absent or minor heirs, required the recognition of a delegate of the French consul as the representative of absent heirs, the court holding that the treaty was the supreme law of the land.

In Carpigiani v. Hall, supra, it was held that the Italian consul had the right independent of treaty provisions, to intervene for the purpose of having letters of administration, granted on the estate of an Italian subject, revoked on the ground of fraud. The court said: "The duty, and by comity the authority, of a consul to receive and care for the personal estate of citizens of his own country who may die within his consulate, and to protect the estate from spoliation, is prescribed and recognized by all civilized nations. 7 Moore's Digest International Law, § 722, p. 117; The Bello Corrunes, 6 Wheat. 152, 5 L. ed. 229; Wheaton, International Law, 2d ed. 151; Woolsey, International Law, § 96. Of the general propriety of such a practice, there can be no possible doubt, and we are of the opinion that the appellant's intervention on the grounds set forth in his petition was no more than his official duty prescribed, and was authorized by the law and comity of nations. We mean to say only that he had a right to be heard on his petition, independently of treaty provisions, for the purpose of procuring the removal of these administrators if shown to be dishonestly conspiring to despoil the estate, or if they were improvidently appointed; and that this prerogative attaches by law to his consular office, without any special authority will or testament in any of the territories of the other, the consul general, or consul of the nation to which the deceased belonged, or the representative of such consul general or consul, in his absence, shall have the right to intervene in the possession, administration, and judicial liquidation of the estate of the deceased, conformably with the laws of the country, for the benefit of the creditors and legal heirs." Page 1009.

Article 6 of the Constitution of the United States declares that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." And § 10 of article 1 further provides that "no state shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." We will assume that the treaty-making power of the Federal government is so far superior to the lawmaking power of Congress that it would authorize the Federal government to control by treaty the power of the states to confer and limit the right of administrations of estates, and the power of the state courts to appoint administrators, so far as the estates of resident citizens of foreign countries are concerned. See, on this subject, note to Yeaker v. Yeaker, 81 Am. Dec. 536. If this is the case, the treaty with the Argentine Republic, if construed in accordance with appellant's contention, supercedes, in part, the provisions of our Code of Civil Procedure of California, giving the right of administration of the estates of persons dying intestate to the public administrator, in the absence of resident legal heirs, and gives to the consular agents of that country a paramount right to letters upon the estates of citizens of that country residing here, who die intestate, leaving real or personal property in this state and no resident heirs. The favored nation clause of the Italian treaty would give the like right to the appellant, as consul general of Italy, in the present case.

Similar favored nation clauses are found in the treaties with Austria-Hungary (treaty of 1870, art. 15, 17 Stat. at L. 831); Denmark (treaty of 1826, art. 8, 8 Stat. at L. 342); Japan (treaty of 1894, art. 15, 29 Stat. at L. 852); Kongo (treaty of 1891, art. 5, 27 Stat. at L. 929); Korea (treaty of 1882, art. 2, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 680); Russia (treaty of 1832, art. 8, 8 Stat. at L. 448); Spain (treaty of 1902, art. 28, 33 Stat. at L. 2120); Switzerland (treaty of 1850, art. 7, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno.

from those who are entitled to the estate."

In Re Peterson, 51 Misc. 367, 101 N. Y. Supp. 285, under the "most favored nation clause" in the treaty with Denmark, it was held that the Danish consul had no right to waive the issuance and service of citation on behalf of an infant party to proceedings for the probate of a will and testament of a subject of Denmark, so as to give the court jurisdiction over such minor, notwithstanding the section in the treaty with Italy providing: "The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have the power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other by a sale, donation, testament, or otherwise, and the representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases;" or the section of the Argentine Republic treaty involved in RE GHIO. The court said: "I have found no case reported in which the right of a consul to waive the rights of an infant in a proceeding in a surrogate's or other court of this state is passed upon, and, as it is not expressly covered by the treaty between the United States and the Kingdom of Denmark, or any other country, the laws of the state of New York must govern. These laws do not admit of an infant waiving any of its rights, and, of course, no one else has any authority to do what the infant itself could not do. Under these circumstances the infant party in this proceeding must be brought under the jurisdiction of the court, through the medium of a citation properly issued and served."

And in Re Nyahay, 66 Misc. 418, 121 N. Y. Supp. 207, it was held that the Austria-Hungarian consul was not, under the "most favored nation" clause, entitled to appear for minors residing in Austria-Hungary in proceedings for the settlement of the account of an executor, and receive their share of the estate, without the issuance of a citation directed to be served upon them. The court said: "I cannot conceive it possible that greater privileges could be granted to alien infants than are granted to our own residing in this state, and it has been settled beyond all question that even a general guardian appointed for minor infants cannot waive the issuance and service of a citation. I therefore can see no possible course open to the executor here but to take and serve in the usual way a citation, duly returnable in this court after proper service of the same has been made."

842); Tonga (treaty of 1886, art. 11, 25 Stat. at L. 1442); and Zanzibar (treaty of 1886, art. 2, 25 Stat. at L. 1439). Foreign consuls and consular agents are given the same "privileges" as those of the most favored nation, by the treaties with Belgium (treaty of 1880, art. 2, 21 Stat. at L. 777); Costa Rica (treaty of 1851, art. 10, 10 Stat. at L. 922); France (treaty of 1853, art. 12, 10 Stat. at L. 999); Germany (treaty of 1871, art. 3, 17 Stat. at L. 922); Greece (treaty of 1902, art. 2, 33 Stat. at L. 2123); Honduras (treaty of 1884, art. 10, 13 Stat. at L. 705); Netherlands (treaty of 1878, art. 3, 21 Stat. at L. 663); Paraguay (treaty of 1859, art. 12, 12 Stat. at L. 1097); Persia (treaty of 1856, art. 7, 11 Stat. at L. 710); Roumania (treaty of 1881, art. 2, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 773); and Servia (treaty of 1881, art. 2, 22 Stat. at L. 968). The treaty of 1903 with China gives Chinese consuls here the same "attributes, privileges, and immunities" as those of the most favored nation. Art. 2, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 487. The consuls from the countries thus given the same "rights," "prerogatives," or "powers," being those embraced in the list first given, could doubtless claim the same rights as those of Italy, with respect to estates of citizens of their respective countries dying here. Perhaps those included in the second list would claim the same right as a "privilege," within the intent of the respective treaties. The treaty of 1887, with Peru (25 Stat. at L. 1461, art. 33), which terminated in 1899 by notification from Peru, provided that the consuls of each country, in the absence of heirs or representatives, should, ex officio, be the executors or administrators of the citizens of their country who died within their consular jurisdiction.

The question presented would directly affect the right of administration upon the estates of all citizens of all the above-named countries residing in this state, of whom there is doubtless a large number. It is also of grave importance because its solution in favor of the appellant necessarily ascribes to the Federal government the intent, by means of its treaty-making power, to materially abridge the autonomy of the several states, and to interfere with and direct the state tribunals in proceedings affecting private property within their jurisdictions. It is obvious that such intent is not to be lightly imputed to the Federal government, and that it cannot be allowed to exist except where the language used in a treaty plainly expresses it, or necessarily implies it.

So far as we are aware, the exact point has not been considered in any of the states except Massachusetts and New York. In New York it has arisen only in the surrogate courts of two of the counties, New York county and Westchester county. The surrogate court of the latter county held that the consul general of Italy was entitled to letters of administration upon the estate of a citizen of Italy who died leaving property in that county, in preference to the county treasurer, who, by the state law, was entitled as public administrator, in the absence of heirs and creditors. Re Fattosini, 33 Misc. 18, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1119. The same court, in a similar case, apparently, decided that the Italian consul was entitled, by virtue of his office, to maintain a proceeding in the surrogate court, before any grant of letters of administration, to obtain possession of the effects of the deceased, in order that the consul might administer the same under the direction and control of the court. It does not appear that letters had been granted to the consul. Re Lobrasciano, 38 Misc. 415, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1040. The surrogate court of New York county held, in a similar case, that, where the public administrator refused to act, and the Italian consul was legally competent under the state law, he would be entitled to letters, under the statutory provision that when, in such case, the public administrator refused to act, any person legally competent might be appointed. But his right in preference to the public administrator was denied. Re Logiorato, 34 Misc. 31, 69 N. Y. Supp. 507. The Massachusetts supreme court decided that, under the most favored nation clause of the treaty with Russia, and by referring to the treaty with the Argentine Republic, the Russian vice consul had a right to administer, paramount to that of the public administrator, in the case of a citizen of Russia who died in Massachusetts leaving personal property there, his legal heirs being in Russia. McEvoy v. Wyman, 191 Mass. 276, 114 Am. St. Rep. 601, 77 N. E. 379. In a Louisiana case (Lanfear v. Ritchie, 9 La. Ann. 96) the Swedish consul applied for an order that he supersede the duly appointed public administrator in the possession of the estate of a deceased citizen of Sweden, whose heirs were Swedish subjects residing in Sweden. The contention was that this was guaranteed by the treaty with Sweden. The treaty then in force did not contain any favored nation clause, nor purport to give to consuls in either country the right to administer the estates of its deceased citizens. The court denied his application on that ground, and also on the ground that a treaty could not control the state courts. In Aspinwall v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 241, the English court held that the United States consul, as such, had no right, under the act of Congress of 1792, to administer upon the estate of an American traveler who died while in England leaving property there. The court said that "the Crown is the party to see that the property of any person dying in its dominions goes into proper hands," and that the law of the United States could not be allowed to control, even if it purported to do so.

We do not agree with the supreme court of Massachusetts and the surrogate of Westchester county, New York, in regard to the meaning and effect of the Argentine treaty. They held that the right given thereby "to intervene in the possession, administration, and judicial liquidation of the estate of the deceased, conformably with the laws of the country," included the right to be appointed administrator of the estate in place of the person who might be designated by the laws of the particular state to be such administrator, and who had either been previously duly appointed by the local state court, or was applying for such appointment. It appears clear to us from this language that, whatever right was given, it was intended to be a right which should conform to the laws of the country, and that, in view of the well-known complex form of our government, the phrase "laws of the country," so far as the United States is concerned, means the local laws of administration and procedure of the respective states. If the right asserted is necessarily contrary to those laws, it cannot be said to conform to them. Our law declares that, in the absence of next of kin entitled to inherit, the public administrator shall take charge of and administer the estate for the benefit of the creditors and heirs. The right claimed under the treaty is that, in such a case, the consul of the country of which the deceased was a citizen shall take charge and administer; a right directly in conflict with our law. The contention of the appellant is that the only effect of the phrase "conformably with the laws of the country" is that the consul, when appointed, must administer the estate in compliance with the local law of administration. The more obvious interpretation is that the phrase qualifies the right and the method of intervention, as well as the procedure after intervention takes place; that is, that, if the consul intervenes, he must do so in the manner, to the extent, and for the purposes prescribed and allowed by the laws of the local jurisdiction in which the property is situated. This is the grammatical effect of the qualifying clause.

Whether the matter in hand is the possession, the administration, or the judicial liquidation of the estate, the treaty secures to the consul only the right to "intervene" therein. The word "intervene" is here used with reference to a proceeding in a judicial tribunal. In that connection the word has a settled meaning. The dictionaries declare that when applied to matters of law it means: "To interpose in a lawsuit so as to become a party to it." Century Dict.; Standard Dict. Bouvier defines "intervention" at common law thus: "The admission, by leave of the court, of a person not an original party to pending legal proceedings, by which such person becomes a party thereto for the protection of some right or interest alleged by him to be effected by such proceedings." And in the civil law as "the act by which a third party becomes a party in a suit pending between other persons," citing Pothier, Procès Civils, lere part, chap. 2, S. 6, 3 (1 Bouvier's Dict. Rawle's ed. 1114). A similar definition is given in our Code of Civil Procedure (§ 387).

Appellant says that the word should be construed according to its literal meaning, "to come between," and that "to come between," in the possession and administration of an estate, means to have a preferred right to act as administrator, if it refers to a time before the appointment is made, or to supersede any other appointee, if used in reference to any subsequent time. This claim is based on the assertion that an intervention was unknown in the civil law, from which it is supposed the Argentine Republic takes its system of legal procedure, and also upon the principle that in construing treaties words are to be given their popular, rather than their legal, signification.

The Constitution of the Argentine Republic was adopted on May 25, 1853. It was avowedly modeled upon the Constitution of the United States, which it closely follows, both in general plan and in specific provisions. Its government is federal in form, with "provinces" which correspond to our states; each having power to make its own local laws, subject, however, to the civil, criminal, commercial, and mineral codes when such should be enacted by the national Congress. Argentine Const. arts. 105, 108, and 67 [10], vol. 9, Senate Exec. Doc. The treaty with this country was made in July, 1853. At that time the public men of that country must have been very familiar with the form of government of the United States, and with the fact that it committed local affairs to the several states. It is not probable, therefore, that the words of the treaty under consideration were chosen with the intent to have the international agreement become a part of,

and in part supplant, the laws of the states and of the United States, or of the provinces of Argentina, in matters committed solely to the states or provinces. The assertion that an intervention, as our law defines it, was not known in civil-law countries, is shown to be without foundation by the foregoing citation of Bouvier to Pothier, and also by the fact that our own Code definition of an "intervention" and that of many of the other states, is taken from the Code of Louisiana. Horn v. Volcano Water Co. 13 Cal. 69, 73 Am. Dec. 569. The procedure and jurisprudence of that state, as is well known, was derived from the Code Napoléon and from the system in use in the early Spanish-American colonies, both of which are adaptations of the civil law. Justice Field said, in Geoffroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 271, 33 L. ed. 646, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 298, with regard to the construction of treaties: "As they are contracts between independent nations, in their construction words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning as understood in the public law of nations, and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended. And it has been held by this court that where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it, and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred." Appellant quotes this canon of construction as decisive of the sense in which the word "intervene" is to be understood. The court in that case held that the phrase "in all the states of the Union," in the clause of the treaty with France giving citizens of France the right to inherit the property of citizens of the United States, included the District of Columbia. The subject in hand and the context indicated that the phrase was used in the most comprehensive sense, to include the entire country, and the court could not reasonably have held otherwise. But treaties are subject to the same rules of interpretation as other documents. The clause of the Argentine treaty relates to legal proceedings for the settlement of estates, and the words used are to be given the meaning they usually have in their respective countries when used in that connection. The right to intervene in a legal proceeding, partaking of the nature of a proceeding in rem, is not usually understood in either country to include the right to take the property from the custody of the court, or from the officer upon whom the laws of the country impose the duty of administering and distributing it. The object and purpose of the treaty would be fully met by allowing the foreign consul to represent the citizens of his country who are interested as heirs or creditors, in case they are not present or otherwise represented, giving him the right to appear in court for them, either officially or in their name, to protect their interests, and requiring that he be served with notices to them, when notice is required. The use of the word "intervene" implies an intention to give a right to the consul to appear as a party in a pending administration or action carried on by another person, and not a right to institute and carry on the proceeding himself. He has, in addition, a duty pertaining to his office imposed upon him by his own government, that of seeing to the safe-keeping and proper disposition of the effects of citizens of his country who may die while traveling or while temporarily present in the country to which he is accredited, or even while residing therein, and for that purpose, in the absence of any other representative of the deceased having a better right, he may "intervene in the possession" of the estate, conformably with the laws of the country. The custom of nations would permit this, and it may be that, if the public administrator refuses or fails to apply, the consul may petition for and receive letters to himself as the official agent for the persons interested. But the treaty is not to be understood as giving him such right in preference to those upon whom it is devolved by the laws of the country, when they are present and ready to accept its possession and discharge their duty concerning it. The theory of respondent is, in our opinion, in harmony with the spirit and purpose of the treaty, and is in accord with the obvious meaning of the language used.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

Insurance — deduction of indebtedness — extraneous claims.

A provision in a life insurance policy which provides for cash loans on it, authorizing the insurer to deduct indebtedness from the face of the policy in making settlement of the amount due thereunder, does not cover debts growing out of transactions extraneous to the contract, such as indebtedness incurred by the insured while acting as agent for the insurer.

In this note loans made to insured, under specific provisions in the policy for such loans, and their deduction from the amount of the policy, are considered as being part of the insurance contract, and are therefore excluded.

In Re Cleveland Ins. Co. 22 Fed. 200, where a fire insurance company which re-insured the risks of another company, and, on the latter making an assignment, purchased claims against it for losses, for the purpose of setting them off against its own liability, it was held that it was entitled to set off claims embraced in the contract of reinsurance, but not others.

In McKown v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 91 Fed. 352, under a policy providing only for the deduction of "any indebtedness on account of this policy," it was held that an independent indebtedness of the insured could not be deducted, nor could it be set off against the policy, as the two were not due in the same right, the debt on the policy not coming into existence till after the death of the insured.

at the time of his death eleven payments had been made, entitling him to extended insurance for five years, it was held that he then had a present valuable interest in the policy, and therefore the company could set off indebtedness arising independently of the insurance contract, which matured before his death, but not that which matured afterward.

In Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Woods, 11 Ind. App. 335, 37 N. E. 180, 39 N. E. 205, under a policy of life insurance which provided for payment in case of death, "the balance of the year's premiums, if any, and all other indebtedness, being first deducted," but did not in terms provide for a loan of money to the insured, and its repayment out of the insurance money, it was held, in an action on the policy by the beneficiary, that the company was not entitled to set off claims for money loaned to the insured, for the reason that the provision for the deduction of "all other indebtedness" could not be construed to contemplate any indebtedness not connected with the subject of insurance with reference to which the parties were contracting, but only such as arose from the premiums upon which the insurance was based, as for instance premiums unpaid, or for which notes might be given.

Cooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Ella Anson, recovered a judgment in the municipal court of Chicago against the appellant, the New York Life Insurance Company, for $225.01, being a balance claimed to be due on a policy of life insurance issued by appellant on the life of Charles W. Anson, husband of the appellee. The judgment was affirmed in the appellate court for the first district, and the case is brought to this court upon a certificate of importance by appeal from that judgment.

On August 11, 1904, appellant issued a policy of life insurance in the sum of $1,000 to Charles W. Anson, appellee being named as beneficiary. Anson died in 1907, having paid all the premiums as they became due. At the time the policy was issued and at the time of his death he was indebted to the appellant in the sum of $225.01. The appellant claimed the right to withhold that sum under the terms and conditions of the policy, and paid the appellee $774.90. This suit was brought to secure the amount thus withheld. The sole question for our determination is whether the appellant had the right to deduct the amount claimed to be due from Charles W. Anson in its settlement with appellee.

The policy of insurance contained a number of provisions, among them being one numbered six, which was as follows: "Any indebtedness to the company will be deducted in any settlement of this policy or of any benefit thereunder," and it is by virtue of this provision that appellant claims the right to deduct this amount in its settlement with appellee.

The facts were stipulated, and they show that, prior to making this insurance contract with the appellant, Charles W. Anson had been in its employ as an agent. He quit the service of appellant at the time this policy was issued, and at that time was indebted to it in the sum of $225.01. The indebtedness grew out of his transactions with appellant as its agent, extending over a period of about one year, and consisted of numerous items. It was in no wise connected with this policy of insurance, but had to do entirely with his employment as an agent.

Appellee contends that the language of this provision is uncertain and ambiguous, and, being so, that it must be construed most favorably for the insured; while ap-policy against a company which was authorized "to invest its capital and the funds accumulated in the course of its business, or any part thereof, in bonds and mortgages on real estate, . . . and to lend the same or any part thereof on the security of such stocks or bonds, . . . and to change and reinvest the same as occasion may from time to time require," it was held that it was not authorized to go into the market and buy up a mortgage given by the insured, not as an investment, but for the purpose of setting it off against his claim.

And to the same effect is Straus v. Eagle Ins. Co. 5 Ohio St. 59.

In Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Twyman, 122 Ky. 513, 121 Am. St. Rep. 471, 92 S. W. 335, 97 S. W. 391, it was held that a policy which provided that the insured might at any time, with the consent of the company, assign the policy or change the beneficiary, authorized an assignment of it to the company as security for a loan, which would bind the beneficiary, although the charter of the company provided that any policy issued for the benefit of the wife or children of insured should not be held liable for any of his debts, and that all of such policy should be paid to the beneficiaries, to be held by them free from the debts of such insured person.

Co. 153 Mass. 544, 27 N. E. 669, it is held that independent debts due from the insured to the insurer may be set off against a policy which had been assigned by the beneficiaries to the insured before his death.

In Webb v. Missouri State L. Ins. Co. 134 Mo. App. 576, 115 S. W. 481, a provision in a life insurance policy payable to the wife of insured, that "any indebtedness to the association, under any provision thereunder or otherwise," should be deducted upon settlement, was held to authorize the association to deduct from the policy indebtedness of the insured not arising out of the contract of insurance.

In Murray v. Great Western Ins. Co. 72 Hun, 282, 25 N. Y. Supp. 414, affirmed in 147 N. Y. 711, 42 N. E. 724, which was an action on a policy of marine insurance, it was held that notes given for the premium for insurance on other vessels might be set up as counterclaims.

In Entwistle v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 180, under a paid-up life insurance policy which provided that after a certain time the holder might convert it into cash, it was held that one to whom the policy had been assigned by the insured and beneficiary was the holder, and entitled to the cash value without any set-off of the general indebtedness of the insured to the insurer.

pellant, on the other hand, contends that there is no ambiguity or uncertainty in the language of the provision, but that under the plain meaning of its terms it gives to appellant the right to deduct from the amount due on the policy the amount of any indebtedness of the insured to appellant at the time of his death. The meaning of the language used in this provision is not free from doubt. It is not clear that the indebtedness referred to is meant to be the indebtedness of the insured or that of the beneficiary. Neither is it certain whether it refers only to indebtedness growing out of or connected with the policy of insurance, or to indebtedness in general. In construing the meaning of any of the provisions of a policy of insurance, regard must be had to the object and purpose which were intended by the contracting parties, and the policy being signed by the insurer alone, and the language employed being that of the insurer, the provisions are usually construed most favorably for the insured in case of doubt or uncertainty in its terms. Healey v. Mutual Acci. Assn. 133 Ill. 556, 9 L.R.A. 371, 23 Am. St. Rep. 637, 25 N. E. 52.

Among the provisions in the policy preceding provision six is one which provides for cash loans to the insured on the pledge and security of the policy. The obligation to pay the annual premium and the possibility of borrowing money by pledging the policy were the only ways in which the insured could become indebted to appellant by reason of his connection with it as a policy holder. If we consider the object and purpose which were intended by the parties, in construing provision six, what indebtedness can it be said was contemplated by them? Bearing that purpose in mind, it cannot be said that they contemplated any other indebtedness than that connected with the subject of the insurance. Appellant would hardly contend that by this provision it was contemplated that it might be enabled to purchase outstanding notes and claims against the insured equal to the amount of the policy, and thus defeat entirely his object in purchasing the insurance, yet the contention of appellant that this was meant to refer to any possible indebtedness would be broad enough, if sustained, to allow it to do so. The indebtedness that must be understood to have been referred to by appellant and the insured was that which might arise by virtue of the terms of the policy itself,—that is, either by lending money to the insured as the policy provided, or by extending the time for paying any premium, as it also provided might be done. The provision is uncertain and ambiguous, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) and being so, the trial court properly construed it most favorably for the insured.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

J. A. FITCHPATRICK, Appt.,

v.

WILLIAM E. BOTHERAS et al.

Mortgage — assessment on property — absence of notice — validity.

Failure to provide for notice to the mortgagee of the amount of a special assessment on the mortgaged property, and the time for hearing objections thereto, does not render the statute invalid as to him, as depriving him of property without due process of law, although enforcement of the assessment may impair his lien.

(March 10, 1911.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Story County sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

Statement by McClain, J.:

Action in equity to foreclose a second mortgage on certain described real property. The defendant Fowler, as county treasurer, was made a party, with the allegation that a special assessment on the property for a drainage ditch was invalid, and a part of the relief asked was that said county treasurer be perpetually enjoined from enforcing the collection of said special assessment. The county treasurer interposed a demurrer to the petition, which demurrer was sustained. Whereupon judgment was entered against plaintiff for costs, and plaintiff appeals.

Note.—Public improvement: necessity of giving mortgagee or other lienor notice.

Although it has often been held that notice to property owners of a public improvement for which they will be specially assessed is generally essential to the validity of the assessment (28 Cyc. 979), the question stated in the title to the note has seldom arisen. There are a few decisions, however, which directly bear thereon.

The decision in FITCHPATRICK v. BOTHERAS is directly supported by Baldwin v. Moroney, 173 Ind. 574, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 761, 91 N. E. 3, holding that the statute making drainage assessments have priority over existing mortgages does not deprive Messrs. Fitchpatrick & McCall for appellant.

Messrs. E. H. Addison and Burnham & Egermeyer, for appellees:

It was not necessary to provide in the statute a notice of the assessment to the mortgagee, for the question of priority of liens could not be raised in the proceedings by him.

People v. Weber, 164 Ill. 412, 45 N. E. 724.

Where a statute provides for notice to property owners at some stage of the proceedings before the assessment is made, it is not open to constitutional objection simply because it does not provide for a new or additional notice of each successive step.

Ross v. Wright County, 128 Iowa, 427, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 431, 104 N. W. 506; Yeomans v. Riddle, 84 Iowa, 147, 50 N. W. 886; Oliver v. Monona County, 117 Iowa, 43, 90 N. W. 510; Johnson v. Story County, 148 Iowa, 539, 126 N. W. 153.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The validity of the special drainage assessment of the mortgaged property is questioned by appellant on the ground that the statute does not provide for notice to mortgagees of the amount of such assessment apportioned to each tract, and of the day set for hearing objections to such assessment. Code Supp. 1907, § 1989-a12. A prior section (1989-a3) requires notice to be served upon owners of land within the proposed drainage district, and upon persons in actual occupancy of any such land, and upon each lien holder or encumbrancer of any land through which or abutting upon which the proposed improvement extends, as shown by the county records of the proceedings for establishing the district; and it is conceded that plaintiff as mortgagee was given the notice thus provided for, the mortgaged property abutting in fact upon the proposed improvement. But plaintiff had no notice of the assessment, and no opportunity therefore, as he contends, to file objections to the specific assessment upon the mortgaged property. For the appellee it is contended that failure of the statute to provide for any notice to mortgagees or other lien holders would not render it unconstitutional, and that the notice which was in fact provided for and given to appellant of the proceedings to establish the district was sufficient to charge him with notice of all subsequent proceedings.

Notwithstanding the averments of plaintiff's petition that the mortgagor is insol-mortgagees out of possession of their property without due process of law, because not providing for notice to them; but no other case seems to have passed upon the constitutional right of the mortgagee or other lienor to notice. Norwich v. Hubbard, 22 Conn. 587, however, treats the question on general grounds, it being held that a mortgagee out of possession was not entitled to notice of proceedings for public improvements, part of the cost of which would be assessed on the mortgaged premises, the court saying that however reasonable it might be that the mortgagee should, by timely notice, have the opportunity of protecting his rights which the mortgagor has neglected, it cannot be required, in the absence of legislative provision therefor.

The question of the necessity of giving a mortgagee notice has also arisen under statutes relating to the making of public improvements and the levying and payment of assessments therefor. Thus, in Kinnie v. Bare, 80 Mich. 345, 45 N. W. 345, it was held that under a statute requiring notice of the hearing for the appointment of special drain commissioners to be served upon every person whose lands are traversed by the proposed drain, or who will be liable to assessment therefor, mortgagees are not entitled to notice. And in Ruyter v. Reid, 121 N. Y. 498, 24 N. E. 791, affirming 52 Hun, 610, 22 N. Y. S. R. 200, 4 N. Y. Supp. 743, under a statute providing that no sale of real estate for the nonpayment of assessments shall destroy the lien of any recorded mortgage, except in case the purchaser gives the mortgagee written notice thereof requiring him to redeem, it was held that a sale for assessments which became liens, after the recording of a mortgage, did not affect the rights of the mortgagee, where no notice was given him as provided by the statute.

The element of notice to a mortgagee was also involved in Deisner v. Simpson, 72 Ind. 435, wherein it was held that a mortgagee whose mortgage was recorded before certain ditch proceedings were commenced could question, in a proceeding to foreclose the mortgage, and in which by cross complaint it was sought to have the lien for the ditch assessment declared superior to the mortgage, the legality of the ditching proceeding and a prior judgment declaring the assessment a lien on the mortgaged land, where he had no notice of the ditch proceeding, and had not been made a party to the action for recovery of the assessment,—but in rendering the decision more weight was evidently attached to the fact that the mortgagee was not made a party to the suit in which the assessment was declared a lien, than to the fact that no notice was given.

The general question of "procedure for the establishment of drains and sewers" is treated in the note to State ex rel. Utick v. Polk County, 60 L.R.A. 161.

vent, so that the debt secured by plaintiff's second mortgage cannot be satisfied as a personal obligation, and that the value of the property is such that, if the special assessment be enforced against it, appellant's second mortgage lien will be practically valueless, we think that appellant cannot complain that, under the drainage proceedings, he is deprived of property without due process of law. It must be conceded, of course, that as to a property owner a statute is unconstitutional which provides for a levy of a special assessment upon his property without some form of notice which will enable him to appear in the proceedings and question at the proper stage the propriety and fairness of the assessment. Beebe v. Magoun, 122 Iowa, 94, 101 Am. St. Rep. 259, 97 N. W. 986; Ross v. Wright County, 128 Iowa, 427, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 431, 104 N. W. 506. But we have never held that mortgagees and other lien holders, or persons simply having such interest in the property that they may possibly be affected by the enforcement of a special assessment against it, are entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard in such proceedings. The power to levy a special assessment for public improvements on the property directly benefited is a part of the general power of taxation. Seattle v. Hill, 35 L.R.A. 372, and note (14 Wash. 487, 45 Pac. 17); Murphy v. Beard, 138 Ind. 560, 38 N. E. 33; Wabash Eastern R. Co. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. 134 Ill. 384, 10 L.R.A. 285, 25 N. E. 781.

A mortgagee takes his lien subject to the rights of the state, or of any municipal authority to which the power is properly delegated, to impose on the property in accordance with law not only general taxes, but special assessments. He is not the owner of the property, but a lien holder merely, and the fact that incidentally the value of the lien may be impaired by the enforcement against the property of general or special taxes does not give him a constitutional right to be notified of the proceedings under which such taxes are imposed. The possible impairment of his lien does not amount in such cases to a taking of property without due process of law. Provident Inst. for Savings v. Jersey City, 113 U. S. 506, 28 L. ed. 1102, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612; Murphy v. Beard, 138 Ind. 560, 38 N. E. 33.

The legislature might properly provide therefore, as it has done (in Code Supp. 1907, § 1989-a45), that the special assessment for drainage purposes when levied shall be a lien on the premises upon which it is assessed to the same extent and in the same manner as taxes levied for county and state purposes. See Code, § 1400. 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

And although the mortgagee of the premises has not had notice of the proceedings, such an assessment takes priority over the lien of his mortgage. The statute so expressly provides, and it is conceded that a general tax lien has priority over the lien of a prior mortgage.

This question has often arisen in other states, and it seems to have been uniformly held that, if the statute provides for a superior lien, as the result of special assessments, the mortgagee has no ground of complaint, although he is not, by notice or otherwise, made party to the proceedings in which the assessment is levied. Dressman v. Simonin, 104 Ky. 693, 47 S. W. 767; Norwich v. Hubbard, 22 Conn. 587; People v. Weber, 164 Ill. 412, 45 N. E. 723; Wilson v. California Bank, 121 Cal. 630, 54 Pac. 119; 1 Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 639.

As the statute would have been valid therefore without any provision for notice to plaintiff as mortgagee, we have no occasion to determine whether the notice which was in fact given to him of the proceedings to establish the drainage district, so that he might join in the special proceedings for the assessment of damages to the land from the taking of a portion thereof for the construction of the ditch across or over such land, was sufficient to charge him with notice of the subsequent proceedings for the levying of the special assessment.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

OLDS MOTOR WORKS, Appt.,

v.

LUCY SHAFFER.

(145 Ky. 616, 140 S. W. 1047.)

Evidence — notice — faulty construction of machine.

1. A manufacturer of an automobile will be charged with notice of the unsafe condition of a rumble seat attached to the car, if the faulty construction was so patent that no person engaged in its construction could have failed to observe it.

Note. — Liability of manufacturer or dealer for personal injuries caused by defects in automobile.

The case of OLDS MOTOR WORKS v. SHAFFER seems to be the first in which the specific question as to the liability of manufacturers of automobiles for injuries resulting from defects in their cars has been passed upon.

It had previously been held, however, that such manufacturers impliedly warrant that Negligence — automobile — dangerous construction — liability for injury.

2. The manufacturer of an automobile who attaches to it a rumble seat so insecurely that it is likely to break off when occupied by a passenger is liable to a stranger for injuries caused by its so doing, if he knew or was charged with notice that the seat was imminently dangerous, and concealed that fact from the purchaser.

Same — unsafe condition of machine — concealment.

3. Representing a machine to be well built is a sufficient concealment from the purchaser of a defect in it, with notice of which the maker is charged, to bring him within the rule that a manufacturer who sells an article for general use knowing it to be imminently dangerous and unsafe, and conceals that fact from the purchaser, may be liable for injury caused by use of the machine.

Same — unsafe automobile — dangerous character.

4. A rumble seat placed upon an automobile so insecurely as to be liable to break off if a passenger attempts to ride in it is imminently dangerous, within the rule that a manufacturer who sells an imminently dangerous article, concealing the defect from the purchaser, may be liable to strangers attempting to use it, for injuries caused by its defective condition.

Same — notice to purchaser — duty to examine.

5. Although a rumble seat is so insecure-they are reasonably fit for the use for which they were intended.

Thus, in Berg v. Rapid Motor Vehicle Co. 78 N. J. L. 724, 75 Atl. 933, where an action for breach of contract was brought against a manufacturer of automobiles by one to whom he had contracted to sell a sight-seeing automobile suitable for his purposes, it was held that a direction that the plaintiff must support, by a preponderance of testimony, the burden of showing that the machine supplied could not generate the power contracted for, was decidedly favorable to the defendant, since the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury on the question of whether the defendant had supplied a machine capable of performing the work for which the defendant knew it was purchased. The court said: "The rule is an equitable modification of the hardship resulting from the uniform enforcement of the doctrine of caveat emptor, and was first applied in Jones v. Bright, 5 Bing. 533, 3 Moore & P. 155, 7 L. J. C. P. 213, 30 Revised Rep. 728, where it was held that a manufacturer or maker who undertakes to supply an article for a particular purpose warrants it to be reasonably fit for that purpose; and the reason for the existence of the warranty thus implied is that the purchaser must rely upon the judgment and skill of the vendor. This doctrine has been held to apply whether the subject of the contract is already manufactured and in stock, or is to be made on the purchaser's order."

And in Buick Motor Co. v. Reid Mfg. Co. 150 Mich. 118, 113 N. W. 591, where an action was brought by a manufacturer of engines for automobiles against a manufacturer of automobiles to recover the price of engines furnished, it was held that there was an implied warranty that the engines and transmissions should be merchantable in quality and reasonably fit for the use for which they were intended.

It would therefore seem clear that any negligence in the manufacture of these machines or in the selection of materials used would render the manufacturer liable to the purchaser of the machine for any injury resulting to him by reason of this negligence, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

providing the latter was himself in the exercise of due care.

The liability of the manufacturer to third parties, which arises independently of contract, presents a question somewhat more difficult. Upon the principle of closely analogous cases cited by the court in OLDS MOTOR WORKS v. SHAFFER, and which will be found dealt with at length in the notes subsequently cited, the decision in OLDS MOTOR WORKS v. SHAFFER seems sound.

It may be well here to emphasize the wide distinction between the call made upon ordinary vehicles, such as carriages, wagons, etc., and that made upon motor vehicles, as regards the strain and racking to which the latter are subjected. These increased demands for strength, created by the great speed at which automobiles are driven, place them in a distinct class as regards the question whether they are dangerous or unsafe in their construction, and whether they are reasonably fit for the use for which they are intended.

ly fastened to an automobile that slight examination would disclose its danger, the purchaser will not be charged with notice of it, so as to relieve the manufacturer from liability for injury to a third person through its attempted use, if the purchaser was assured by the manufacturer that it was safe, and thereby induced not to make an examination.

New trial — newly discovered evidence — lack of diligence.

6. A new trial will not be granted in an action to hold an automobile manufacturer liable for injuries caused to a passenger by the breaking off of the rumble seat, because of newly discovered evidence consisting of the box on which the seat was fastened, if the court is convinced that by the exercise of diligence the box could have been secured before the trial.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 15, 1909, Gardner and Colston bought an automobile from the appellant, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Olds Motor Works. The machine, which had no top, had a rear seat for two, called a rumble seat, that rested on and was fastened to a box that was also a tool box. On July 30, 1909, Colston took riding with him in his machine Mrs. Tyler, who occupied with him the front seat, and the appellee, Miss Shaffer, and her sister, who occupied the rear seat. While going up what is known as the Broadway hill, in Louisville, Kentucky, at a reasonable rate of speed, the box on which the rear seat was fastened split or cracked, and fell off from the body of the automobile to which it was attached, carrying with it the seat, thus throwing appellee and her sister to the ground. The appellee was severely and permanently injured by the fall, and brought this action against the appellant company to recover damages for the injuries sustained. On the trial, the jury awarded her $4,088, and the appellant asks on this appeal a reversal of the judgment entered on the verdict.

The suit was brought against the appellant as the manufacturer of the automobile, upon the ground that when it sold the car to Gardner and Colston it knew it was defectively constructed, and that the rear seat was unsafe and dangerous for any person to ride in. The petition, as amended, averred that "the said automobile, when it was sold by defendant to said Colston and Gardner, and when the plaintiff's fall took place, was defective, unsafe, and imminently dangerous to human life and limb; and it was at both said times unsafe and dangerous for any person to ride in either of said two rear seats. The defendant when it made said sale knew the said automobile was defective, unsafe, and dangerous; knew that it was unsafe and dangerous for any one to ride in either of said two rear seats; and knew that said automobile in the condition aforesaid was imminently dangerous to human life and limb. Notwithstanding such knowledge, the defendant negligently sold said automobile to Colston and Gardner, without notifying or warning either of them it was defective, or in an unsafe or dangerous condition. On the contrary, at the time of said sale, defendant falsely represented to said buyers that said automobile was safe, and negligently failed to inform, and concealed from both of them the defects therein, and the unsafe and dangerous condition thereof. . . . That at no time did the plaintiff or Gardner or Colston know of the defective or unsafe or dangerous condition of said automobile, which caused the said plaintiff's fall and injuries, or know that it was unsafe or dangerous for any person to ride in either of the two rear seats of said automobile, or know that said automobile in the condition set forth in the petition was imminently dangerous to human life or limb." The answer was a traverse of the averments of the petition.

As it is not seriously insisted—and, indeed, could not well be—that the damages are excessive, it is not necessary to notice further this feature of the case.

But it is strongly contended by counsel for appellant that (1) if the automobile was unsafe and dangerous, this fact was known to Gardner and Colston at the time and before appellee was injured, and this knowledge on their part exempted the company from liability to appellee; (2) if the automobile when sold was so constructed as that it was unsafe and dangerous, it was incumbent upon appellee to prove that the condition of the automobile was concealed from the purchasers at the time of the sale; and it is insisted that, as the evidence showed that the defects in the machine were known to the purchasers, and that there was no concealment of them by the appellant, the jury should have been directed to return a verdict in favor of the appellant. It is also said that the court erred in instructing the jury, and in refusing to grant a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence.

There is much conflict in the evidence upon the question as to whether or not Gardner and Colston knew of the unsafe condition of the machine before the accident, and also upon the question of the concealment of the defects by appellant from the purchasers when it sold the machine. But there is convincing evidence that the box upon which the rear seat rested was not only insufficient in itself, but was insecurely fastened to the body or bed of the automobile. It is clearly shown that the body of this box was made out of wood entirely too thin and light for the purpose, and that it was held in place on the body of the machine by four iron pieces fastened to the body of the machine, that run up on the inside of the box, and to which the box was fastened by very small and short wood screws. The evidence is conclusive that the box should have been fastened to the iron uprights by bolts, and that the manner in which it was fastened was unsafe and dangerous in the extreme to persons riding on the rear seat. Indeed, it might be said that the box was not attached at all to the iron uprights, and so was liable at any moment when the machine was running, especially up a hill, to tilt over and fall off, as it did when appellee was injured. We may therefore assume at the very outset that the appellant company sold to Gardner and Colston an automobile so defectively constructed as that it was unsafe and dangerous for persons to ride on the rear seat.

This fact, however, is not sufficient to authorize a recovery against the company by the appellee, who was not a party to the contract it entered into with Gardner and Colston, the purchasers. There was no privity between the appellee and the appellant company. She was a stranger to the contract between it and the purchasers. In cases like this, the liability of the manufacturer to third parties, where any liability exists, is put upon the ground that the manufacturer of certain articles intended for general use owes what may be called a public duty to every person using the articles to so construct them as that they will not be unsafe and dangerous, and for a breach of this duty the manufacturer, within the limitations we will point out, is liable in an action for tort—not contract—to third persons who are injured by his breach of duty. The class of cases, however, in which the maker is liable to third parties is quite limited; the general rule being that no liability attaches for injury to persons who cannot be brought within the scope of the contract. There are, however, well-defined exceptions to the rule of nonliability, and the courts are singularly agreed as to the law applicable to cases of this character. The rules found in textbooks and cases, defining the liability of the maker of the article to third persons who are injured by its use, are stated substantially as follows by all the authorities: (1) When he is negligent in the manufacture and sale of an article intrinsically or inherently dangerous to health, limb, or life; (2) when the maker sells an article for general use, which he knows to be imminently dangerous and unsafe, and conceals from the purchaser defects in its construction, from which injury might reasonably be expected to happen to those using it. Under the first class fall articles such as poisons or dangerous drugs, that are labeled as containing innocent or harmless ingredients; and in this class of cases it is not essential to a recovery by the injured party against the maker that knowledge of his mistake or negligence should be brought home to him. His liability rests upon the broader ground that persons dealing in articles intrinsically and inherently dangerous must use a high degree of care in putting them on the market, for the protection of the health and lives of those who may naturally and reasonably be expected to use them. And for his negligence or carelessness alone, without any fraud, deceit, or concealment, he may be held accountable in damages to any person injured by their use. Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455. But in the other class of cases, where the article itself is not inherently or intrinsically dangerous to health or life, a third party, seeking to hold the maker liable for injuries suffered by him in the use of the article, must show that the maker knew it was unsafe and dangerous, and either concealed the defects or represented that it was sound and safe. But even when this is shown, the maker will not be liable, if it is made to appear that the purchaser had knowledge of the defects at and before the third party was injured in using it. Heindirk v. Louisville Elevator Co. 122 Ky. 675, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1103, 92 S. W. 608; Berger v. Standard Oil Co. 126 Ky. 155, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 238, 103 S. W. 245; Pullman Co. v. Ward, 143 Ky. 727, 137 S. W. 233; Ward v. Pullman Co. 138 Ky. 554, 128 S. W. 606; Logan v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 189 Ky. 202, 129 S. W. 575; Huett v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 61 L.R.A. 303, 57 C. C. A. 237, 120 Fed. 865; Lewis v. Terry, 111 Cal. 39, 31 L.R.A. 220, 52 Am. St. Rep. 146, 43 Pac. 398; Schubert v. J. R. Clark Co. 49 Minn. 331, 15 L.R.A. 818, 32 Am. St. Rep. 559, 51 N. W. 1103; Heizer v. Kingsland & D. Mfg. Co. 110 Mo. 605, 15 L.R.A. 821, 33 Am. St. Rep. 482, 19 S. W. 630; Ines v. Welden, 114 Iowa, 476, 54 L.R.A. 854, 89 Am. St. Rep. 379, 87 N. W. 408; Tomlinson v. Armour Co. 75 N. J. L. 748, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 923, 70 Atl. 314; 2 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 1486.

It is obvious that in the case we are considering the liability of the maker falls under the second exception above stated, and, putting it upon this ground, the contention is made that there is no evidence that the maker knew of the defect in this machine, or concealed it from the purchasers, and for this reason it is said a peremptory instruction should have been given to the jury to find for the appellant. It is true there is no direct evidence that the appellant knew of the defect in the construction of the rear seat, but the faulty construction was so patent that no person engaged in its construction could have failed to observe it. We think it may safely be assumed that these machines are made by competent mechanics and according to well-arranged plans, and the construction of the box upon which the rear seat rested was so palpably defective that the makers may be charged with actual notice of it. If direct notice had to be brought home to the manufacturer in cases like this, it would defeat in almost every instance the meritorious rule of law charging the maker with liability, as it is seldom that evidence could be obtained tending to show that the maker had actual notice of the defect complained of. But the maker will not be permitted to shield himself from responsibility upon the theory that he did not have notice of the defect in the article, when the evidence shows that it was so plain that notice of it could not have escaped his attention. This principle is well stated in Ward v. Pullman Co. 138 Ky. 554, 128 S. W. 606. In that case, suit was brought by a third party to recover damages from the Pullman Company for injuries sustained in the use of a defective brake staff on a railroad car made by it. In considering the question as to whether notice of the defect had been brought home to the company, the court said: "It was shown by the testimony of three blacksmiths that appellee's blacksmiths were bound to have had hold of the brake staff in welding it, and to have known that the brake staff was defectively welded, that the slightest strain upon it would cause it to break, and that any attempt of a brakeman to turn it would break the staff, and cause him to fall from the car. We think it legitimate to conclude that this defect in the brake was known to appellee's servants by whom the welding was done; that it must also have been discovered while the car was being painted by appellee's servants charged with that work, who inserted in the rift or crack paint to hide its presence, and prevent its discovery by others."

... We think it further proper to say that the jury, from the facts proved, would, if properly instructed, have had the right to conclude that appellee, when it sold and delivered the gondola to the railway company for use in its business, and by its employees, was bound to have known and did know that its brake staff was imminently dangerous to life and limb." We think the evidence that the construction of the rear seat was unsafe and dangerous was sufficient to bring notice of the defect home to the maker; and therefore the motion for a peremptory instruction based upon the ground that there was a failure of proof upon this point was properly denied.

The argument is further made by counsel for appellant that, as it is necessary that there should be evidence that the maker concealed the defect, this concealment means a physical concealment, such as covering up or hiding with paint or other material, or in some other way, the defects that, except for this character of concealment, would be open and apparent. But it is not necessary that the defect should be concealed from the purchaser by the application of paint or some other method. When the maker is chargeable with liability for a defect in a machine, he is guilty of concealing it if he represents to the purchaser that the machine is safe and sound. It was charged in the petition, and there was sufficient evidence to support it, that the agents of appellant who sold this machine represented to the purchasers at the time of the sale that it was a well-built and well-constructed machine. This representation of the condition of the automobile the purchasers had the right to rely on; and if the machine was not as represented, the representation may be treated as a concealment from the purchasers of the defects in its construction. There is no substantial difference between concealing a defect in an article by hiding it in some way from the view of the purchaser, and in representing to him that the article is sound and well constructed, when in fact it is not. In either event, the effect is to mislead and deceive the purchaser. If the defect is hidden from his view by artificial means, an inspection of it would give him no information of the defect. The appearance of the thing would deceive him into believing that it was as it seemed to be. On the other hand, if it is represented to be sound and all right, and he relies on this assurance, as he has the right to do, he is equally deceived by the appearance of things. It is true the word "concealment" is used in nearly all the cases as being an essential element in fixing liability upon the maker; but we do not think that this word should be given the limited and narrow meaning contended for by counsel for appellant. It is used in the cases to express the idea that the seller has deceived the purchaser by hiding or keeping from him a defect in the article that he desires to purchase. It is the fact that the defect is concealed from the purchaser, and not the means or method by which the deception is practised, that is the material thing to be considered. Therefore we feel justified in saying that the representations made by the seller as to the kind and quality of an article, upon which it is intended the purchaser shall rely, if they are false, should be treated as if he had concealed from him, by paint or other means, the defects that, except for the representation, he might by examination have discovered. Berger v. Standard Oil Co. 126 Ky. 155, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 238, 103 S. W. 245; Kuelling v. Roderick Lean Mfg. Co. 183 N. Y. 78, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 303, 111 Am. St. Rep. 691, 75 N. E. 1098, 5 Ann. Cas. 124; Woodward v. Miller, 119 Ga. 618, 64 L.R.A. 932, 100 Am. St. Rep. 188, 46 S. E. 847. Whether the mere failure of the maker to disclose dangerous defects that he had knowledge of would be sufficient to hold him liable in cases of this character it is not necessary to consider, as this question is not presented by the record; but there is authority to the effect that if the maker fails to give notice of known defects, he will be liable to third persons. Heizer v. Kingsland & D. Mfg. Co. 110 Mo. 605, 15 L.R.A. 821, 33 Am. St. Rep. 482, 19 S. W. 630. This being our understanding of the law applicable to the point under consideration, the court did not commit error in instructing the jury that appellant was liable if it represented "to Colston and Gardner, or either of them, at the time of the sale, that the tool box mentioned was not defective, or that it was fastened with reasonable security to the body of the automobile and was not dangerous, and they relied upon the representations, if they were made, and in reliance upon them purchased or used the automobile."

It is further insisted that under the authorities cited there can be no recovery unless the article is what is termed an "imminently dangerous" one; and it is said that, as an automobile cannot be classed as an imminently dangerous machine, the rule of law holding manufacturers liable cannot be invoked by appellee. It is true that, generally speaking, the liability of the maker of an article in cases like this to third parties is confined to articles that are regarded as imminently dangerous to life or limb. But this does not mean that the article must be at all times and under all conditions imminently dangerous. This would be entirely too narrow a construction to place upon the meaning of these words as used in the opinions; and while the words "imminently dangerous" will be often found, the disposition of the cases in which they are used shows that they were used in a broad and liberal sense. Many articles are very simple and safe in their use and construction, and under no conditions could they be regarded as dangerous in their use. On the other hand, there are a great many things in common use that are dangerous, unless they are safely and properly constructed. This is especially true of machinery that is operated by power of any kind. It is a matter of common knowledge that automobiles are equipped with engines operated by electricity, steam, or gasolene, and are intended to travel over highways at a high rate of speed; and it is indispensable to the safety of persons using these vehicles that they should be safely and properly constructed with reference to the use for which they are intended. They are in general use throughout the country, and are employed as means of transportation by great numbers of people, and the liability of their occupants to injury from the defects in material or construction is so great as to put upon manufacturers the duty of exercising a high degree of care in their construction, and equipping them in such a manner as will make them, when used with proper care, reasonably safe. If an automobile is defectively or insufficiently constructed, there can be no doubt that it is an imminently dangerous thing to life and limb, as much so as a railroad engine or any other powerful machine, because, no matter how careful the driver or occupants may be in its use, or how competent they may be to operate it, they are helpless to protect themselves from undiscovered and unknown defects that place in peril their lives. It is also worthy of notice that the courts are not disposed to confine the liability of the maker to machines or articles that are generally understood to be dangerous. There is an inclination along right lines, and based on sound principles, to hold manufacturers of articles intended for public use, and that are liable, if defectively constructed, to inflict harm, responsible to third parties. As illustrations of this, in the leading cases of Huset v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 61 L.R.A. 303, 57 C. C. A. 237, 120 Fed. 865, and Heizer v. Kingsland & D. Mfg. Co. supra, threshing machines were held to fall within the meaning of an imminently dangerous article; in Lewis v. Terry, 111 Cal. 39, 31 L.R.A. 220, 52 Am. St. Rep. 146, 43 Pac. 398, a folding bed was treated as a dangerous article. The doctrine was further extended in Woodward v. Miller, 119 Ga. 618, 64 L.R.A. 932, 100 Am. St. Rep. 188, 46 S. E. 847, to embrace a buggy; in Schubert v. J. R. Clark Co. 49 Minn. 331, 15 L.R.A. 818, 32 Am. St. Rep. 559, 51 N. W. 1103, to include a stepladder; and in Kuelling v. Roderick Lean Mfg. Co. 183 N. Y. 78, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 303, 111 Am. St. Rep. 691, 75 N. E. 1098, 5 Ann. Cas. 124, to apply to a farm wagon. And so there is no room for two opinions about the proposition that an automobile comes well within the class of articles for which the manufacturer may be held liable to third persons for injuries sustained on account of defective construction.

It is further contended for appellant that the evidence shows that Gardner and Colston, at the time and before the appellee was injured, had full knowledge of the defective construction of the box upon which the rear seat rested, and this notice upon their part relieved the company from liability for its breach of duty. The rule seems to be that, where the purchaser of an article knows that it is unsafe or dangerous, and with knowledge of this fact invites or permits a third party to use it, and the third party is injured, he cannot maintain an action for tort against the 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

maker. The reason for this is that the action against the maker proceeds on the theory, and is founded on the fact, that in selling the article he practised fraud and deceit in concealing the defects that made its use unsafe and dangerous; and, of course, when it is admitted or proven that he has not practised any concealment, and that the purchaser was well informed as to the defects, the bottom drops out of the case against the maker, and the liability is shifted to other shoulders. Another reason is that the maker's wrongful act in such a case is not the proximate cause of the injury, when it is shown that there was the intervention of a new agent, to wit, the purchaser, who, with knowledge of the danger, used and permitted others to use the article. Logan v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 139 Ky. 202, 129 S. W. 575. The evidence upon the question of the knowledge of the purchasers is conflicting, but they state positively they had no notice of the defective construction of the machine until after the accident; and, while it seems apparent that a careful examination by them would have disclosed the defects in the construction of the rear seat that caused the accident, it is evident that they were influenced not to make a careful examination by the representations made to them by the agent who sold them the machine, and these representations absolved them from the duty of seeking to discover the defects. They had the right to, and say they did, rely upon what the agent told them. When he represented the machine to be safe and sound, after his attention was directed especially to the rear seat, the purchasers were naturally lulled into security, as he knew more about the machine and its construction than they did. Although it must appear that a purchaser through whom another in a case like this is seeking redress exercised ordinary care to discover the defects upon which the action is grounded, it will take very slight evidence of care on his part to satisfy the requirements of the law, when it is shown, as in this case, that the seller deceived and misled the purchaser by representations as to the sufficiency of the article. The jury were instructed that they could not find for the appellee unless they believed that the defect was not known to either Colston or Gardner, and could not have been known to them, or either of them, by the exercise of ordinary care. This instruction fairly presented to the jury the law applicable to the point under consideration, and it was with the jury to weigh the evidence introduced upon this issue; and we are not disposed to disturb their finding upon this question of fact.

It is also urged that a new trial should have been granted upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. It appears that the box in which existed the defects that caused the accident was not present during the trial, but its whereabouts was discovered, and it was secured before the motion for a new trial was acted upon. It is now insisted that the presence of this box at the trial would have been material evidence for the appellant, and that it is entitled to a new trial on account of its failure, after due diligence, to obtain this box before the trial. From the evidence introduced on the trial, and an inspection of the box that was brought to this court and exhibited during the argument, we are inclined to the opinion that its presence on the trial would have been hurtful in place of beneficial to the appellant. But, aside from this, we are convinced that the appellant, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have secured this box before the trial.

Upon the whole case we find no substantial error to the prejudice of the appellant, and the judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

v.

SILAS N. PHELPS.

(210 Mass. 78, 96 N. E. 349.)

Criminal law — ex post facto law — reducing number of judges.

A statute passed after the commission of a crime, reducing the number of judges who shall preside at the trial, is not invalid as an ex post facto law.

(October 17, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Supreme Judicial Court for Franklin County, denying his motion in arrest

Note. — Ex post facto law: statute reducing number of presiding judges at criminal trial.

A law which deprives an accused person of some substantial right or immunity possessed by him before its passage is ex post facto as to prior offenses. 8 Cyc. 1031.

A careful search has failed to disclose any authority upon the question whether a statute reducing the number of presiding judges at a criminal trial is void as an ex post facto law. The cases of Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 377, 38 L. ed. 485, 14 Sup. Ct. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of judgment upon a verdict convicting him of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William A. Davenport and Harry E. Ward for appellant.

Mr. Richard W. Irwin for the Commonwealth.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is whether a statute enacted after the commission of an offense is void as an ex post facto law because its effect is to provide that one in place of two or more judges shall preside when the defendant is tried by a jury.

The question thus raised is a question upon which the Supreme Court of the United States is the final authority. The general rule was laid down by that court in Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 377, 382, 38 L. ed. 485, 487, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 570, 572, in these words: "It may be said, generally speaking, that an ex post facto law is one which imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable at the time it was committed; or an additional punishment to that then prescribed; or changes the rules of evidence by which less or different testimony is sufficient to convict than was then required; or, in short, in relation to the offense or its consequences, alters the situation of a party to his disadvantage. Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 18 L. ed. 356; Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 27 L. ed. 506, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 443. But the prescribing of different modes of procedure, and the abolition of courts, and creation of new ones, leaving untouched all the substantial protections with which the existing law surrounds the person accused of crime, are not considered within the constitutional inhibition. Coolsey, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 329." And in the subsequent cases of Thompson v. Missouri, 171 U. S. 380, 386, 43 L. ed. 204, 207, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 922, and Mallett v. North Carolina, 181 U. S. 589, 596, 597, 45 L. ed. 1015, 1019, 1020, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 241, the more particular statement of the general rule originally put forward in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations was approved: "But so far as mere modes of procedure are concerned, a party has no more right in a criminal than in a civil action to insist that his case shall be disposed of under the law in force when the act to be investigated is charged to have taken place. Remedies must always be under the control of the legislature, and it would create endless confusion in legal proceedings if every case was to be conducted only in accordance with the rule of practice, and heard only by the courts in existence, when its facts arose. The legislature may abolish courts and create new ones, and it may prescribe altogether different modes of procedure in its discretion, though it cannot lawfully, we think, in so doing, dispense with any of those substantial protections with which the existing law surrounds the person accused of crime." See Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 381.

Rep. 570, and State v. Jackson, 105 Mo. 196, 15 S. W. 333, 16 S. W. 829, cited in COM. v. PHELPS, held that a constitutional amendment which divided the number of judges of the supreme court into two divisions, and conferred exclusive jurisdiction of criminal cases on one division, is not an ex post facto provision as to pending cases; and to the same effect are Moore v. Missouri, 159 U. S. 673, 40 L. ed. 301, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 179, and State v. Bulling, 105 Mo. 204, 15 S. W. 367, 16 S. W. 830, which were cases construing the same constitutional amendment.

It was accordingly decided by the United States Supreme Court, in Gibson v. Mississippi, 162 U. S. 565, 40 L. ed. 1075, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 904, that a subsequent statute requiring members of the grand jury to be persons of good intelligence, sound judgment, and fair character, as well as qualified voters and able to read and write, was not void as an ex post facto law; in Thompson v. Missouri, 171 U. S. 380, 43 L. ed. 204, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 922, that a subsequent statute providing that comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine should be permitted to be made by the witnesses and submitted to the jury was a valid act; and in Mallett v. North Carolina, 181 U. S. 589, 45 L. ed. 1015, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 241, that a subsequent act giving the state an appeal in a criminal case was not void as an ex post facto law. It was held, on the other hand, in Thompson v. Utah, 170 U. S. 343, 42 L. ed. 1061, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 620, that the provision of the Constitution of the state of Utah, providing that cases should be tried by a jury of eight, was void as an ex post facto law in its application to felonies committed while Utah was a territory.

To come to decisions nearer to the question in the case at bar, it was decided by this court in Com. v. Phillips, 11 Pick. 28, that a subsequent statute transferring jurisdiction from the supreme judicial court to the municipal court was not void as an ex post facto law. In that case Chief Justice Shaw said, at page 31: "A new tribunal may be erected, or new jurisdiction given to an existing court, to try past offenses, and this is not ex post facto." In State v. Jackson, 105 Mo. 196, 15 S. W. 333, 16 S. W. 829, at the time of the killing, the court of appeal consisted of five judges, a majority of whom made a quorum. By a subsequent constitutional amendment the number of judges of that court was raised to seven, and it was divided into two divisions, one of which only had jurisdiction in criminal cases. That division consisted of three judges. It was held that "it was entirely competent for the people to adopt such a change in their organic law as to take away from this court as a whole all cognizance of criminal causes, and to confer such jurisdiction on a portion or division of this court, though less in numbers and different in personnel from this court, as organized when the crime in question was committed." The case of Com. v. Phillips, supra, was relied upon by the supreme court of Missouri in coming to that conclusion. For a similar decision, see State v. Thompson, 141 Mo. 408, 42 S. W. 949.

Finally, it has been a common practice in this commonwealth to do the very thing here complained of, namely, to enact statutes reducing the number of judges who are to preside at the trial of capital cases without excepting from their operation and making special provision for cases where the killing took place before the statute was enacted. This is not decisive of the constitutionality of such acts, but this practice, extending over a number of years, is an indication of what by common consent has long been regarded as within the limits of the Constitution. By force of Stat. 1782, chap. 9, and Stat. 1804, chap. 105, capital cases were to be heard, tried, and determined by this court sitting in banc. It was held in Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 303, that this provision covered the arraignment of the defendant in a capital case. Stat. 1832, chap. 130, § 6, provided that a prisoner in such a case could be arraigned at a term of court holden by a single justice, leaving the trial to be conducted by the full court. This continued to be the law (see Rev. Stat. chap. 81, §§ 15 and 13) until 1859 when from July 1 of that year until May 31, 1860, the superior court had jurisdiction of capital cases and trial was to be had before three justices of that court (Stat. 1859, chap. 1906, §§ 1, 21). We are not aware that any trial was held under these provisions. They were repealed and the former law re-established by Gen. Stat. chap. 112, §§ 5 and 8, chapter 181, § 2, and chapter 182, at p. 905; and if continued in force until the enactment of Stat. 1872, chap. 232. That act provided that two or more justices of this court present at a jury term should have the powers of the full court in the trial of indictments for the crime of murder. This continued to be the law (see Pub. Stat. chap. 150, §§ 18, 19) until the enactment of Stat. 1891, chap. 379. By that act jurisdiction over capital cases was transferred to the superior court, and by § 2 it was provided that the trial should be before three justices. By Stat. 1894, chap. 204, that was changed so that the trial could be before two or more justices. That continued to be the law (see Rev. Laws chap. 157, § 8) until the enactment of the statute here in question (Stat. 1910, chap. 555, § 3), which repealed Rev. Laws chap. 157, § 8, and left trials in capital cases to be conducted by one or more justices under Rev. Laws, chap. 157, § 2.

In the case at bar there was no change in the indictment that had to be found nor in the conduct of the trial by which the fact of the defendant's guilt had to be established, nor in his right to have any and all questions of law reviewed by the same appellate court that was in existence when the alleged crime was committed. The only change was in the fact that one in place of two or more judges was to and did preside at the trial. The learned counsel for the defendant has frankly admitted that the only connection in which this change operated to the injury or prejudice of the defendant was in matters lying in the discretion of the presiding judge. His contention is that the fact that while before Stat. 1910, chap. 555, § 3, matters lying in the discretion of the presiding judge were decided by two or more judges, at the trial they were decided by one judge only. But the reason why matters which are left to be finally decided in the discretion of the presiding judge are left to be so decided is because they are matters of such a character that whichever way they are decided, it cannot be said that they are decided wrongly. We are of opinion that a change by which such matters are to be decided by one in place of by two or more judges is not a change which affects the substantial protection with which, at the time the offense was committed, the existing law surrounded the defendant as a person accused of crime. It follows that Stat. 1910, chap. 555, § 3, repealing Rev. Laws, chap. 157, § 8, is not void as an ex post facto law.

The entry must be that the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment should be affirmed.

Action — joinder — independent wrongdoers.

Held, overruling Trowbridge v. Forepaugh, 14 Minn. 133, Gil. 100, that where several persons, without any concert of action, but whose several acts of negligence concur in causing the plaintiff's injury, he may join them in an action for the recovery of damages therefor.

Headnote by START, Ch. J.

Note. — Joinder of municipality and person responsible for dangerous condition, in action for injuries on street or highway.

This note does not deal with the question of joinder of two municipalities which are under a joint or common duty to maintain a certain portion of a street or highway. Nor does it deal with the right to sue jointly the city and an employee or contractor who causes a dangerous condition in a street, under a contract of employment with the city.

As to the right of a municipality which has been held liable for injuries from an unsafe condition of a street, to recover over against the owner or occupant of abutting property, see the note to Seattle v. Puget Sound Improv. Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 949.

As to the effect of the question of proximate cause upon the rule denying contribution or indemnity between joint tortfeasors, see the note to Tacoma v. Bonnell, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 582.

As to the character of the liability of several persons whose independent wrongs of the same kind contribute to enhance the degree or extent of the injury sustained by plaintiff, see the note to Day v. Louisville Coal & Coke Co. 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167.

As to the joint liability of master and servant for tort of servant, see the notes to French v. Central Constr. Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 670, and Hagerty v. Wilson, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 356.

As to joinder of statutory action against a master with common-law action against a servant for the latter's negligence, see the note to Mayberry v. Northern P. R. Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 675.

As to the effect of a verdict for the servant in an action against the master and servant, for the latter's negligence or misfeasance, see the notes to McGinnis v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 880, and to Southern R. Co. v. Harbin, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 404.

APPEAL by defendant National Biscuit Company from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County, overruling its demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Price Wickersham, for appellant:

The complaint does not charge a joint tort, and cannot be construed to allege that the defendant National Biscuit Company in any manner committed a tortious act jointly with the other two defendants, or either of them.

W. 356, 10 Ann. Cas. 754.

Messrs. Barton & Kay, for respondent:

The several causes of action are properly united in the complaint.

Mayberry v. Northern P. R. Co. 100 Minn. 79, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 675, 110 N. W. 356, 10 Ann. Cas. 754; Pleins v. Wachenheimer, 108 Minn. 342, 133 Am. St. Rep. 451, 122 N. W. 166.

practice permits the municipality to implead the abutter or to overplead against him in case he is otherwise made a party. San Antonio v. Talerico, 98 Tex. 151, 81 S. W. 518. This permits the adjudication in a single action of the responsibility for the injury, not only as between the person injured and the city, but also as between the city and the abutter.

The test usually applied in the determination of this question is whether the defendants were charged with a common duty, the breach of which caused the injury. But the cases applying the test do not agree in results obtained.

Commonness of duty—cases permitting or requiring joinder.

It is held in Illinois that for separate acts of trespass separately done, or for positive acts negligently done, although a single injury is inflicted, the parties cannot be jointly held liable to the party injured; or, in other words, if there is no concert of action, no common intent, there is no joint liability; but that a different principle applies where the injury is the result of a neglect to perform a common duty resting on two or more persons, although there may be no concert of action between them. In such cases, it is held that the party injured may have his election to sue all parties owing the common duty, or each separately, treating the liability as joint or separate. Peoria v. Simpson, 110 Ill. 294, 51 Am. Rep. 683.

So, by the application of this doctrine, where it is ascertained that it is the duty of both the owner and the city to keep the sidewalk in repair, the failure to do so is a common neglect, and the parties may be held either jointly or severally. Ibid; Elliott v. Field, 21 Colo. 378, 41 Pac. 504.

While the Kansas court holds that where the abutting owner puts down a dangerous sidewalk, and the city negligently suffers it to remain in a dangerous condition, the city is liable for an injury thereby caused, irrespective of the negligence of the abutter, and the latter is not a necessary party 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to an action against the former. (Topeka v. Sherwood, 39 Kan. 690, 18 Pac. 933), it decides that where an electric light wire breaks and remains hanging in the street for a period of three weeks, when a user of the street is injured, both the city and electric light company are charged with knowledge of its condition, and both may be joined in an action for injuries thereby inflicted. Kansas City v. File, 60 Kan. 157, 55 Pac. 877. It was contended in this case that the obligation of the two parties to prevent the electric wires from becoming obstructions or dangerous agencies proceeded from different sources; that no relation of contract or of public or municipal policy existed between the parties, which made the care of the wires a joint duty; and that no obligation rested upon the city to inspect the wires of the light company or to superintend the business of lighting the streets, so as to charge it jointly with the company for damages resulting from the latter's delinquency. But after pointing out that the Code, which, in legal as well as in equitable actions, seeks the adjustment of interrelated controversies in a single suit, and lends strong countenance to the joinder of defendants in such cases, the court said: "But aside from the rules of the Code, and going to the metaphysical question of relationship between the two defendants, there was a community of action, or rather of negligent omission, upon their part. Each was under obligation to see that the electric wire in question did not fall down and remain upon the ground,—the city because of the general oversight of its streets which the law requires it to take; the light company because of its obligation to prevent its property from becoming a dangerous menace to the public safety. If it be admitted that these obligations are different, or spring from different sources, they nevertheless concur to one end,—to the end of avoiding, among other and similar consequences, just such injuries as the plaintiff sustained. The concurring neglect of these respective obligations produced a single consequence, and must therefore be viewed as joint and mutual. The petition alleged that the wire

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal by the defendant National Biscuit Company from an order of the district court of the county of Ramsey, overruling its demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that several causes of action are improperly united therein. The allegations of the complaint, here material, are to the effect following:

The defendant McMillan Company is the owner of the premises described in the complaint, which front upon Eighth street, in the city of St. Paul. The defendant Biscuit Company is the lessee of the premises. The defendant city, more than five years ago, opened, graded, and paved the street in front of the property, and constructed a stone sidewalk along the south side of the street in front of the property, and opened it for public use and travel. More than five years ago the city authorized the owner of the property to construct an areaway in and under such sidewalk and make an opening therein, and the same was thereafter and more than five years ago so constructed, and has ever since been maintained and used by the defendant the Biscuit Company as the occupant and lessee of the premises. The opening so made in the sidewalk was covered by two iron shutters working upon hinges which extend about an inch above the level of the sidewalk and the shutters, and were, during all the times mentioned, dangerous obstructions in the sidewalk. The Biscuit Company has so in question broke and remained down for three weeks before the accident occurred. This was time enough to charge the city, as well as the company, with knowledge of its condition, and from which its concurrent disregard of its duty is plainly to be inferred. Inasmuch as the duty in question rested upon both city and company, and inasmuch as each possessed knowledge of the other's failure to discharge the obligation, it can be fairly said that each so concurred in the other's negligence as mutually and jointly with it to conduce to the plaintiff's injury."

A Louisiana case holds that a petition in an action to recover for injuries resulting from a defect in a street alongside a street railway shows a sufficient solidarity of obligation to warrant an action against the city and the railway company, jointly, although it may be they may sever at the trial, where it alleges that it is the legal duty of the city to keep its streets in good order and repair and safe for the use of its inhabitants; that the railroad company, by virtue of city ordinances and contracts by which it acquired the franchise, is bound to keep the streets through which its tracks are laid in good order and repair, and safe for the use of the people; and further, that it is so bound as a part of its duty to the public, independently of its contract; and that the defect in the street remained with knowledge of the officers of both corporations, and was due to their gross negligence. Cline v. Crescent City R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 1031, 6 So. 851. This result was reached as against an objection that although the defendants might be bound to repair and keep in repair the public streets, the obligation to do so arose from two entirely different sources, in that the city's duty arose from the act of the legislature, and was an obligation imposed entirely by law, whereas the railway company's duty grew out of its contract with the city, and was purely contractual in its nature.

It is held in Connecticut that an action cannot be maintained against the town alone under a statute authorizing an action against the railroad company and the city for injuries occurring by reason of any defect in that part of the highway which any street railway company is bound to keep in repair, such action being but a substitute for an action under another statutory provision under which it was held that the town could not be sued alone. Lavigne v. New Haven, 75 Conn. 693, 55 Atl. 569.

In Kosters v. National Bank, 62 Misc. 419, 116 N. Y. Supp. 647, the court intimates that a distinction should be made between activity and passivity in relation to the creation of the dangerous condition; holding that where the cause of the injury was not the result of any affirmative act upon the part of the abutter, but was rather the result of passively suffering snow and ice to accumulate upon the walk, an action could not, at least, where no notice was given to the abutter of the condition, be maintained against him without joining the city, as the latter was primarily responsible. The court alluded to a provision of the charter making it the duty of the abutter to keep the sidewalks clear of snow and ice, and making him liable for any injury resulting from his failure to do so, but pointed out that this provision did not specify that he should be liable to the party injured, and that it therefore did not affect the primary responsibility of the city, which made it a necessary party.

So, one who makes an excavation in the street under permission from the city, and executes to it an instrument whereby he promises to pay all cost or damage resulting to the city, and to save the city harmless, is a necessary party to an action against the city for injuries received because of the excavation, where the city charter provides that whenever an action is brought against the city on a claim for which the city would have a right of action against another person upon a bond, the surety or sureties on said bond must be made codefendants; and the necessity for such joinder is not affected by the fact that the amount named in the instrument is less than the amount of damages demanded in the action; nor can it be avoided upon been the lessee and occupant of the premises for more than five years, during which time it has so maintained and used the opening in the sidewalk and the shutters, including the hinges. All of the defendants knew of the dangerous condition of the hinges for a long time prior to the time when plaintiff received the injuries herein complained of. Each of the defendants at all times stated carelessly and negligently caused and permitted the hinges to be in the condition stated, and they negligently failed to make the same safe. The plaintiff, while walking along the sidewalk, tripped and stumbled over the hinges, and was thereby personally injured.

The contention of the appellant is that the complaint does not allege a joint tort, and that this case is ruled by the case of Trowbridge v. Forepaugh, 14 Minn. 133, the theory either that the instrument is not a bond, or that the obligation assumed by signing the instrument was that of a principal, and not of a surety. Donovan v. Oswego, 42 App. Div. 539, 59 N. Y. Supp. 759.

The Massachusetts court holds that a right of action at common law against electric lighting and electric railway companies for negligence in permitting the street to become charged with electricity cannot be joined with a right of action against the city upon its limited liability under the highway law, upon the theory that such defendants are joint tortfeasors. Mooney v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 185 Mass. 547, 70 N. E. 933. The court points out that, as against the electric company, the liability rests solely upon the common law, while, as against the city, it rests solely upon the statutes; that the electric companies had nothing to do with the negligence charged against the city, and that the city had nothing to do with the negligence charged against the companies; that the liability of the city depends upon statutory conditions, and is limited in amount, while the liability of the other defendants depends upon conditions entirely different, and is measured only by the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff; and that, as between the defendants, the liability of the electric companies was primary and that of the city secondary; and that the city, in case of a recovery against it, could maintain an action against the other defendants to recover what was paid.

So, it is held in Trowbridge v. Forepaugh, 14 Minn. 133, Gil. 100, in respect of the right to join an abutting owner and the city in an action for injuries received by reason of an excavation in the street, the city's liability being predicated of the duty imposed by its charter to keep the street safe, that the liability of the city depended on a state of facts not affecting its codefendants, and the converse; that neither defendant was in fact or in law chargeable with, or liable on account of, matter set up as a cause of action against the other; and that they did not jointly conduce to the injury by any act, either of omission or commission. It was said that the statute, which was merely declaratory of the common law, forbade the joinder of causes of action which did not affect all parties thereto, and that for the joinder in that case either defendant might demur.

It was held in Baines v. Woodstock, 10 Ont. L. Rep. 694, that since the tort of the abutter was in placing the lumber on the highway, for which the city was not liable, and the tort of the city consisted in not removing the lumber, for which the abutter was not liable, it was clear that there was not a joint tort, but two separate and distinct torts, and that therefore a joint action was not maintainable.

So, in Dutton v. Lansdowne, 198 Pa. 563, 53 L.R.A. 469, 82 Am. St. Rep. 814, 48 Atl. 494, holding that a municipality and the abutting owner cannot be sued jointly to recover damages for injuries caused by a defective sidewalk, the court declares that it does not follow that because both the property owner and the municipality may be liable for the neglect of a particular duty, that they may be joined in an action of tort. "If two defendants be sued jointly for a tort," said the court, "and the evidence is not sufficient to hold one, there may be a discontinuance as to that one and the trial may proceed as to the other. In such case the joint action does not fail because the tort is not joint, if committed, but for the reason that the evidence fails to show any concert of action. But where the declaration is for a joint tort, and the case goes to the jury as against both defendants, if under such circumstances, the evidence fails to show that the defendants were joint tortfeasors, it is error to permit a recovery against one or both."

So, too, upon the ground of want of concert of action between defendants and of the distinctiveness of their respective duties, the court in Wiest v. Electric Traction Co. (Weist v. Philadelphia), 200 Pa. 148, 58 L.R.A. 666, 49 Atl. 891, holds that a joint action cannot be maintained against a municipal corporation, a street railway company, and a contractor working for the latter, for injuries caused by the negligent obstruction of the street, on the theory that it was the duty of the municipality to keep its streets free from obstructions, and that the company and contractor were negligent in placing and continuing the obstruction in the street.

And it was held in Mineral City v. Gilbow, 81 Ohio St. 263, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 627, 90 N. E. 800, that a municipal corporation and the owner of a lot abutting upon a street were improperly joined in an action to recover for injuries resulting to a traveler on the street from falling over a retaining

Gil. 100. If the question presented by the demurrer be considered and determined on principle, disregarding mere verbal logic, and without reference to the case relied upon, we are of the opinion that there was in this case no misjoinder of causes of action. The plaintiff has only one cause of action, which is for the recovery of damages by reason of the defect in the sidewalk. Each defendant owed a duty to the traveling public, including the plaintiff, to remove the nuisance in the sidewalk which caused her injury. Now, if the allegations of the complaint are true, then she may maintain her action against all of the defendants,—against the city, because it authorized the creation of the unsafe condition of the sidewalk and negligently permitted such condition to continue; against the owner of the premises, wall on the lot, where the allegation against the lot owner was that he negligently maintained upon his premises a dangerous pit which encroached upon a sidewalk without any barrier or other protection to warn persons using the sidewalk, or to prevent them from falling into the pit; and the allegation against the municipality was that it wrongfully permitted the sidewalk to be in a dangerous condition without any such barrier, and that at the time of the plaintiff's injury it negligently allowed an electric light near the place of the accident to be unlighted, since an entirely different cause of action was alleged against each defendant. The court invoked the rule of Peoria v. Simpson, 110 Ill. 294, 51 Am. Rep. 683, supra, that for separate acts of trespass separately done, or for positive acts negligently done, although a single injury is inflicted, the parties cannot be jointly held liable to the party injured, and that if there is no concert of action and no common intent, there is no joint liability.

In Zeigler v. Ashley, 7 Ohio N. P. 388, 5 Ohio, S. & C. P. Dec. 163, a demurrer to the joinder of the city with the abutter, who made the excavation in the street without maintaining sufficient guards, was sustained, the demurrer having been interposed by the city upon the ground that since the city did not create the danger, it could not be liable without actual notice of the dangerous condition, or unless it had existed for such length of time as to charge it with constructive notice; and that therefore this constituted a separate cause of action against the city, because the negligence of the abutter was in not sufficiently protecting the public against a danger he had created; and upon the further ground that the action being joint, the judgment, if rendered against the defendant, must be joint; and that if the city was required to pay the judgment, there could not be that contribution or indemnity which the law gives a municipality in cases where it has been required to pay damages resulting from the negligence of third persons.

It was held in Stephani v. Manitowoc, 89 Wis. 467, 62 N. W. 176, that in an action against a city for injuries resulting from a defect in a drawbridge, the bridge tender was not a necessary party, where the complaint failed to show that he was responsible for the condition so as to render him liable over to the city.

Donoho v. Vulcan Iron Works, 75 Mo. 401, holds merely that § 9 of article 16 of the charter of St. Louis of 1876, whose 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

provision it does not disclose, means that when the city is liable in an action on account of the negligence or wrongful act of another, who is also liable to an action for the same injury, the city and such other person must be joined as defendants, and that there can be no judgment against the city unless judgment be also rendered against such other person, who is also liable; but that if a person be joined as defendant with a city, who is found upon trial not to be liable to an action by the plaintiff, this will not prevent a recovery against the city, if the case be one in which an action could have been maintained against the city alone before the adoption of the section referred to. The action was for injuries received by the falling of a bank of earth in a street, created with knowledge of the city, by the other defendant. It appears from Norton v. St. Louis, 97 Mo. 537, 11 S. W. 242, that this section of the charter provided that whenever the city shall be made liable to an action for damages by reason of the unauthorized or wrongful act, or of the negligence of any person who shall also be liable to an action on the same account, the injured party, if he sue the city for damages, shall also join such other person and no judgment shall be rendered against the city unless judgment is rendered against such other person; and if any action be brought against the city alone, and it is made to appear that any person ought to be joined according to the provisions of this section, the plaintiff shall be nonsuited; but no person shall be liable to be sued jointly with the city who would not be liable to be sued separately, irrespective of its provisions. It was contended in the Norton Case, that, under the section of the charter, the city could not be held liable for injuries upon a sidewalk allowed to become covered with ice, where the abutter himself was not held liable for his nonobservance of an ordinance providing that, after any fall of snow, the abutter should cause the same to be immediately removed from the sidewalk. The court, however, held that this was not a case where the city was held liable by reason of the negligence of another, for which negligence the other person was also liable, and did not come within the terms of the charter provisions referred to, and that therefore it was not necessary that the abutter should have been made a party to the suit, or that the judgment should have been recovered against it in order that the city be held liable; and pointed out that because it created the unsafe condition, or nuisance, in the public street to be utilized in connection with the premises, and passed them on to its lessee in that condition; against the lessee, because it continued to maintain and use the opening in the sidewalk, with its defective shutters and unsafe condition; or, in other words, it is a continuer of the nuisance. Landru v. Lund, 38 Minn. 538, 38 N. W. 699; Ferman v. Lombard Invest. Co. 56 Minn. 166, 57 N. W. 309; Isham v. Broderick, 89 Minn. 397, 95 N. W. 224. Why should the plaintiff, having but one cause of action, and entitled to only one satisfaction of it, be compelled to proceed against the de-

the city was sought to be charged because of its neglect to discharge a duty owed to the plaintiff as a traveler on one of its streets over which it alone had exclusive power and control, and that it was liable, if at all, because of its own negligence, and not by reason of the negligence of any other person. "Conceding," continued the court, "that the city has the power to cause obstructions upon the sidewalk to be removed at the expense of the owners of the ground fronting thereon (charter, art. 3, paragraph 9), and that the ordinance requiring such owners, immediately after any fall of snow, to cause the same to be removed from the sidewalk in front of their premises, is a legitimate mode of exercising that power, yet, the city could not, by passing such an ordinance, relieve itself of its duty to the plaintiff and to the public traveling on its streets, of keeping its sidewalk in a reasonably safe condition for travelers thereon, or transfer or impose that duty upon another. Nor can its liability for a failure to discharge that duty be made contingent upon the liability of the citizen to the city for a failure to discharge his duty to the city in the matter of removing the snow, as required by ordinance. For a neglect of this duty of the citizen, the city might impose such a penalty as would be calculated to secure its performance, if it has the power to impose such a burden; but it could not create a liability to damages for a civil action by a private individual against one who failed to discharge the city's duty in that behalf."

The provision of the St. Louis charter involved in the last two cases was held inoperative and void in Badgley v. St. Louis, 149 Mo. 122, 50 S. W. 817, upon the ground that it was not enacted by the general assembly of the state, but was framed by a board of freeholders, under a statute giving it express authority to prepare a charter for the city, and was ratified at a special election; and that therefore it constituted an invalid attempt by the city to regulate the practice and proceedings of state courts, in that it was invalid, especially because a state statute provided that every person who should have a cause of action against several persons, and who should be entitled by law to one satisfaction therefor, might bring suit thereon jointly against all or as many of the persons liable as he might think proper.

Badgley v. St. Louis was followed in Noble v. Kansas City, 95 Mo. App. 167, 68 S. W. 969, holding the provisions of the Kansas City charter void for the same reason assigned in the Badgley Case, and holding 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

therefore, that a city against which an action was brought for personal injuries jointly with the abutting owner who created the dangerous condition on the sidewalk could not be heard to object that the plaintiff subsequently dismissed her suit as against the abutter. In this case the court also invoked the provision of the statute that every person having a cause of action against several persons, and entitled to one satisfaction therefor, may bring a suit thereon jointly against all or as many of the persons liable as he may think proper, and held that the election in the first place to sue both the city and the abutter did not have the effect of precluding the plaintiff from subsequently dismissing the action as against one of them.

In Waltmeyer v. Kansas City, 71 Mo. App. 354, involving an action against a city and a water company for injuries received by falling upon ice which accumulated when the water company opened its hydrants to prevent freezing, it was held that the lower court erred in giving a judgment in favor of the water company, and that since such a judgment would be a bar to any future contest between the city and the company, it should be reversed in so far as it affected the right of the city, but the judgment against the city was affirmed. The charter provision as to joinder of action involved in this case was much like that contained in the St. Louis charter already referred to.

Under the provision of the St. Louis charter before it was declared void, it was held that where an action was brought jointly against the city and a person whose negligence caused the dangerous condition in the street, but was afterwards dismissed as to the latter, a subsequent judgment against the city should be reversed. Schweickhardt v. St. Louis, 2 Mo. App. 571.

So, too, it was held that under the Kansas City charter, where a plaintiff was, due to his own fault, compelled to dismiss the action as to the wrongdoer in order to avoid a judgment in the latter's favor which would be a bar to an action over by the city against him, he stood in no better position than he would have occupied if he had voluntarily dismissed the action as to the wrongdoer; but that the city, by filing its answer and going to trial notwithstanding its objection to the dismissal of the wrongdoer, waived its right to invoke the provision of the charter, and to have the wrongdoer made a party, or to make this a ground of invalidating the judgment rendered against it. Mancuso v. Kansas City, 74 Mo. App. 140.

defendants separately, and bring three separate actions, instead of one, for the same cause of action?

It is urged that by joining them in the same action they might be embarrassed in making their defense, but by answering separately, as they have the right to do, the court can and will protect the rights of each. It has been urged by some courts that, if all the parties liable in a case like the one at bar are joined in the same action, their right of contribution will be lost. This claim is purely technical, for courts look at the substance of the transaction, not its form, and if in this case the defendants were sued separately, they would be entitled to contribution among themselves, the right would not be lost by their joinder in the same action. Mayberry v. Northern P. R. Co. 100 Minn. 79, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 675, 110 N. W. 356, 10 Ann. Cas. 754. The joinder of all the parties in one action in such a case as this avoids a multiplicity of suits and conserves the orderly administration of justice. We can conceive of no sound reason why they should not be so joined. The fact that they did not, by their joint act, conduce to the plaintiff's injury, which seems to have been the only basis for the decision in the case of Trowbridge v. Forepaugh, affords no substantial reason why they should not be joined in the same action upon a cause of action for which each is liable, for the several acts of negligence of the defendants concurred in causing the injury. We accordingly hold, overruling Trowbridge v. Forepaugh, that several causes of action are not improperly united in the complaint. Order affirmed.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Court of Chancery dismissing its bill filed to enforce a lien on funds in the hands of the defendant city for the construction of a reservoir. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McCarter & English, for appellant:

The lien of the complainant is ahead of the assignment of Stewart and Abbot to James C. and Alexander M. Stewart, and should be enforced as against them.

Gummere, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, filed its bill under the provisions of the municipal lien law to enforce a lien on moneys in the hands of the city of Newark under a contract between the city and John L. Stewart and Frederick W. Abbot, partners, for the construction of the Cedar Grove reservoir. Stewart and Abbot subcontracted the embankment and borrow pit work to one James Seme, who entered into a bond with the complainant, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, as the surety thereon, to indemnify and save harmless Stewart and Abbot from any pecuniary loss resulting to them from a breach of any of the terms of the contract between them and Seme. This bond also provided that in case of default by Seme in the work, the complainant could at its option assume and complete his contract. Seme did default in his work, and the complainant exercised its option to complete his contract, and did in fact perform the work and furnish the materials called for therein to an amount exceeding $35,000. Not being paid by the principal contractor the money due them for such work and materials, they, on December 12, 1904, filed their lien with the city in compliance with the statute.

or's bond to owner, see note in 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 573.

The general rule is that a provision in a contract with a municipality that the latter may retain a certain percentage until claims of materialmen and laborers are paid is for the benefit of the city, and such provision may be waived by the city; but where such fund is retained, the rights of materialmen and laborers in the funds are superior to those of general creditors of the contractor.

Right of city to waive provision.

A provision in a contract that the city may retain money due the contractor until claims of materialmen and laborers have been paid does not create a right of action in their favor against the city in case the contractor is paid in full. 28 Cyc. 1063.

A provision in a contract that if the contractor did not furnish evidence that all persons who had done work or furnished material had been paid, then such sums as might be necessary for such payment should be retained by the city until such claims should be fully satisfied, is a contract only between the contractor and the city, which might be waived by the latter; or it could retain the money until the contractor paid the workmen, at the city's option; and the materialmen acquire no rights by virtue of the provision to compel the city to pay them out of the money due the contractor. Old Dominion Granite Co. v. District of Columbia, 20 Ct. Cl. 127.

In Quinlan v. Russell, 15 Jones & S. 212, there was a provision that, upon failure of the contractor to furnish satisfactory evidence that claims of laborers and materialmen who had filed notice thereof had been paid, such amount as might be necessary to satisfy the same should be retained from moneys due the contractor until liability should be fully discharged or such notice withdrawn, and it was held that such provision did not amount to such an equitable assignment of such fund that materialmen who had given the notice specified had a lien on the sum retained.

And in Grassman v. Bonn, 30 N. J. Eq. 490, in construing such provision, the court said: "It does not create a lien in favor of such persons. It gives merely the right to retain money until the claims shall have been settled, and proof to that effect shall have been given to the commissioners. It was intended as a means of coercion, of compelling the contractors to pay their debts contracted in connection with and for the work. The commissioners are charged with no duty towards those to whom such debts are due, by reason of it. Whether they would retain or not was entirely at their option. The provision does not render them liable at law or in equity for the payment of those debts. Nor is the provision an equitable assignment on the part of the contractors of so much of the fund as may be necessary to pay such debts."

In Weisemair v. Buffalo, 57 Hun, 48, 32 N. Y. S. R. 755, 10 N. Y. Supp. 569, it was held that a provision for the retention of a percentage of the contract until three months after its completion was not for the benefit of the contractor, still less for that of his employees, but for the benefit of the city as security on the part of the contractor that the work done should remain or be kept in repair for the period named after its completion. It was a condition which the city might waive at its pleasure, and under which no other party could claim any rights.

On the 18th of November, 1904, Stewart and Abbot made a written assignment to Alexander M. Stewart and James C. Stewart of all moneys due and to become due to them from the city of Newark under their contract with the municipality. The question at issue between the parties was whether this assignment took precedence over the lien subsequently filed by the complainant. The learned vice chancellor held that it did, and for this reason advised a dismissal of the complainant's bill.

We concur in the conclusion reached by the vice chancellor, and have nothing to add to his discussion of the matters treated by him in his opinion. There is, however, one ground upon which the complainant rested its right to relief, and which was relied upon in the argument before us, which is not referred to by the vice chancellor in his opinion, viz., an alleged right conferred upon laborers and materialmen by the 8th section of the contract between the city and Stewart and Abbot. That section, after providing for the payment of 90 per cent of the final estimate, upon the completion of the work in accordance with the provisions of the contract, and its acceptance by the city, provides as follows: "The remaining 10 per centum of said final estimate shall be retained by said city for one year from date of said acceptance of the work, as a guarantee that the contractor has faithfully executed his contract, and shall be used by said city in making good any defects or making any repairs to the work executed under this contract which may be necessary. At the end of said one year the said 10 per centum, or such portion of it as may remain after making said repairs or remedying any defects, shall be paid to the contractor, after the party of the second part shall furnish the said board of street and water commissioners with satisfactory evidence that all persons who have done work or furnished materials under this agreement, and who may have theretofore given written notice to said board of any balance unpaid for work or materials furnished or done on said work, have been fully paid or satisfactorily secured, and in case such evi-

But in Lawrence v. Dawson, 34 App. Div. 211, 54 N. Y. Supp. 647, distinguishing Weisemair v. Buffalo, where there was a provision for the retention of a percentage in an agreement between the contractor and subcontractor, as well as in the original contract with the city, it was held that such former provision inured to the benefit of the materialman who had a claim against the subcontractor for materials furnished, when he had been induced by both parties to the subcontract to postpone enforcement of that claim, by representations that such percentage would be retained.

In Columbia Brick Co. v. District of Columbia, 1 App. D. C. 351, where there was a provision in a contract between a municipal corporation and a contractor, whereby the former reserved to itself the right to retain money in its hands until all materialmen were fully paid, it was held that the provision created no obligation in favor of materialmen not parties to the contract, which they could enforce as against the municipality.

In Jones v. Savage, 24 Misc. 158, 53 N. Y. Supp. 308, it was held that the retention of a certain percentage, by virtue of a provision in the contract, was for the benefit of the city, and so where the city completed the work upon abandonment by the contractor, at a cost in excess of the contract price, there was nothing to which liens of materialmen could attach.

And in Epeneter v. Montgomery County, 98 Iowa, 159, 67 N. W. 93, where a contract for the erection of a county building provided for payments at stated times of 90 per cent, and for payment of the remaining 10 per cent on the completion and acceptance of the work, and as soon thereafter as the county was assured against the existence of any mechanics' liens on said building, and further provided that if the contractors failed to complete the building within the contract time, the county should complete it at their expense, and deduct from any sum due on the contract the value of work or material furnished thereafter, it was held that no duty was enjoined upon the county to hold that 10 per cent for the benefit of subcontractors, but that the county had a right to consume the percentage reserved, in the completion of said building, if necessary. It was contended by counsel in Iowa Brick Co. v. Des Moines, 111 Iowa, 272, 82 N. W. 922, that Epeneter v. Montgomery County was authority for the contention that a city could waive such a provision in the contract, as it was for its sole benefit, but the court doubted that that case went to the extent claimed for it.

In McDonald v. New York, 29 Misc. 504, 62 N. Y. Supp. 72, it was held that, notwithstanding provisions in a contract for the retention by the city of money, where the claims of laborers or materialmen are filed with the city, the consolidation act is the only basis of such a lien.

Right as between materialmen or their assignees, where fund is still retained.

Where there was a provision in a contract with a city that the latter should reserve 15 per cent of amounts due until the completion of the work, it was held that a materialman whose claim was on file should have been paid in full as against other materialmen whose claims were not shown to have been prior in right. Iowa Brick Co. v. Des Moines, 111 Iowa, 272, 82 N. W. 922.

dence is not furnished as aforesaid, such amounts as may be necessary to meet the claims of the persons aforesaid may be retained from the money due the party of the second part under this agreement, and until the liabilities aforesaid shall be fully discharged or such notice withdrawn." The contention of the complainant is that, by virtue of this clause in the contract, the 10 per cent was retained for the protection of laborers and materialmen, including the complainant, and so, consequently, subject to lien by them, notwithstanding the assignment made by Stewart and Abbot.

Although the contention is plausible, no authority is cited in support of it, and it is opposed to earlier decisions both of the court of chancery and of this court. In the case of Grassmann v. Bonn, 30 N. J. Eq. 490, the litigation arose out of the work of improving a public road in Hudson county under a contract by which it was provided that so much of the money due to the contractors under the contract as might be considered necessary by the public authorities should be retained by them until any suits or claims against them for damages, or for errors in payment to workmen, or for material furnished, should have been settled, and evidence to that effect furnished to them. The contention was that this provision of the contract operated as an equitable assignment in favor of unpaid laborers and materialmen. It was held that the provision was probably intended for the indemnity of the public authorities against suits or claims for wages or the price of materials, which, though unobtainable, might nevertheless be brought against them; that it did not create a lien in favor of laborers and materialmen, but was intended as a means of coercion to compel the contractors to pay their debts contracted in connection with and for the work; that the public authorities were charged with no duty toward these classes of persons, and whether they would retain the fund or not was entirely at their option; and, finally, that the provision was not an equitable as-

And in Ross v. Beaumont Brick Co. 53 Tex. Civ. App. 469, 116 S. W. 643, where a fund was withheld by the city to pay claims of certain materialmen, under provisions of contracts authorizing the city, on final settlement, to retain such sum as might appear necessary to satisfy unpaid claims for labor and materials furnished for the work, it was held that the rights of the materialmen therein were superior to the right of an assignee of another materialman, under garnishment proceedings against the city.

Right as against assignee of fund.

A provision in a contract with a municipality that if the contractor fails to pay for labor done or materials furnished, the municipality may withhold moneys under the contract, and apply them to the payment or such debts, does not operate as an equitable assignment of the fund, nor does it deprive the contractor of his right of alienation; and his assignees, notwithstanding such provision, will be entitled to the moneys as against materialmen and laborers. Shannon v. Hoboken, 37 N. J. Eq. 123; Essex County v. Lindsley, 41 N. J. Eq. 189, 3 Atl. 391; Ross v. Beaumont Brick Co. supra.

But in Friedman v. Hampden County, 204 Mass. 494, 90 N. E. 851, it was held that under an interpretation of a provision in a contract that a certain percentage should be retained, read in the light of a statute requiring public contracting officers to obtain sufficient security for payment of the contractor and subcontractors for labor performed or furnished and for materials used in the construction or repair of public buildings, etc., third persons having claims for labor and materials furnished the contractor or subcontractor had rights in such fund prior to an assignee of the original contract,

And in Thorn & H. Lime & Cement Co. v. Citizens Bank, 158 Mo. 272, 59 S. W. 109, it was held that while a materialman has no legal right to a fund retained by the city under provisions of the contract, yet he has a right derived from the contract between the city and the contractor, on the faith of which credit was extended, to maintain a suit in equity to have such fund appropriated to the uses to which it was designated by the contract, and for which it was received by the city, and as this right is superior to the right of the contractor, it will be superior to the right of an assignee of the fund or judgment creditor of the contractor.

Right as against general creditors of contractor.

A percentage of a fund under a contract having been reserved for the payment of materialmen, they have, as to such percentage, paramount equity, and are entitled to have their claims paid out of it in preference to all other creditors on an equitable garnishment proceeding. St. Louis v. Keane, 27 Mo. App. 642.

A general creditor of a contractor cannot complain that a municipality exercises the power to withhold certain sums to pay materialmen and laborers as provided in the contract, because of the fact that its exercise was optional; and where, in accordance with the intention of the contractor and subcontractor, a fund was retained for the payment of subcontractors, the transaction will be treated as an equitable assignment of the fund, and will be applied to the payment of those subcontractors, to the exclusion of any other creditors of the original contractor. Luthy v. Woods, 6 Mo. App. 67.

signment on the part of the contractors of so much of the fund as might be necessary to pay such debts.

In the case of Shannon v. Hoboken, 37 N. J. Eq. 123, the litigation was over a contract for the repaving of a part of one of the streets of the city of Hoboken. It contained this provision: "And the said party of the second part [the contractor] . . . covenants and agrees to promptly pay for all labor done and material furnished on said work, and in case he fails so to do, . . . any money due or to grow due to said party of the second part may be used to pay for such labor and material, and the mayor and common council may order warrants drawn to the order of parties doing work or furnishing material, or may issue certificates to them, for the amounts due them. And the receipts of said parties shall be full discharge for the mayor and common council of the city of Hoboken in settlement with the party of the second part or his sureties." The contractor assigned moneys due him under the contract, and, after the assignment, claims for labor done and material furnished in the performance of the contract were presented to the municipality and payment therefor demanded. These laborers and materialmen claimed that they were entitled to be paid out of the funds in the hands of the city, notwithstanding the assignment, upon the ground that the covenant recited deprived the contractor of the power of transferring his claim. Vice Chancellor Van Fleet, before whom the case was heard, held the claim to be without substance, saying: "The covenant on which it rests merely authorizes the municipality . . . to withhold and appropriate the moneys earned under the contract. No beneficial interest is transferred, nor is the municipality made subject to any duty or liability. Such a covenant . . . does not render the municipality liable either at law or in equity, to the creditors of the contractor, nor does it operate as an equitable assignment of the fund to the creditors." This case subsequently came to this court on appeal, and the decree of the court of chancery was affirmed upon the opinion delivered by the vice chancellor. 37 N. J. Eq. 318.

In Essex County v. Lindsley, 41 N. J. Eq. 189, 3 Atl. 391, the litigation arose over a contract for the doing of the mason work of the new lunatic asylum which was being built by the county. The contract provided that "should any person or persons that have furnished materials for, or done any labor or work on, the building herein contracted for, present to the parties of the first part (the board of freeholders) any claim or claims for such materials, work, or labor, then the said parties of the first part shall have the right to withhold any and every one of the above mentioned payments, until such claim or claims so presented are settled and a receipt for the same delivered to the parties of the first part." The contractor assigned the money due to him under the contract to Lindsley. Subsequently claims were presented to the board of freeholders by laborers and materialmen for work done upon and materials furnished to the building. It was claimed that this provision of the contract operated as an assignment of all moneys earned by the contractor under the contract, for the benefit of such persons as should become the contractor's creditors in consequence of having furnished him with any of the means which he used in performing the contract, and that thereby the board became obligated to hold such funds for the benefit of such creditors until their debts were paid. Vice Chancellor Van Fleet, who also heard this cause, thus disposed of the claim: "I can find, in the language used by the parties, no glimpse of a purpose like that attributed to them by this construction. It is certain that no assignment is made by express words, nor am I able to find, in the language of this provision, the slightest indication that either of the parties supposed that it was possible for anything to occur which, without a further act on the part of . . . [the contractor], would operate to transfer his rights under the contract. His dominion over the money earned under the contract is left just as complete and as absolute as it would have been if this stipulation had formed no part of the contract, except in one event, namely, on the presentation of a claim for material or labor, the board of chosen freeholders shall have the right to withhold any moneys due until such claim shall be paid. They are not authorized to pay, but merely to withhold. . . . [The contractor], however, exercised his right to do with his own as he pleased while his dominion was complete, and before any attempt had been made to impound the moneys in the hands of the board of chosen freeholders. His act in that regard is not in violation of his contract. He has not even promised that he would not collect or assign the moneys earned under the contract. All that he has stipulated is that, on the presentation of a claim for material or labor, the board should, as against him, have a right to withhold, but, until a claim is presented, his power and dominion over the fund remain free and unfettered." Upon this reasoning he concluded that it must be held that the assignment was effectual to pass to Lindsley whatever rights the contractor had under the contract.

These decisions, we have already stated, are opposed to the contention made by the complainant, and that in the case of Shannon v. Hoboken is controlling. The reasoning of these decisions leads to the conclusion that the 10 per centum of the final estimate which is retained under the 8th section of the contract now under consideration passed under the assignment free from any liability to be subjected to a lien which might thereafter be filed with the municipality by a laborer or materialman.

The question whether the municipality may, notwithstanding the assignment to Stewart and Stewart, retain the 10 per centum until satisfactory evidence has been furnished to the board of street and water commissioners that all claims of laborers or materialmen of which notice was given to the municipality have been fully discharged, or until such notices have been withdrawn, is not involved in the present litigation, and we therefore express no opinion upon it.

The decree under review will be affirmed.

(157 N. C. 503, 73 S. E. 198.)

Master — minor employee — violation of agreement as to place of work.

1. A master who violates his agreement with the parent of a child entering his employ, not to let him leave his working place and go about machinery situated in another part of the plant, is liable to the parent for injury caused to the child by such machinery.

Same — contributory negligence — effect.

2. That a boy was negligent and disobeyed orders in going about his master's machinery will not absolve the master from liability to the parent for the boy's death caused by the machinery, if the master failed to use due care and diligence to keep his agreement with the father when the boy was hired out to him, not to let him go about the machinery.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence offered by plaintiff tends to prove that his son, the intestate, aged thirteen years, was killed in the engine room of defendants, situated on the west side of the French Broad river, about July 12, 1910, by falling on the belt connected with the engine. The evidence tends to prove that the boy was employed by defendants Willard & Son as a water carrier for the men engaged on the east side of the river in building a railroad track, and that on the west side of the river were situated all the engines and machinery for blasting and moving rock, etc. The evidence shows that at the time the boy was killed the engineer in charge of the engine was Raymond Turner, aged twenty. The boy was killed by falling on the belt. The belt threw him off between the belt and the wall. His skull was cracked, his leg broken, and he was mashed to pieces and died in four hours. The boy had often been seen playing around the belt by Turner, the engineer, and Correll, the foreman, and he was notified of the danger, but kept on playing around the belt. The evidence tends to show further that C. R. Willard knew of the boy's conduct, and that the engineer and foreman had repeatedly warned the boy. The foundation of plaintiff's action is the allegation that his son was non sui juris, inexperienced, and incapable of appreciating great danger, and, by reason of his youth and inexperience, careless in incurring danger; that he hired his son to defendants to work upon the east side of the river as a water carrier away from the dangerous machinery, and he should be protected from such dangers by the defendants. Plaintiff avers that this agreement was violated by defendants, and his son permitted to go in the engine house on the west side of the river, and to be around and about the machinery, in consequence of which he was killed.

The plaintiff does not base his claim upon any defective machinery, but upon a distinct violation by defendants of the contract of hiring. Upon the allegations of the complaint, the burden rests upon plaintiff to show a breach of the contract, and that it was the proximate cause of his son's death.

The plaintiff testifies that he consented to the employment of his son by defendants for the purpose of carrying water on the east side of the river; that he forbade them to let his son go on the other side, where the machinery was; that the foreman promised that his son would be kept at work on the east side; and that he would see to it.

It is well settled that the father may stipulate as to the kind of work his child may be employed in (unless forbidden by statute), and the consent of the parent that the child may be employed at one kind of labor is not consent that he be placed in another and a more dangerous kind of work. Bruswell v. Garfield Cotton Oil Mill Co. 7 Ga. App. 167, 66 S. E. 539. Thus, it was held that the fact that a parent hired his son as a "doffer boy" did not authorize the employer to change his work and place him in more dangerous environments. Hillsboro Cotton Mills v. King, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 518, 112 S. W. 132; Hendrickson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 311, 137 Ky. 562, 126 S. W. 117. The notes to this case are very instructive and contain many cases illustrating and supporting this view.

The sum and substance of the many cases cited in those notes are that it is a general rule that an employer putting a minor servant, against his parent's consent, to do work by which the child is injured, commits an actionable wrong for which the employer is liable, although there is no other evidence of negligence upon his part. Union P. R. Co. v. Fort, 17 Wall. 553, 21 L. ed. 739, and cases cited in Rose's notes annotating this case. And under such circumstances it is also held that the minor servant's contributory negligence is no defense to such action. Marbury Lumber Co. v. Westbrook, 121 Ala. 179, 25 So. 914, and cases cited. As illustrating this doctrine, we may refer to cases in ante bellum days, where slaves were hired out to perform certain kinds of work and within certain limits, and the owner was permitted to recover damages for a breach of the contract because of injury to the slave. Slocumb v. Washington, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 357; Spivy v. Farmer, 3 N. C. (2 Hayw.) 339.

In the brief of the learned counsel for the defendant it is contended:

1. That plaintiff failed to show that defendants violated any duty to plaintiff's intestate. The evidence, if believed, shows that defendants violated the contract of hiring.

2. That there is no evidence that any act or omission of defendant was the proximate cause of the boy's death. From the evidence it is a just inference which a jury may draw that if the defendants had carried out the agreement and kept the boy away from the machinery, or returned him to his father, the injury would not have occurred.

3. That all the evidence shows that the boy was guilty of negligence and disobedience of orders in going into the engine room, where he was killed. To guard against that was the very reason why the plaintiff restricted his child's employment, and required the defendants to confine him to the east side of the river. Under such circumstances, the defendants cannot avail themselves of such defense. Marbury Lumber Co. v. Westbrook, supra.

We do not mean to hold that the defendants became insurers of the intestate's life; but if the agreement be as testified to by plaintiff, it was the duty of defendants to use due diligence and care to keep him away from the machinery, and at the work he was hired to perform, or else to return him to his father.

It may be that the father waived the terms of the agreement and acquiesced in his son working on the west side of the river; but the burden would be on defendants to show that, unless the facts appear from the plaintiff's own evidence.

The judgment of nonsuit is set aside.
New trial.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

W. H. HUGHEY

v.

LOUISA WORNER et al., Appts.,

(124 Tenn. 725, 140 S. W. 1058.)

Husband and wife — separate estate — life insurance.
Insurance money collected by a widow

Note. — Life insurance policy in favor of married woman or its proceeds as her separate estate.

Cases like Houston v. Maddux, 179 Ill. 377, 53 N. E. 599, involving the question whether the policy or its proceeds are within an exemption statute, are not within the scope of the note. Nor does the note cover the question whether the payment by the husband of the premiums on a policy for the benefit of the wife constitutes a fraud on his creditors, which will enable them to reach the proceeds of the policy or a part thereof. So, the question of a married woman's capacity to assign her interest in a policy of insurance or its proceeds is not covered in this note.

The decision in HUGHEY v. WORNER, holding that money received by a married woman from a policy of life insurance upon the life of her first husband was her separate property, is in accord with the general rule, which, under the provisions in favor of married women seems to be that a policy of insurance taken out for the benefit of a married woman, or its proceeds, is her separate estate. This result is reached regardless of whether the policy is issued at the instance of the husband or of the wife.

Thus, in Williams v. Williams, 68 Ala. 405, it was held that the title to a policy of life insurance taken out by a husband for his wife's benefit, without her knowledge, and kept in force by him, vested in the wife at the time the policy was issued, and was her separate estate, so that where the benefit exceeded the value of her dower right, it constituted a bar to the assignment of further dower.

And where a statute provides that life insurance policies, when made payable to any married woman, shall be her sole and separate property, and shall inure to her separate use and benefit, a policy upon the life of the husband payable to the wife is her sole and separate property, regardless of the source from which the funds are derived for the payment of the premiums, and the husband has no claim upon the proceeds of the policy, except such as he derives from the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

upon the life of her deceased husband becomes her separate estate upon her remarriage, and she may will it free from the claims of her husband.

(November 17, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover from defendants property bequeathed to them by plaintiff's deceased wife. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. H. Phelan, Jr., and Trezevant, Bartels, & Trezevant, for appellants:

The insurance money became the separate estate of Mrs. Hughey, and she was en-terms of her will. Perkinson v. Clarke, 135 Wis. 584, 116 N. W. 229.

And where a statute provides "that any policy of insurance . . . on the life of any person, expressed to be for the benefit of a married woman, whether the same be effected by herself or her husband, or any other person on her behalf, shall inure to her separate use and benefit, and that of her children if any, independently of her husband and of his creditors and representatives," the husband cannot make a valid assignment of a policy taken out by him for his wife's benefit, although it is made payable to "his executors, administrators, or assigns," the latter being merely designated as trustees for the wife's benefit. Stokell v. Kimball, 59 N. H. 13.

So, where a statute provides that a policy of life insurance may be taken out by a married woman or her husband for her benefit, and that the benefit shall inure to her separate use and benefit, and the whole statute shows that it was intended to provide for the wife after her husband's death, the creditors of the husband and wife cannot subject a policy taken by the husband for his wife's benefit to the payment of their claims. Ellison v. Straw, 116 Wis. 207, 92 N. W. 1094.

And in Southern L. Ins. Co. v. Booker, 9 Heisk. 607, 24 Am. Rep. 344, where, by the express provisions of the insurance company's charter, the benefits of a policy of life insurance procured by a husband for his wife's benefit were made her separate property, the court said: "There is much force in the argument that the husband, in procuring a policy upon his own life for the benefit of his wife, is the real party,—that the wife is in reality not known. Yet, it is in the form of a contract with the wife in her own name, for her own benefit, and the husband, in procuring the contract, is treated as her agent; in this respect she is allowed to act as a feme sole, and the benefit of the contract becomes her separate right, in this case, by the express provisions of the defendant's charter."

And in Doull v. Doelle, 10 Ont. L. Rep. 411, where a widow claimed that the pro-titled to exercise the same power of disposition over it as a feme sole.

Southern L. Ins. Co. v. Booker, 9 Heisk. 607, 24 Am. Rep. 344; Scobey v. Waters, 10 Lea, 562; 21 Cyc. 1370-1371; Gosling v. Caldwell, 1 Lea, 454, 27 Am. Rep. 774.

The wife can, without assent of husband, make valid testamentary disposition of personally owned as separate estate.

ford v. Phelan, 120 Tenn. 597, 113 S. W. 365; Pritchard, Wills, § 86, p. 92.

Mr. James H. Malone, for appellee:

In a settlement of property upon a feme covert, if it be the intention to interfere with the marital rights of the husband, that intention must be expressed in the clearest and most unequivocal terms; and if a doubt exists as to such an intention, it must be resolved in favor of the marital right.

Wood v. Polk, 12 Heisk. 222; Eaves v. Gillespie, 1 Swan, 131; Houston v. Embry, 1 Sneed, 489; Meredith v. Owen, 4 Sneed, 228; Handwerker v. Diermeyer, 96 Tenn. 628, 36 S. W. 869; Shugart v. Shugart, 111 Tenn. 183, 102 Am. St. Rep. 777, 76 S. W.

ceeds of a life insurance policy taken out by the husband for her benefit were never owned by her during the lifetime of her husband, and that they could not therefore be considered her separate estate, it was held that such proceeds were her separate property by virtue of a statute enacting that the naming of the wife as beneficiary creates a trust in her favor, and of § 4, chap. 163, Rev. Stat. Ont. 1897, of the married women's property act, the provisions of which do not appear. The wife's attempt to prove that the property was not her separate estate was brought about by a desire to save the property from being taken under a judgment under which only her separate property could be taken.

So, in Hogaboom v. Hill, 8 Ont. W. Rep. 352, it was held that money received as a loan by a married woman on a policy of insurance issued to the husband before marriage, in which the wife was named as beneficiary, after marriage was, as between the wife and the creditors of a firm formed by her husband subsequent to the loan, her separate property.

In Scobey v. Waters, 10 Lea, 562, it was held that where a husband takes out a policy of insurance for the benefit of his wife, it is a provision made for her by the terms of which he excludes himself from the right of control over it, and that it is in the nature of a separate estate in the wife, over which she has the power of disposal.

In Hall v. Levy, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 360, 72 S. W. 263, where a husband had paid money to his wife which he had received from an endowment policy taken out by him for his wife's benefit, and she had loaned a part of the sum to a firm of which her husband was a member, it was held that, as against the creditors of such firm, the money was the wife's separate estate, the decision being placed upon the ground of gift by the husband, and also upon the ground that the proceeds were her separate property independently of the gift.

for the benefit of his wife is her separate property.

As has already been stated, property of the character under consideration is generally held to be the wife's separate estate, although the wife herself takes out the policy.

Thus, it was held in Weber Loper & Co. v. Paxton, 48 Ohio St. 286, 26 N. E. 1051, that where the wife insured her interest in her husband's life, the contract was her separate property, although the husband paid the premium; and it was held that his creditors had no claim against the policy unless it appeared that the payment of the premiums had the effect of withdrawing funds to which they were entitled.

So, in McQuitty v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 15 R. I. 573, 10 Atl. 635, it was held that a policy of insurance taken out by a married woman upon her life, which had an endowment feature, was within the purview of a statute providing that any policy of insurance which should not exceed $10,000 made by an insurance company on the life of any person, and expressed to be for the benefit of a married woman, whether effected by herself or by her husband, or by any other person on her behalf, should inure to her separate use and benefit, independently of her husband and of his creditors and representatives.

But it was held that, independently of this section, under other general provisions regulating the rights of married women, which do not specifically appear, a married woman could invest money which was a part of her separate estate in life insurance, and might therefore effect a valid policy. Ibid.

And in Fraternal Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Applegate, 7 Ohio St. 292, it was held that where the general law in relation to life insurance gave a married woman the right in her own name, "from her separate property, to cause to be insured for her sole use the life of her husband," and the act incorporating a company gave it power to issue a policy on the husband's life to a married woman in her name, and for her sole benefit, free from the claims of the husband's creditors, a policy issued to a married

A policy of insurance on the life of the husband for the benefit of the wife forms no exception to the marital rights of the husband.

Southern L. Ins. Co. v. Booker, 9 Heisk. 618, 24 Am. Rep. 344; Scobey v. Waters, 10 Lea, 551; Handwerker v. Diermeyer, 96 Tenn. 628, 36 S. W. 869.

Neill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case there was a controversy between the surviving husband and the sister of his deceased wife over certain items of personal property, consisting mainly of jewels and an insurance fund belonging to the wife, which she had deposited in bank. This fund had arisen under a policy which had been effected on the life of her first husband. The wife left a will by which she attempted to bequeath all of her property to her sister, to the exclusion of the husband, and he brought his bill in the Shelby county chancery court to have his rights declared and to recover the property. The chancellor decreed in favor of the husband as to all of the property, and from this decree the defendant appealed.

The rights of the parties should be settled upon the following principles:

1. Leaving out of view all other grounds, we are of the opinion that the insurance money or fund in question, deposited in bank, belonged to the wife as her separate estate, in the very nature of the property, arising, as it did, from an insurance effected on her first husband's life in favor of the wife. Prima facie such insurance was procured by the husband, or with his consent, as a settlement on the wife. We cannot suppose that she would raise such a fund on the life of her husband without his knowledge and consent. That such a fund is separate estate, see the following authorities: Scobey v. Waters, 10 Lea, 562, 563; Southern L. Ins. Co. v. Booker, 9 Heisk. 607, 24 Am. Rep. 344; 21 Cyc. pp. 1370, 1371. And see Gosling v. Caldwell, 1 Lea, 454, 27 Am. Rep. 774; 21 Cyc. p. 1370.

2. Being separate estate, the jus disponendi would exist, and the wife could dispose of it by will, so as to defeat the right which the husband would have to take the whole fund for life, with remainder to her children. It cannot be doubted, I think, that if the trust expressed on the face of the policy was 'for the benefit of my wife and our children as joint tenants;' or if it was 'for the benefit of my wife for life, with remainder to our children,' each would be equally within the act, and would be a good declaration of trust; and if each of those constructions of the words, 'for the benefit of my wife and our children,' is equally within the act, I do not see how the act can supply reasons for preferring one construction rather than the other. One of the reasons which led Mr. Justice Chitty to the view he took in Re Adam's Policy Trusts, supra, was that the benefit to the wife was expressed in the act to be for her separate use. I do not see how that throws any light upon the point under consideration; if those words were added to each of the phrases I have just mentioned, this would be wholly ineffectual to alter their construction."

woman in pursuance of these provisions was her separate property, and was beyond the reach of the husband or his creditors.

The English decisions upon the question under consideration are not in entire harmony.

In Ex parte Dever, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 660, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 552, where, upon application of the husband acting for his wife, a policy was issued payable to the wife for her sole use, the master of the rolls expressed his opinion that the amount withdrawn by the wife was her separate property; but Bowen, L. J., and Fry, L. J., expressed a contrary opinion, but all agreed that it was not necessary to decide the point in the case before them.

In Re Adam's Policy Trusts, L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 525, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 642, 48 L. T. N. S. 727, 31 Week. Rep. 810, where the policy was made for the benefit of insured's wife and children, the court expressed an opinion that, by virtue of the words "separate use" in the married women's property act, the wife took a life interest only, with remainder to the children, but as the wife predeceased the husband, it was not necessary to decide the point.

In Re Seyton, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 511, where a policy upon the husband's life was taken out for the benefit of his wife and children, it was held that the widow and children took the benefit as joint tenants, notwithstanding that the benefit to the wife was expressed in the married women's act to be for her separate use. The court said: "But even if the act and policy are to be read together as one declaration of trust, I am unable to assent to the view that the wife takes the whole fund for life, with remainder to her children. It cannot be doubted, I think, that if the trust expressed on the face of the policy was 'for the benefit of my wife and our children as joint tenants;' or if it was 'for the benefit of my wife for life, with remainder to our children,' each would be equally within the act, and would be a good declaration of trust; and if each of those constructions of the words, 'for the benefit of my wife and our children,' is equally within the act, I do not see how the act can supply reasons for preferring one construction rather than the other. One of the reasons which led Mr. Justice Chitty to the view he took in Re Adam's Policy Trusts, supra, was that the benefit to the wife was expressed in the act to be for her separate use. I do not see how that throws any light upon the point under consideration; if those words were added to each of the phrases I have just mentioned, this would be wholly ineffectual to alter their construction."

And this case was followed in Re Davies, Policy Trusts [1892], 1 Ch. 90, 61 L. J. Ch. N. S. 650, 66 L. T. N. S. 104, where the proceeds of a policy taken out by the husband under the provisions of the married women's property act, for the benefit of his wife and children, were held to be the property of the widow and children as joint tenants.

succeed to it as husband, if it were not so disposed of. Fettiplace v. Gorges (1789) 3 Bro. Ch. 8; s. c. 1 Ves. Jr. 46, 1 Revised Rep. 79; Taylor v. Meads, 4 De G. J. & S. 507, 605, 5 New Reports, 348, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 203, 11 Jur. N. S. 166, 12 L. T. N. S. 6, 13 Week. Rep. 394; Schouler, Wills, 1st ed. § 51; Underhill, Wills, § 121, p. 172. And see our own cases as follows: Perry v. Gill, 2 Humph. 218, 223; Williford v. Phelan, 120 Tenn. 589, 597, 113 S. W. 365; also Pritchard, Wills, § 86, p. 92.

3. The case of Hays v. Bright, 11 Heisk. 325, interposes no objection. The settlement under consideration in that case confined the power of disposition to sale. This necessarily excluded the power of disposition by will.

4. The cases of Hamrico v. Laird, 10 Yerg. 222; Brown v. Brown, 6 Humph. 127; Hardwerker v. Diermeyer, 96 Tenn. 619, 36 S. W. 869; and Weakley v. Woodard, 2 Tenn. Ch. App. 589-590, likewise interpose no objection. These were cases wherein it appeared the wife died intestate. The law is clear that the husband will in such cases take her separate property, unless the instrument creating it cuts off his right beyond her death.

5. Although the insurance was collected on a policy issued on the life of a former husband, and the quality of separate estate usually ceases, or is suspended during widowhood, yet, upon the occurrence of a subsequent marriage, it revives. Pooley v. Webb, 3 Coldw. 603; Beaufort v. Collier, 6 Humph. 492, 44 Am. Dec. 321; Shouler, Husb. & W. § 197.

6. The chancellor's decree was erroneous as to the insurance money deposited in bank, and will be reversed to that extent. As to the other personal property, the decree will be affirmed.

7. Divide the costs equally.

Mr. James W. Carr for respondent.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a controversy over the custody of a child now about eight years old. The defendant, the father of the child, has appealed to this court from an order of the superior court for Kitsap county, denying his petition for the modification of the decree rendered by that court, May 20, 1910, in this case, divorcing the plaintiff from him, in so far as that decree deprived him of the custody of this child. tions of the divorce decree brought here by this record relate to the monthly allowance for support of the plaintiff and the child and to the custody of the child. It is apparent, however, from other parts of the record before us, that the divorce was granted upon the ground of the cruelty of the defendant to the plaintiff. By the terms of the decree, the child was to remain the ward of the court until further order, and the court then placed it in the temporary custody of its grandparents, the father and mother of the plaintiff. This was done evidently upon the theory that the father was not a proper person to care for the child because of his acts of cruelty to the mother, and that the mother was not a proper person to have the custody of the child because of her then weakened mental condition. The placing of the child in the custody of the grandparents did not deprive the mother of its society, since she was then, and expected to continue, living with the grandparents, to whom the support money, both for her and the child, was by the decree directed to be paid. The decree gave the defendant the right to visit the child and to have the child visit him at reasonable times. Thereafter, in July, 1910, the plaintiff was adjudged insane by the superior court for Kitsap county, and committed to the Western Washington Hospital for the Insane, at Steilacoom. Thereafter defendant filed his petition for the custody of the child, and to be relieved from paying to its grandparents the allowance for its and the mother's support. The court then appointed James W. Carr as guardian ad litem, to represent the plaintiff upon the hearing of the petition, and thereupon an answer to the petition was filed by him. On March 9, 1911, over nine months after the rendering of the original decree denying the defendant the custody of the child, the issues thus made came on for trial. We note the length of this period between the granting of the original decree and this hearing, because it is upon the conditions existing during this period that the rights of the defendant to the child largely depend. That is, he must show such changed conditions and meritorious qualifications on his part, after the date of the decree, to properly care for the child, as will overcome the presumption against him to the contrary from the decree at the time of its rendition.

The evidence produced upon the hearing has all been brought here by statement of facts, and from it the following appears: The defendant has a good home in a good residence district in the city of Seattle. This home consists of a well-equipped residence which, with the grounds and his shop on the back part thereof, is worth from $12,- 000 to $15,000, and is within a short distance of a public school. He has lived in this home for many years. It represents the accumulation of his frugality and industry as a mechanic and a manufacturer, in a small way, of a saw filing and setting device, which is his own invention. His wife lived at this home with him until the separation, when she went to the home of her parents in Kitsap county, and soon thereafter commenced this action for divorce. After the separation, he had a middle-aged woman at his home as housekeeper, who, as such, took care of his home for about six months. This woman testified to his good behavior and kindly disposition, especially to his kindly treatment of his child, it being there to visit the father for several days at one time during that period. She also testified that he was a liberal and good provider for the home. This housekeeper ceased to work for the defendant upon his niece coming to live with him, which was about the last of August, 1910. Thereupon his niece became his housekeeper, and has remained such ever since. She is a young woman about twenty years old. She is the oldest of a family of several children, and has had considerable experience in assisting in the care and raising of her younger brothers and sisters. It is very evident from the testimony of her neighbors, who are well acquainted with her, that she is a very competent housekeeper, and would be a suitable person to assist in the care of the child. The arrangement between her and the defendant seems to contemplate that she stay with him indefinitely. A nephew of the defendant also lives with him. These three live together as a family. This niece testifies that the defendant is of kindly disposition, and that he provides well for his home. Also that he spends his time at his home when not at his work. Two other women who live near the defendant, and who are evidently quite well acquainted with him and his niece, testify to his kindly disposition towards the members of his family, and also to the competency of his niece as a housekeeper and one suited to assist in the care of his child. Three men who are well acquainted with the defendant and of his habits generally, though not knowing much of his home life, testify that he is industrious and temperate, and of good reputation. All of this testimony, touching the habits, disposition, and mode of life of the defendant, relates to his conduct since the granting of the decree of divorce, when he was deprived of the custody of his child. It is plain from the whole testimony that he loves his child very much, and that the child has an equal affection for him. At the time of the hearing, the mother was still in the hospital for the insane, and the child in the custody of its grandparents. During the taking of the testimony upon this hearing, counsel for the defendant attempted to show the suitability of the defendant to have the custody of his child, by showing his disposition and mode of life as it existed prior to the granting of the divorce; but upon objection of the guardian ad litem for the plaintiff, the court declined to receive evidence so showing. There was no competent evidence offered in contradiction of these witnesses.

In order, then, to determine the defendant's right to the child at this time, we have the changed condition of the plaintiff, who is no longer in a condition that she can possibly have the comfort and society of her child, and the undisputed evidence of these witnesses, which, standing alone, clearly shows the fitness of the defendant to have the care and custody of his child. Were it not for the presumption arising against him from the decree of the divorce, in effect adjudging that he was not at that time a suitable person to have the custody of the child, there would now seem to be no question whatever as to his rights in that regard. It is not an easy matter to measure the weight of the presumption against the defendant as to his fitness to have the care of his child, arising from the decree adjudging him to be unfit at the time of its rendition. Of course, that is not a presumption which he could overcome by good conduct on his part for a short period of time following the entry of the decree; but it seems to us that his good conduct of the nature undisputedly shown by this evidence, covering a continuous period of nine months following the entry of that decree, is sufficient to overcome the presumption arising against him from the decree at this time, giving to that decree every presumption it is entitled to as establishing his unfitness at the time of its rendition. We are not advised of the nature of the defendant's shortcomings at and prior to that time. At the instance of the guardian ad litem, the court closed the door to inquiry by defendant's counsel upon that question. Under such circumstances, we are not justified in presuming that plaintiff's faults were so serious that they have not become cured by this nine months of good conduct, at least sufficiently to call for a modification of the decree in that particular.

The guardian ad litem seems to wage this contest, in some degree at least, upon the theory that these grandparents have some right to the custody of this child. This is wholly untenable. They were only given the custody of the child as the agent of the court, and even then only temporarily, with the full knowledge that the child might be taken from them at any time. The legal right of the father to the custody of this child, since the mother is insane, and therefore cannot enjoy its society, is beyond question, unless the father is clearly unfit to have its custody. As was said in Re Neff, 20 Wash. 652, 655, 56 Pac. 383, 384: "He has the natural and legal right to the custody and control of the children, unless so completely unfit for such duties that the welfare of the children themselves imperatively demanded another disposition of their custody." In this case the grandparents have the custody of the child by authority of the order of the court, not because of any inherent right they possess to have such custody. Lovell v. House of the Good Shepherd, 9 Wash. 419, 43 Am. St. Rep. 839, 37 Pac. 660; Carey v. Hertel, 37 Wash. 27, 79 Pac. 482. Of course, it cannot be seriously contended that this is not an open question. It would be so, even though the decree of divorce had not disposed of the child temporarily. The possibility of changed conditions after such a decree necessarily leaves the custody of children an open question.

No one can read the testimony in this record, relating to the habits and disposition of this defendant during the nine months following the rendition of the divorce decree depriving him of the custody of this child, without concluding that he is suitable in every way to have its custody and rearing, unless it can be said such showing is overcome by the presumptions against him arising from the decree, holding that then he was not suitable to have the child's custody. We think that this showing so clearly overcomes that presumption that the learned trial court was in error in declining to modify the decree as prayed for. We do not mean a modification now made in conformity with these views shall close the question of his suitability to have the custody of the child any more than the decree of divorce closed the question as against him. Should the wife become cured of her present affliction, so that it becomes practical for her to enjoy the society of the child, it may be that her rights will then call for another change. Or, should the defendant become unsuitable, that may also call for another change. But, as conditions existed at the time of this hearing, with no one having an inherent legal right to the child other than defendant, and his suitability therefor being shown as we have indicated, we are of the opinion that he should be awarded the custody of the child, subject to such changes as subsequent events may dictate.

The order of the learned trial court is reversed, with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion. The defendant will be relieved of the burden of paying allowance to the grandparents, except for the period the child remains in their custody. In view of the circumstances of this case, the defendant will recover no costs upon this appeal, and will pay to the guardian ad litem the costs incurred by him upon this appeal, including an attorney's fee of $50.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

MRS. R. A. JONES.

(170 Ala. 611, 54 So. 500.)

Evidence — amount of damages — opinion.

A passenger deprived of the use of his

Note. — Right of owner of baggage to testify as to its value in an action for its loss.

An observer, after detailing such facts as fairly exhaust his power of statement, may, if sufficiently familiar with property to make his inference relevant, state his estimate of its value. 17 Cyc. 108.

Few cases like that of CENTRAL R. Co. v. JONES, involving the objection to opinion evidence, have been found which pass upon the question of the right of the plaintiff or owner to testify as to the value of the articles lost. The cases which do determine this question hold with the JONES CASE, that the evidence is admissible as against the objection mentioned.

A witness need not be an expert in order to testify to the value of articles of jewelry taken from baggage, and he may testify if he has any knowledge of such value. CENTRAL R. Co. v. Wolff, 74 Ga. 664.

So, parties who have examined clothing which has been injured through the negligence of a carrier of baggage, and who are familiar with the value of such articles, may state their opinions as to the proportion of damage done by the injury. Withey v. Pere Marquette R. Co. 141 Mich. 412, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352, 113 Am. St. Rep. 533, 104 N. W. 773, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 948.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Vancil, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 21 S. W. 303, involving an action for a loss of baggage containing wearing apparel, the court declared that there was no market value for such property, and that in such case the opinions of witnesses familiar with the facts, together with the facts and conditions, are admissible, to be judged by the jury, and that therefore the plaintiff could testify what baggage by the carrier's negligence may, in an action to hold the carrier liable for the damages thereby caused him, state to the jury what the possession of the baggage would have been worth to him during the time of delay.

(February 2, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for delay in the delivery of baggage alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. London & Fitts, for appellant:

Plaintiff's opinion as to the amount of damages sustained was inadmissible.

Young v. Cureton, 87 Ala. 727, 6 So. 352; Chandler v. Bush, 84 Ala. 102, 4 So. 207; Montgomery & W. P. R. Co. v. Varner, 19 Ala. 185; Hames v. Brownlee, 63 Ala. 277; Alabama & F. R. Co. v. Burkett, 42 Ala. 83; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Landers, 135 Ala. 504, 33 So. 482; Brandon v. Progress Distilling Co. 167 Ala. 365, 52

the value of the use of the articles would have been to her during the delay in delivery, for the purpose of assisting the jury, although the testimony would not be binding upon them.

So, in Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. v. McCarty, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 514, 94 S. W. 178, it not appearing that the strict rule of market value could be made to apply to the articles lost, the court held that the plaintiff's wife, who accompanied the baggage, might testify as to the value of the articles; and this as against the objection that her testimony failed to show that she was qualified to speak as to the market value, and failed to show that the articles lost were secondhand goods, so as to warrant the application of any other rule than that of market value.

In some of the cases which arose before the passing of the rule forbidding a party to be a witness in his own cause, it was objected that this rule would be violated by the admission of testimony of the kind involved in this note; and there was a conflict of opinion as to whether the objection should prevail.

The Massachusetts court has held that although the plaintiff has no other evidence on the question, he cannot testify as to the contents and value of baggage lost through negligence, since such a case comes within the rule forbidding a party to be a witness in his own case. Snow v. Eastern R. Co. 12 Met. 44. The court declared that the exception to the rule, which permits the owner to testify in case of robbery, upon the ground of necessity in that he alone has knowledge of the facts, does not apply in the case of the loss of baggage through negligence.

And in Garvey v. Camden & A. R. Co.

So. 640; Staples v. Steed, 167 Ala. 241, 52 So. 646.

Messrs. Gaston & Pettus for appellee.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by a lady passenger against a common carrier, to recover damages sustained by her on account of the carrier's delay in delivering her baggage, in violation of its duty to promptly deliver the same in accordance with its contract of carriage. The only damages sought were those in consequence of the delay in delivery. The period of delay was about ten days in length.

Plaintiff, by her contract, was a passenger from Birmingham, Alabama, to the city of New York. Her route as per her contract with appellant was from Birmingham, Alabama, to Savannah, Georgia, over the appellant's line of railroad, and from Savannah to New York by a steamer. The appellant's agent sold her a through ticket, which included, as incident thereto, the carriage of her baggage, which consisted of her wearing apparel for her trip and her visit to New York. In consequence of the delay in delivering her baggage, she was without change of necessary dress for ten days, except such as she of necessity had to purchase or obtain elsewhere. The evidence tended to show that she suffered some damages, such as physical pain, inconvenience, and mental worry, on account of the failure to deliver her baggage promptly.

During the examination of plaintiff as a witness in her own behalf, her counsel propounded to her the following question: "What would these goods in your baggage have been worth to you the time you were out of the use of your baggage?" To this question the defendant objected, on the ground that it was a question for the jury, and not for the witness's opinion. The court overruled the objection and allowed the witness to answer. The correctness of this ruling is the only assignment of error insisted on in argument. The witness answered that in her judgment it was about $500.

4 Abb. Pr. 171, 1 Hilt. 280, following the last case, it was held that necessity alone does not justify making an exception to the rule and that, to make the testimony as to value admissible, there must be fraud, mere negligence not being sufficient.

In Johnson v. Stone, 11 Humph. 419, it was held that the rule should not be extended beyond actual necessity, and that it should be confined to such articles as are embraced within the general name of "baggage."

And it is held in Whitesell v. Crane, 8 Watts & S. 369, that on the ground of necessity the plaintiff was competent not only to specify the articles contained in the trunk, but to prove the value of them. The court said that the value of merchandise, bearing, as it does, a determinate price in the market, might be more readily estimated from description than the more uncertain value of clothing in every degree of wear, which the owner would be better able to estimate than a disinterested witness, who must, after all, found his judgment on the description which the owner may choose to give; and that since it is as easy to give a false description as to overstate the value, the plaintiff's testimony as to the latter should be admitted.

But the Ohio court has taken the view that the doctrine of necessity should be extended so as to entitle the owner to testify as to the contents and value of his lost baggage; but it was stated that there was no intention to carry the principle further than to such articles as are ordinarily carried in a traveling bag or trunk, and the whole opinion discusses the matter from the standpoint of wearing apparel. Mad River & L. E. R. Co. v. Fulton, 20 Ohio, 318.

And the Alabama court, disapproving Snow v. Eastern R. Co. supra, goes still further and holds that where baggage is lost by the carrier, the owner is, propter necessitatem rei, entitled to testify as to the contents and value. Douglass v. Montgomery & W. P. R. Co. 37 Ala. 638, 79 Am. Dec. 76.

It is held in Illinois that the law permits a party to be a witness in his own cause for the purpose of proving the contents and value of baggage, where he cannot adduce other evidence of these facts; but that where it is clear that the value could have been proved by another, and that no effort to do so was made, the plaintiff's own testimony on the subject cannot be admitted. Parmelee v. McNulty, 19 Ill. 556.

The rule of the last case was applied in Davis v. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. 22 Ill. 278, 74 Am. Dec. 151, in which the court held the plaintiff not entitled to testify as to the value of the contents of the trunk, since by a description of them any dealer in those articles could have established their value. This is held to be such "other evidence" as obviates the necessity for testimony of the plaintiff on the point, and therefore renders his testimony inadmissible. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Copeland, 24 Ill. 332, 76 Am. Dec. 749; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Taylor, 24 Ill. 323.

It was held in La Compagnie Generale Transatlantique v. Persaglio, 91 C. C. A. 610, 165 Fed. 638, that a steamer passenger, the value of the clothing of whose family did not admit of very accurate proof, might, in an action for the loss thereof against the steamship company, testify as to the value of the clothing, notwithstanding it appeared that his wife bought the articles and that he could not tell the

It was at an early date ruled in this state that a witness should not be allowed to state his opinion as to the amount of damages the plaintiff or the witness sustained, or was entitled to recover, in consequence of a given act or omission, the basis of the suit. Montgomery & W. P. R. Co. v. Varner, 19 Ala. 185. In that case the witness was allowed to testify as to the amount of damages done to land by the construction of a railroad thereon. This was held error. This rule has been applied to a great number of subsequent cases, some of which were actions for personal injuries, some for injuries to live stock, and some actions ex contractu, as for breaches of contracts. In the case of Young v. Cureton, 87 Ala. 727, 6 So. 352, it was ruled that a party could not testify as to the amount of damages he sustained by the breach of the contract on which he had sued. The reason assigned for the rule is that to allow such statements would be to substitute the witness's opinion or conclusion for that of the jury, whose exclusive province it is to draw the inferences and conclusions from the facts and circumstances in evidence.

The general rule, of course, is that witnesses must depose to facts, and cannot be allowed to give their opinions founded on these facts, or the inferences or deductions which they draw from them. To this general rule, however, there are many exceptions, as where the subject involves expert evidence, questions as to value, etc.

And in Parmelee v. Raymond, 43 Ill. App. 609, the court disposed of the objection that the plaintiff was not competent to testify as to the value of the articles lost, with the statement that they were mostly toilet articles and wearing apparel in common use, and that everyone is presumed to know the value of articles in common use, and it is not necessary to call a dealer to testify as to the worth of such things. This case is not very strong on the point, and becomes less so when it is noted that the court had previously declared in its opinion that some evidence was admitted which ought not to have been, but that the plaintiff was clearly entitled to a verdict for some amount, and that the evidence properly admitted fairly warranted the verdict rendered. This case was followed without discussion in Hebard v. Riegel, 67 Ill. App. 584, holding that the plaintiff was presumed to know the value of the trunk and contents, and that therefore she could testify thereto.

It was declared in Block v. The Trent, 18 La. Ann. 664, that testimony of the plaintiff as to the contents and value of a trunk lost by a carrier, while admissible in 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 440 et seq.; 1 Whart. Ev. §§ 509 et seq.

Mr. Greenleaf says that the "opinion rule" of evidence is based on the thought that the opinion is superfluous and unnecessary, and should not be brought into the case, because, if the opinion of that witness is allowed, then all persons having the same knowledge as the witness could be brought in to state their opinion, and the trial would thus be encumbered, without adding any essential data not already before the jury.

Mr. Wharton says: "When we enter on the discussion of the admissibility of opinion, we strike a topic which is embarrassed by much ambiguity of terms." Anyone who will attempt to examine the texts and adjudicated cases on this subject will be overwhelmed not only as to "ambiguity of terms," but also as to the direct conflict of opinions and decisions upon the subject. The condition of the authorities on the subject is little better than a state of anarchy. There are, however, some abstract principles of law and of evidence as to which the authorities all agree, and which may be looked to in passing upon the question of opinion evidence in concrete cases. Among these are that, when the opinion sought is a mere "shorthand rendering" of the facts, then the opinion can be given, subject to cross-examination as to the facts upon which it is based; that when language is inadequate to state the facts of a concrete case to the jury, and they can common-law proceedings under proper limitations, is prohibited by the provisions of the Louisiana Code.

In Nolan v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 39 Mo. 114, the question was governed by an early statute providing that when baggage has been lost, the owner shall recover the value thereof, and may himself be a witness to prove the contents and their value.

In Battle v. Columbia, N. & L. R. Co. 70 S. C. 329, 49 S. E. 849, the objection that the plaintiff should not have been allowed to testify as to the contents of the trunk was disposed of merely with the remark that the objection was made under a misconception of the facts, as the trial court ruled that while the plaintiff could not testify as to the contents, it permitted him, after his wife, in whose possession the trunk was at the time of the loss, had testified as to the contents, to testify as to the value of the articles therein contained.

As to the admissibility of opinion of a witness as to the damaging effect of libel or slander, see the note in 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1119.

be described only by the effect produced upon the mind of the witness, his opinion may be rendered. A witness may testify that he loaned a slave. A loan is a fact, a compound one, and not a conclusion. Cole v. Varner, 31 Ala. 249. Likewise, it is not necessary for a witness to be an expert to enable him to give his opinion as to a matter depending upon special knowledge, when he states the facts upon which he bases his opinion. But the rule, as before stated, is different as to matters upon which the jurors themselves can form opinions if the facts or data are given them.

This court has said that the most ignorant witnesses may be permitted to state the fact of disease, when open to the perception of the senses (Milton v. Rowland, 11 Ala. 732); that the apparent condition of the physical system as to health or sickness is certainly a matter of fact (Bennett v. Fall, 26 Ala. 605). In such cases, if the observations of the witnesses do not justify their assertions, it is the office of a cross-examination to show this. Blackman v. Johnson, 35 Ala. 255; Barker v. Coleman, 35 Ala. 221.

Though a nonexpert witness would not be allowed to testify that a patient had malarial or typhoid fever, yet he could testify that a person was ill or had fever. Dominick v. Randolph, 124 Ala. 562, 27 So. 481.

At one time opinion evidence as to value was not admissible; but that rule has now been departed from, says Mr. Greenleaf, except by the court of New Hampshire. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 441, 442. Witnesses who have sufficient knowledge of the facts may testify as to the value of property. In fact, one of the reasons assigned why a witness should not be allowed to testify as to the amount of damages done to land or personalty, or that resulted from the breach of the contract, is that the witness should be required to testify as to the value of the property before and after, or without and with the injury or wrong complained of. Hames v. Brownlee, 63 Ala. 277; Ladd v. Ladd, 121 Ala. 583, 25 So. 627; 3 Mayfield's Digest, pp. 492, 493.

While the evidence offered and allowed in this case was not as to the value of the goods, but was as to the value of the use of same during the time they were wrongfully kept from the plaintiff by the defendant, which was the basis of the cause of action, this evidence we think was admissible, and not subject to the objection interposed by the defendant.

The evidence allowed in this case we deem much freer from objection than similar evidence held proper in the case of South & North Ala. R. Co. v. McLendon, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

63 Ala. 266. That was an action to recover damages for personal injuries, including loss of time, etc. In that case the court, speaking through Stone, J., said: "Some of the answers of the witnesses are clumsily expressed; but, properly construed, we think they are free from error. We note the following: 'In consequence of loss of time, and physical disability from the injuries, she had been prevented from earning money by her labor, and she had been injured $50 within the four months next after the fall from the mare, by reason of and in consequence of the hurts caused by the fall from the mare.' This is, in substance, an assertion that her labor during that time would have been worth $50. Parker v. Parker, 33 Ala. 459."

On these authorities we hold that there was no error in allowing the question objected to, nor in the refusal to exclude the answer.

It is argued in this case that the question and answer substituted the opinion of the witness for that of the jury as to the amount of damages. The record answers this argument, by showing that the witness testified that the value of the use of the goods was $500, while the jury found only $150.

Affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

MARY J. ATWOOD et al.

v.

FRANK G. ATWOOD, Appt.

(84 Conn. 169, 79 Atl. 59.)

Evidence — opinion — condition of sick person.

1. A nonexpert familiar with the facts may express the opinion that, on the day when a deed was signed by a sick person, he was so ill as to be "beyond asking him anything, and in a condition to know nothing really."

Evidence — unresponsive answer — materiality.

2. An answer which is relevant and material to the issue, although unresponsive,

Note. — Opinion evidence by nonexpert as to the contractual or testamentary capacity of another.

The cases relating to such evidence from attesting witnesses have been excluded. The subject excludes expert evidence, and thus the cases relating to the testimony of physi-should not be stricken out when the witness is competent.

Appeal — unresponsive evidence — cumulation.

3. It is not prejudicial error to refuse to strike out unresponsive evidence, if it subsequently comes in, in due course, from other witnesses.

Evidence — opinion — condition of sick person.

4. A witness may state that a person who signed a deed while ill was not capable of doing business or making any contract or agreement, as an opinion as to general mental condition and the degree of mental incapacity.

Same — knowledge of facts — materiality.

5. Testimony of one alleged to have con-cians have been excluded, notwithstanding some such cases examined seemed to indicate that the physician was regarded as occupying the same position as a nonprofessional witness.

The function of a witness is to state facts, rather than opinions and his inference that a fact exists because he has formed in his mind, by a process of reasoning, an affirmative impression as to its existence, is in most connections excluded. 17 Cyc. 25.

Such opinion evidence involves mixed questions of law and fact. The position of the courts that exclude such evidence is well stated in Walker v. Walker, 34 Ala. 469, a case relating to the testimony of a physician,—a class of cases in general excluded from this note,—as follows: "Capacity to make a will is not a simple question of fact. It is a conclusion which the law draws from certain facts as premises, hence it is improper to ask and obtain the opinion of even a physician as to the capacity of anyone to make a will. Under our system that question was addressed to the jury."

And in Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 398, another case involving medical testimony, the question is discussed as follows: "What is sufficient capacity to transact business or to make a will is a matter of law, depending somewhat upon the nature of the business. A witness may not correctly apprehend the rule of law, and if he uses such expressions, may be misled himself or may mislead the jury. Hence, the question should be framed so as to require him to state the measure of the testator's capacity in his own language, and by such ordinary terms or forms of expression as will best convey his own ideas of the matter."

On the other hand, such evidence has been regarded as a manner of stating the degree of mental capacity, and as such receivable. This position is well stated in Hayes v. Candee, 75 Conn. 131, 52 Atl. 826, infra, as follows: "In the case at bar the question, 'Was Mrs. Spencer capable of making a deed of land?' may be fairly regarded as calling either for an opinion as to her legal capacity to make a deed, or merely for one as to her general mental condition and the veyed real estate while ill, that he did not learn of the conveyance until a short time before beginning action to set aside the deed, is material on the question of his mental incapacity to execute the deed.

Same — grantor's declaration — absence of deed.

6. One alleged to have conveyed real estate while ill is not estopped by the deed to testify that he gave no paper or any kind of deed, as bearing on the question of his mental capacity at the time; nor is the evidence immaterial upon that issue.

(March 8, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to set degree of her mental weakness. . . . In the latter point of view it would be clearly admissible." In still other cases it has been regarded as receivable from necessity.

Contracts and deeds.

In Kilgore v. Cross, 1 McCrary, 144, 1 Fed. 578, in an action to set aside a contract on the ground that plaintiff was not of sound mind at the time of entering into the same, opinion evidence by witnesses who had laid a basis for this opinion, as to the capacity of such person to transact business, was held competent.

And in Woodcock v. Johnson, 36 Minn. 217, 30 N. W. 894, in an action to set aside a deed on the ground that the grantor was incompetent to make it, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the grantor to transact business during the two weeks before the time of the execution of the deed was held competent.

In Beller v. Jones, 22 Ark. 92, it does not clearly appear what the testimony of the witnesses was, but from the opinion it seems that they expressed opinions as to the capacity of a person to make a contract, and this was held competent from witnesses who had laid a basis for their opinion.

In Scalf v. Collin County, 80 Tex. 514, 16 S. W. 314, in an action to set aside a deed, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the grantor to understand the nature and effect of such deed was held competent.

But in Mills v. Cook, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 57 S. W. 81, in an action brought by a grantor to set aside a deed on the ground of insanity, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the grantor, at the time she executed the conveyance, to contract and make conveyance of lands, and appreciate and understand contracts, was held incompetent.

No objection seems to have been raised in Smith v. Smith, 117 N. C. 326, 23 S. E. 270, as to opinion evidence that the grantor in a deed sought to be set aside was a good business man, clear headed and very accurate.

Neither does any question seem to have aside a conveyance alleged to have been made by plaintiff while ill. Affirmed.

Statement by Wheeler, J.:

On April 17, 1901, the plaintiff Mrs. Atwood was the owner in fee of the property in suit. On April 1, 1901, Mrs. Atwood became ill with typhoid fever, and her mind during her illness seriously affected; and, when she was incapable of managing her affairs and not competent to make a deed or comprehend what she was doing, the defendant caused to be drawn a deed of said premises, took it and a notary with him, on April 17, 1901, to her house, and then the defendant took her hand and made the cross which appears over her signature to said deed above the letter "J." Mrs. Atwood never signed said instrument otherwise. One of the two witnesses to said instrument was not present when said cross was placed on said instrument, and did not know that she was signing her name as a witness. The notary asked Mrs. Atwood if it was her free act and deed, and she made no intelligible response. The notary signed as one of the witnesses. Except as stated, the acknowledgment was in due form. Mrs. Atwood knew nothing of said instrument until seven years thereafter. There was no consideration for said instrument and no delivery thereof. On December 5, 1907, Mrs. Atwood, without knowledge of said instrument, conveyed said premises to Lillian A. Allen by warranty deed. The rulings on evidence involved in the decision been raised as to the admissibility of such evidence, in McLeary v. Morment, 84 N. C. 235.

In Clum v. Barkley, 20 Wash. 103, 54 Pac. 962, it was held that a refusal to receive opinion evidence as to the capacity to execute a deed was not reversible error in an action by a devisee to set aside a deed of testator made a short time previous to her death, where the witnesses were allowed to testify fully as to the facts within their knowledge.

In Hayes v. Candee, 75 Conn. 131, 52 Atl. 826, in an action for damages against one who obtained property of an alleged incompetent to be deeded by her to a minor of whom he was afterwards appointed guardian, and as such guardian, for fraud and imposition practised upon such incompetent in thus inducing her to convey her real estate, opinion evidence as to whether or not the person was capable of transacting business was held competent as going to the degree of mental weakness and involving no matter of law. It is further stated that there was no prejudicial error in the admission of such evidence in this case.

In Cram v. Cram, 33 Vt. 15, in an action by an administrator for the recovery of notes which involved the validity of a contract made by the plaintiff's decedent with defendants, under which such notes were held, opinion evidence by witnesses who had laid the basis for their opinion, as to decedent's capacity to understand the nature of a contract, was held competent.

So, in Burnham v. Mitchell, 34 Wis. 117, in an action by an administrator to recover property which it was pleaded belonged to the defendant by virtue of an agreement with the decedent, the validity of which agreement was called in question on account of the mental incompetency of such decedent, opinion evidence as to the capacity of decedent to comprehend the contract was held competent.

So, in Chickering v. Brooks, 61 Vt. 554, 18 Atl. 144, another action by an administrator to recover property, opinion evidence by a witness who stated the basis of his opinion, as to the capacity of decedent to transact business intelligently and understandingly, was held competent if limited in meaning to a statement of the degree of mental capacity.

In Aiman v. Stout, 42 Pa. 114, an action by an administrator against an agent of his decedent for mismanagement, in which a release pleaded by the agent was alleged to have been executed by the decedent when he was incapable, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the decedent to understand the release at the time he executed it was held incompetent, but apparently on the basis that it was not founded on proper preliminary investigation.

This question frequently arises in cases between heirs and the devisees of a decedent, involving the validity of a will or a deed executed by the decedent. Thus, in Culver v. Haslam, 7 Barb. 314, an action of ejectment which involved the validity of a deed claimed to have been executed when the grantor was of unsound mind, opinion evidence by one who had been acquainted with the grantor for some time previous to her death, and narrated an incident that happened four years previous to the execution of the deed, as to the capacity of such grantor to transact business at that time, was held competent.

So, in Wilkinson v. Pearson, 23 Pa. 117, an action of ejectment involving the validity of a deed claimed to have been executed when the grantor was incompetent, it was held competent to inquire of a witness whether, from the general appearance of the grantor in the year in which the deed was executed, he was of the opinion that such grantor was capable of making a contract or transacting important business. The court states that the appearance of the grantor could be inquired into by either party, so as to ascertain upon what the belief was founded, and that the jury were to judge of the correctness of the opinion from the facts.

So, in Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 601, a case involving the validity of deed, opinion evidence as to the grantor's capacity was held competent although it does not sufficiently appear therein. Other objections and exceptions relate to the questions of want of consideration for the deed and defective execution or acknowledgment, or questions which relate to the charge of fraud, which was not found, and in view of the ground of the decision, became immaterial.

Messrs. George E. Beers, Harry J. Beardsley, and Arthur B. O'Keefe, for appellant:

clearly appear that the testimony went farther in this case than as to the general capacity of the grantor.

In Whitaker v. Hamilton, 126 N. C. 465, 35 S. E. 815, an action to recover property, which involved the validity of a conveyance claimed to have been executed when the grantor was not competent, opinion evidence from a witness who had laid the basis of his opinion was held competent as being an opinion received from necessity.

In Dewitt v. Barley, 9 N. Y. 371, an action of ejectment in which the defendants claimed under a conveyance said to be void because of the incapacity of the grantor, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the grantor to transact business was held inadmissible. This decision seems to be based on the rule relating to evidence as to general mental capacity. In a subsequent appeal of this case, in 17 N. Y. 340, the court distinguishes between an opinion on the general question of capacity, and an opinion as to capacity to transact business, and states that on the first appeal only the latter question was before the court.

This question has arisen also in actions for damages in which the defendant pleads a release, and it is claimed that the release was executed when the releasor was incompetent. Thus, in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brundige, 114 Tenn. 31, 84 S. W. 805, 4 Ann. Cas. 887, it was held that opinion evidence as to the capacity of plaintiffs to make a contract or transact business at about the time of executing the release was incompetent, the court saying: "The testimony was clearly incompetent and should have been excluded; the degree or quantum of mental capacity which the party whose act is called in question must have to enable him to make a valid contract is a question of law for the court to decide, and whether said party has the required quantum is a question of fact to be found by the jury from all the evidence, and the opinions of witnesses are not competent evidence in cases of this kind upon either point." See Aiman v. Stout, supra.

But in Beard v. Southern R. Co. 143 N. C. 137, 55 S. E. 505, a case involving the validity of such a release, opinion evidence 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that the releasor did not have "sufficient mental capacity to enable him to have reasonable judgment as to the effect of it, and what it purported to be," was held competent.

And in Galloway v. San Antonio & G. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 32, another case involving the validity of such a release, opinion evidence by a witness who knew the releasor a long time before the injury, and had seen him frequently while at the hospital, and since he left the hospital, and the last time two days before the release was executed, that the plaintiff was not in physical and mental condition to transact business, was held competent as an opinion regarding mental capacity.

In Searles v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 148 Iowa, 65, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 405, 126 N. W. 801, opinion evidence as to whether or not one making an assignment of an insurance policy was capable of transacting business at and prior to the time when the assignment was made was held competent, in a case in which the issue raised was as to the ownership of the life insurance policy sued upon.

And in Hilmer v. Western Travelers Acci. Asso. 86 Neb. 285, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 319, 125 N. W. 535, in an action on an accident policy, on the issue of the plaintiff's disability, opinion evidence based on facts testified to by a witness as to the capacity of the plaintiff to transact ordinary business was held competent.

In McRae v. Malloy, 93 N. C. 154, in an action upon a contract, in which the defense was surprise and undue influence and false representations, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the defendant to transact business was held competent.

And in Dominick v. Randolph, 124 Ala. 557, 27 So. 481, it was held in an action on a contract where the defense was the insanity of the defendant, that a witness who had already testified to the insanity of the defendant might be asked on cross-examination whether or not the defendant was capable of making a deed at a certain stated time, the deed referred to not being the one involved in the suit in question. It does not clearly appear how near in point of time the making of the deed was to the making of the contract in suit, but ap-

But in Conner v. Stanley, 67 Cal. 315, 7 Pac. 723, in an action to enforce a marriage contract against an administrator of a decedent, it was held incompetent for a witness to testify as to whether the decedent was competent to make a contract with a spiritual medium, as plaintiff was believed by the decedent to have been.

Wills.

—as to capacity to make a will.

In the contest of a will, opinion evidence as to the capacity of testator to make a will is incompetent. Crowell v. Kirk, 14 N. C. 355; Blackman v. Andrews, 150 Mich. 322, 114 N. W. 218; Brown v. Mitchell, 88 Tex. 350, 36 L.R.A. 64, 31 S. W. 621; Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 329; Turner's Appeal, 72 Conn. 305, 44 Atl. 310.

Such evidence is incompetent because it is the issue to be submitted to the jury. Councill v. Mayhew, — Ala. —, 55 So. 314; Hamon v. Hamon, 180 Mo. 685, 79 S. W. 422; Re Blood, 62 Vt. 359, 19 Atl. 770.

But the admission of such evidence was held not sufficient error to reverse the judgment, in Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 376, 12 N. E. 267.

Opinion evidence as to whether or not the testator was of sufficient mind and memory to understand the will, or whether or not he was able understandingly to execute a will, is incompetent as calling for the conclusion of the witness as to testamentary capacity, the issue the jury is sworn to try. Baker v. Baker, 202 Ill. 595, 67 N. E. 410.

So, in Weitzel v. Firebaugh, 251 Ill. 190, 95 N. E. 1085, opinion evidence that the testatrix was unable to understand the business in which she was engaged when she made the will, or able understandingly to execute it, is inadmissible as calling for a conclusion on testamentary capacity, and the witnesses' opinion on the question which the jury had been sworn to try.

So, in Re Cheney, 78 Neb. 274, 110 N. W. 731, opinion evidence as to the capacity to make a will was held incompetent as requiring the witness to determine the degree 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of mental capacity required to make a will, which is a question of law, and whether the testator when the will was made was possessed of such capacity, which was the principal issue for the jury to determine.

And in Runyan v. Price, 15 Ohio St. 1, 86 Am. Dec. 459, such evidence was held incompetent as involving a question of law and fact, and, to the extent that capacity was involved in the issue, the very question to be determined by the jury, and furthermore a question calling for such evidence assumes that a witness knows the degree of capacity which the law requires for the performance of the act of executing a will.

And in Re Taylor, 92 Cal. 564, 28 Pac. 603, such evidence was held incompetent as calling for the opinion of the witness as to the quantum of intelligence or mental capacity that in law is deemed sufficient to enable one to make a valid disposition of his property.

And for the same reason, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the testator at the time he signed the instrument, to engage in making a last will and testament, and understand the nature and effect of the act, was held incompetent, in Bailey v. Beall, 251 Ill. 577, 96 N. E. 567.

So, in Hopkins v. Wheeler, 21 R. I. 533, 79 Am. St. Rep. 819, 45 Atl. 551, opinion evidence as to the capacity of testatrix to make a will was held incompetent as calling for an opinion of the witness as to the degree of mental capacity required by law for the making of a will.

And for the same reason, in Farrell v. Brennan, 32 Mo. 328, 82 Am. Dec. 137, opinion evidence as to whether or not the testator's mind was sound enough to make a will was held incompetent.

So, in Page v. Beach, 134 Mich. 51, 95 N. W. 981, opinion evidence as to the capacity of a testatrix to make a will was held incompetent. The court states that some such questions might be understood as calling merely for the degree of intelligence as bearing upon the understanding, and in such case no harm would be likely to follow, but where a question of law is involved in the interrogatory, it is improper.

And in Pelamourges v. Clark, 9 Iowa, 1, the answer of a witness to an inquiry as to the capacity of testator to make a disposi-

Parol evidence is admissible to show the falsity of a certificate of acknowledgment.

Smith v. Ward, 2 Root, 374, 1 Am. Dec. 80.

Wheeler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The finding is explicit in its statement that on April 17, 1901, when the deed from the plaintiff to the defendant which this action seeks to set aside purports to have been executed, Mrs. Atwood was mentally and physically incapable of making the deed, and did not then comprehend what she was doing. On this finding no other judgment was possible, and, unless rulings upon the evidence tending to prove the incapacity of the plaintiff materially prejudicial to the defendant were made on the trial, the judgment must stand.

The witness Mrs. Allen, having stated her means and opportunity of knowledge, testified that between April 11 and 16, 1901, Mrs. Atwood was "very poor indeed," so low it was beyond asking her anything," and in a "condition to know nothing really." This evidence was objected to because the opinion of a nonexpert witness from whom nothing save what the witness saw and heard was admissible.

Opinion evidence, which is based upon special skill or knowledge, or upon facts and conditions which may be reasonably described and made clear to the trier without the aid of the impression or conclusion of the witness gained from them, may not be

tion of his property by will on or about the date of the alleged will, that he regarded the testator as capable of making a disposition of property by will at any time during his acquaintance with him, was incompetent as calling for an opinion on an inquiry which embraced the whole merits of the case.

Such evidence has been rejected on the ground that no sufficient basis had been laid for the opinion of the witness, in Buyss v. Buyss, 99 Mich. 354, 58 N. W. 331; Hibbard v. Baker, 141 Mich. 124, 104 N. W. 399; Dickinson v. Dickinson, 61 Pa. 401.

So, in Prentiss v. Bates, 93 Mich. 245, 17 L.R.A. 494, 53 N. W. 153, evidence by a witness who was shown the will in question, as to the capacity of testatrix to make it, that she was mentally incompetent of comprehending the will, was held inadmissible, but apparently for the reason that no facts tending to show insanity were testified to, on which such opinion might be based.

In Daniel v. Daniel, 39 Pa. 191, the court disapproves of making a distinction between opinion evidence as to the capacity of testator to understand a will, and as to whether or not he was "fit to make a will," but holds that no reversible error resulted from a refusal of the former opinion when the latter was allowed.

On the contrary, in Spencer v. Spencer, 31 Mont. 631, 79 Pac. 320, opinion evidence by a witness who had stated the basis of his opinion, as to the capacity of the testator to make a will, was held competent.

And in Stuckey v. Bellah, 41 Ala. 700, in an action for the conversion of personal property claimed under a gift from the decedent, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the decedent to dispose of his property was held competent.

And in Ethridge v. Bennett, 9 Houst. (Del.) 295, 31 Atl. 813, opinion evidence by witnesses who had laid a proper basis for their opinion, as to the capacity of the testator to make a will, was held competent evidence, but it is stated further that the jury must rely on the facts, and not upon the opinion of the witness formed from such facts, in forming their judgment.

So, in Lodge v. Lodge, 2 Houst. (Del.) 418, such evidence from a witness who had stated facts on which his opinion was based was held admissible.

In Steele v. Helm, 2 Marv. (Del.) 237, 43 Atl. 153, the trial court held that a question asked of a witness as to whether the testator was of sound and disposing mind and memory, and capable of making a will, was admissible after facts had been stated by such witness on which the opinion was based. No attention seems to have been given to the latter part of this question in the opinion in the case, and nothing is said on this point in the note appended.

In Wogan v. Small, 11 Serg. & R. 141, a question calling for a witness's opinion as to whether testator was fit or unfit to make a will was objected to as a leading question. It was held not to be open to this objection, and in the course of the opinion it is stated that the plaintiff had a right to the witness's opinion on this point.

In Porter v. Throop, 47 Mich. 313, 11 N. W. 174, opinion evidence that the testatrix had sufficient mental capacity to comprehend her property and the relation to her children, so as to be competent to make the will, was held admissible, and also opinion evidence as to the capacity "to make her will to the extent of the paper which you have seen introduced in evidence" was held competent.

No question seems to have been raised as to the admission of such evidence, in Moffitt v. Smith, 153 N. C. 292, 69 S. E. 224.

Nor was there any question raised as to the admissibility of such evidence in a contest before the surrogate, in Weir v. Fitzgerald, 2 Bradf. 42.

—as to capacity to transact business.

On the question of the admissibility of opinion evidence as to the capacity of testator to transact business, the courts are more evenly divided. Such evidence was held admissible in Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 459, 86 Am. Dec. 70, where the court said: "We think that there can be no impropriety in allowing the opinions of the given by the nonexpert witness. An opinion of a nonexpert witness which does not rest upon facts stated by him, or is not acquired through the use of his senses, may not be laid in evidence. Turner's Appeal, 72 Conn. 305, 315, 44 Atl. 310. The witness may state the facts on which the opinion rests. He is not required to do so. He must show that he had the means and opportunity for knowledge. His opinion without this foundation is inadmissible. When, however, a subject is relevant to the matter in suit, and the lay witness has had the means and opportunity of acquiring knowledge of the subject through the use of his senses, and the impression or opinion is formed from constituent facts and conditions which are so numerous or so complicated as to be incapable of separation, or so evanescent in character, they cannot be fully recollected or detailed or described or reproduced, so as to give the trier the impression they give the witness, or so as to enable the trier to draw a fair inference from such facts and conditions, he may be permitted to testify to the impression or conclusion obtained by him from them, leaving it to the cross-examination to develop the foundation for the impression or conclusion. Spencer's Appeal, 77 Conn. 638, 643, 60 Atl. 289; Turner's Appeal, 72 Conn. 305, 315, 44 Atl. 310; Chamberlain v. Platt, 68 Conn. 126, 130, 35 Atl. 780.

The exceptional witness may be able at times to describe the eye or the action of a man; but he cannot convey distinctly to witnesses upon any measure of capacity which is calculated to aid the jury in coming to a conclusion. . . . Whenever the facts are such that the jury cannot form an unaided opinion, it is essential that the opinions which they receive should enlighten them upon the exact point in controversy, if possible, for otherwise their verdict will be conjectural."

So, in Keithley v. Stafford, 126 Ill. 507, 18 N. E. 740, opinion evidence as to the capacity of the testator to transact ordinary business on the day the will was drawn was held competent. The court refers to Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 376, 12 N. E. 287, as a decision to the contrary on this point. It seems such evidence was admitted in the latter case, but it is not discussed separately by the court in holding the admission error, but insufficient to reverse judgment.

So, in Mayville v. French, 246 Ill. 434, 92 N. E. 919, opinion evidence by witnesses who had laid a proper foundation as to the capacity of the testatrix to transact business was held admissible. Objection was made in this case to the testimony of a witness who had lived in the household with testatrix for two years, that it related to no particular time. The court states that the question implied that it related to the time the witness knew testatrix.

So, in Turner's Appeal, 72 Conn. 305, 44 Atl. 310, such evidence was held admissible as showing the extent of the mental impairment.

In Ring v. Lawless, 190 Ill. 520, 60 N. E. 881, opinion evidence by a witness who resided in the neighborhood for years, and was well acquainted with the testator, as to the testator's capacity to transact the ordinary business affairs of life, was held competent. It appears, however, that the objection to the evidence in this case was on the ground that the witness had not given any facts on which to base his opinion, and it was therefore incompetent. It was held that sufficient facts were given, and the evidence competent.

In Re Pinney, 27 Minn. 282, 6 N. W. 791, 7 N. W. 144, objection was made to a question calling for an opinion as to the testator's capacity to do important business, on the ground that it should have called for an opinion as to ability to do ordinary business. The answer was that the testator was not competent to transact business to any extent, and this was stated by the court not to have been responsive to the question, and it was apparently regarded as removing the objection, and nothing farther was said on this point. It is stated in the course of the opinion that a question calling for an opinion as to capacity to comprehend property and make an intelligent disposition of it by will does not call for an opinion as to capacity to make a valid will, hence is unobjectionable on this point.

So, in Lodge v. Lodge, 2 Houst. (Del.) 418, it was held that a witness who stated facts on which his opinion was based could testify to testator's capacity to attend to business.

In Huyck v. Rennie, 151 Cal. 411, 90 Pac. 929, it is stated in the opinion that one witness testified fully concerning ability of decedent to conduct his business affairs, but it does not appear that he was asked his opinion as to this ability.

In Fishburne v. Ferguson, 84 Va. 87, 4 S. E. 575, it is stated by the court that the great weight of evidence was that grantor was insane and not competent to understand or transact business of any kind, but it does not appear that the witnesses were asked their opinion as to this.

Neither does it appear in Weems v. Weems, 19 Md. 334, that the question called for more than an opinion as to general capacity, although it is stated that opinion evidence as to the testamentary capacity of a testator is admissible without stating the facts on which it is founded, from a witness who was a brother of decedent and intimately associated with him in business, and had opportunities for judging of the condition of his mind.

No objection seems to have been made to the admission of such testimony, in Baker v. Baker, 202 Ill. 595, 67 N. E. 410, supra. See also Wetzel v. Firebaugh, 251 Ill. 190, 95 N. E. 1085, supra.

On the contrary, in Torrey v. Burney, 113

another the appearance of the man to him, unless he may give the impression made upon him, or the conclusion reached by him, from the man whom such acts and look portray. We cannot express in words the facts and conditions which lead us to the opinion that one is under the influence of hate or love, pain or pleasure, hope or fear. We cannot describe exactly our own emotions, sentiments, and affections, much less those of another: Memory may retain no single detail, indeed one may never have recognized a single detail; yet the appearance of the man may have left upon the minds an indelible impression as to his physical and mental condition. Clear before him is the picture of what he saw,—a man healthy or sick, strong or fragile, well or poorly, changed in health for better or worse, composed or nervous, excited or despondent, tired or exhilarated, intellectual or weak-minded, conscious or unconscious, suffering or happy. In truth, that which we call opinion is fact. The impression or conclusion is the sum of what he saw, and in its final analysis the offer is to prove a fact, and not an opinion. 3 Wigmore, Ev. § 1918; Turner's Appeal, 72 Conn. 305, 315, 44 Atl. 310.

Every trial, as a rule, is filled with so-called opinion evidence from the nonexpert witness; it is so constant and so common it is not distinguished from other evidence except in the occasional instance. With a better understanding of when and how opinion evidence from nonexpert witnesses may be used, we find in the trials its use increasing and with the growing perplexity of our life this is inevitable and indispensable if we would reach the truth. There

Ala. 496, 21 So. 348, opinion evidence as to the capacity of testator to transact ordinary business was held incompetent for the reason that the witness was not an expert on the question of insanity.

And in Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681, opinion evidence as to the capacity of testator to transact business during the last year of his life, apparently the time within which the will had been executed, was held incompetent. The court treated this opinion as equivalent to an opinion as to the soundness or unsoundness of testator's mind generally, and, in accord with the rule for such testimony, held that the opinion of an ordinary witness must be limited to his conclusions from the specific facts to which he testifies.

In Glass v. Glass, 127 Iowa, 646, 103 N. W. 1013, evidence as to the capacity of testator before and at about the time of the execution of the will, intelligently to transact business or dispose of his property, was held incompetent so far as it related to the time of making the will, or to a time closely approximate thereto, for the reason that in effect it permits the witness to testify that the testator was capable of making the will. As to evidence relating to a time prior to the execution of the will, the evidence was held competent. This was treated by the court as going to the degree of mental capacity.

So, in Hewlett v. Wood, 55 N. Y. 634, opinion evidence as to the capacity of testator to transact business was held incompetent.

And in Stokes v. Miller, 10 W. N. C. 241, such evidence was held incompetent, but this is apparently on the ground that the witness was not qualified to state an opinion.

And in Smith v. Smith, 157 Mass. 389, 32 N. E. 348, opinion evidence from a witness who had testified generally regarding the testator's mental condition, as to the capacity of testator to make a contract or transact important business, was held incompetent in accordance with the general 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

rule in this state as to evidence relating to mental capacity generally.

On the general question of nonexpert opinion as to sanity or insanity, see note to Ryder v. State, 38 L.R.A. 721.

As to the right of a witness to give an opinion on the exact issue to be tried, in respect to sanity or mental capacity, see note to Brown v. Mitchell, 36 L.R.A. 64.

Lunacy proceedings.

In Neely v. Shephard, 190 Ill. 637, 60 N. E. 922, it was held that a witness in a lunacy proceeding might express an opinion as to the capacity of the person to transact his ordinary business, after he had testified to the facts on which such opinion was based.

In Re Coburn, 11 Cal. App. 604, 105 Pac. 924, evidence as to the ability of a person to manage his property, and as to whether or not he was likely to be imposed on by designing parties, was held incompetent under a Code provision that the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person may be given if the reason for the opinion is given. It is not clear from the opinion whether the exclusion is based on the fact that there were no facts given on which to base the opinion, or that it called for an inadmissible opinion.

In Shapter v. Pillar, 28 Colo. 209, 63 Pac. 302, opinion evidence as to the competency of an alleged lunatic to manage and control his own business affairs was held inadmissible.

And so in Londonderry v. Fryor, 84 Vt. 294, 79 Atl. 46, opinion evidence as to the capacity of an alleged lunatic to care for himself and his property was held incompetent as calling for a question of law.

And likewise, in Re Carmichael, 36 Ala. 616, opinion evidence as to whether or not an alleged lunatic was capable of taking care of himself and managing his own affairs was held incompetent.

is only one test for the nonexpert opinion: Is the evidence relevant, is it the best the nature of the case admits of, and does it come from a competent witness? Hardy v. Merrill, 56 N. H. 227, 241, 22 Am. Rep. 441. If these conditions are fulfilled, the evidence is admitted from necessity, because either the witness cannot otherwise describe it, or describe it in its force, extent, and meaning so that another may see or know what he saw and knew. The same rule and the same reason for the rule exists whether the opinion relate to physical or mental conditions. 3 Wigmore, Ev. § 1918.

Our decisions with their citations furnish many instances of nonexpert opinion evidence deemed admissible. Among the cases of the last few years in other states are found these illustrations of the proper application of this rule. That one was in good or bad health: Chicago City R. Co. v. Van Vleck, 143 Ill. 485, 32 N. E. 262; Johnson v. Union P. R. Co. 35 Utah, 285, 100 Pac. 390, 394; Davis v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 31 Utah, 307, 88 Pac. 3, 6. That one seemed very feeble, seemed to be crippled: Dilburn v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 156 Ala. 228, 47 So. 210. That one's hearing was acute or dull: Chicago City R. Co. v. Van Vleck, supra. That one was in pain or suffering: Morris v. St. Paul City R. Co. 105 Minn. 276, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 598, 117 N. W. 500, 502; Davis v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 31 Utah, 307, 88 Pac. 3, 6; Kline v. Santa Barbara Consol. R. Co. 150 Cal. 741, 90 Pac. 125, 129. That one was excited: Kinner v. Boyd, 139 Iowa, 14, 116 N. W. 1044. That one was intemperate: Taylor v. Security Life & Annuity Co. 145 N. C. 391, 59 S. E. 139, 13 Ann. Cas. 248. That one was nervous: Illinois C. R. Co. v. Rothschild, 134 Ill. App. 504, 511. That one's hearing was truculent: White v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 132 Mo. App. 339, 349, 112 S. W. 278. That one had a sneer on his face: Ibid. That one manifests affection: Spencer's Appeal, 77 Conn. 638, 643, 60 Atl. 289; Re Miller, 36 Utah, 228, 102 Pac. 996, 998. That one's disposition was bright and cheerful: Pullman Co. v. Hoyle, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 534, 115 S. W. 315, 318.

The opinion evidence in question was clearly admissible.

The assessment list of Mrs. Atwood embraced the property in dispute. It was offered in evidence as an admission that Mrs. Atwood only owned a life interest in the property. One of the assessors identified the list and stated that the words "Mary J. Atwood life use" were in Assessor Callahan's writing, and he added, "Atwood life use" was put in later. The defendant excepted to the court's refusal to strike this out.

It is true this was not responsive; but an answer which is relevant and material to the issue, although not responsive, should not be stricken out when the witness is competent. This evidence was of such a character; Mrs. Atwood could not be bound by the act of the assessors without her authority or knowledge. It does not appear that the witness had no personal knowledge of the fact he testified to. When that fact appeared, the motion to strike out might have been renewed. Questions of this character are largely within the discretion of the court, and only in exceptional cases should encumber a record on appeal. In this instance no harm could have been done, for the evidence subsequently came in, in due course, from other witnesses.

Two witnesses were permitted to testify, over the defendant's objection, that during the period of her illness Mrs. Atwood was not capable of doing business or making any contract or agreement. We think this evidence, under the circumstances of this case, was admissible as an opinion as to her general mental condition and the degree of her mental incapacity. If a question of this character called for a legal conclusion as to the capacity of one to make a particular will or a deed or a contract, it would be objectionable. This distinction is pointed out in Hayes v. Candee, 75 Conn. 131, 137, 52 Atl. 826, and the admissibility of questions of this character definitely determined in this case and in Turner's Appeal, 72 Conn. 305, 315, 44 Atl. 310.

Mrs. Atwood was asked: "How and when did you first discover that Frank G. Atwood claimed to have any interest in it (the property in dispute)?" She replied, "About three or four months ago, when I had to pay taxes they sent on, and I did not know what to make of it." This was objected to as immaterial.

We think it very material upon the question of her mental capacity at the execution of the deed, and whether she ever delivered the deed. It was undoubtedly admissible for other reasons, including the claim of fraud which was at that time a part of the case.

Mrs. Atwood was further asked, "Did you give him any kind of a paper, a blank deed, or any kind of a deed?" and the question and her answer, "No," were objected to because immaterial, and by her deed and acknowledgment she was estopped.

This evidence was admissible on the ground of the former question, which we need not repeat.

Other rulings are unimportant in view of the finding of a want of capacity in Mrs. Atwood to make the deed. And the finding of a want of delivery would have controlled the decision apart from lack of mental capacity, since there is no ruling on evidence which could in any event disturb this finding.

There is no error.

The other Judges concur.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

KITTIE FULTS, Appt.,

v.

JOHN C. MUNRO, Respnt.

(202 N. Y. 34, 95 N. E. 23.)

Judgment — facts to support — date for ascertainment.

1. In an action at law, the right to judgment depends upon the facts as they

Note. — Mere display of invalid process without actual force or threats, as ground of action of forcible entry and detainer.

Owing to the fact that the force involved in the criminal offense of forcible entry and detainer is private force, unlawfully exercised, and that the public force of the state lawfully exercised cannot be the means of a wrongful entry (19 Cyc. 1117); and that the entry for which the law affords a redress in the civil courts is an entry by a person of his own wrong and by his own mere act, without authority of law; and that the action cannot be maintained where one is put in possession by an officer of the law under and by the command of a court of competent jurisdiction (19 Cyc. 1137)—the question as to the effect of an entry under process invalid as against the one in possession is an interesting one, upon which there is a surprising dearth of authority. The decisions, however, are fairly uniform, the decided weight of authority, as is shown by the following cases, being to the effect that in the absence of actual force or threats, entry under invalid process is under color of title, constituting but a mere trespass, and therefore insufficient as ground for an action of forcible entry and detainer.

Thus, in Scott v. Newsom, 4 Sneed, 456, in holding that an action of forcible entry and detainer cannot be maintained against a party put in possession by virtue of a writ of execution issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, notwithstanding the party dispossessed was not a party to the action in which the writ issued, and could not be affected by the decree, the court said that, conceding the latter fact, "the substance of the plea is that the defendant was put in possession by a ministerial officer of the law under the authority and by the command of a court of competent jurisdiction." 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) existed at the time of the commencement of the action, and not at the time of the trial. Same — removal of tenant — assignee not party.

2. The assignee of a lease who has been recognized by the landlord as rightfully in possession cannot be dispossessed under a warranty in an action for recovery of possession to which he is not made a party.

Forcible entry — peaceable possession — liability.

3. One is not guilty of forcible entry upon real property, who, under color of a warrant which is not valid against the one in possession, enters the premises without force, or the display or threat of force, of any kind, and is left in possession by the occupant departing to secure legal advice, although the one in possession of the warrant states that he has come to put the occupant out and is going to do so.

Forcible detainer — display of force — intimidation — liability.

4. The one responsible for the conduct of an officer is guilty of forcible detainer, tion; and the question is, Does that constitute a forcible entry and detainer within either the letter or spirit of the act of 1821, or of any subsequent act? This question needs only to be stated; it admits no debate. The distinction between an entry under the circumstances before stated, and an entry by a party of his own wrong and by his own mere act, without color of authority of law, is sufficiently obvious to every mind of ordinary intelligence upon a moment's reflection. It cannot be tolerated that the judicial tribunals of the country shall in this mode assail and annul each other's solemn proceedings and judgments. The act of turning the plaintiff out of possession may have been unauthorized and contrary to the law, because of the existence of facts not presented to the chancellor in the record before him. If this were so, the plaintiff had an ample and summary remedy by petition to the court, setting forth the facts, and asking to be restored to his possession; or, if he really had a superior title to the land, he might have resorted to an action of ejectment. But, if he were a mere intruder on the land, with neither title nor right of possession, he has no just cause of complaint on the ground of being turned out." This case was followed in Rook v. Godfrey, 105 Tenn. 534, 58 S. W. 850, the report of which does not show the facts involved.

And in Sewell v. State, 61 Ga. 496, in, in holding that a landlord who enters upon his tenant by means of process duly executed by a lawful officer in the ordinary method of removing a tenant holding over, but issued upon an affidavit which falsely alleged that the term had expired, was not guilty of entry with "menaces, force, and arms, and without authority of law" the court said: "The force involved in the offense of forcible entry is private force, unlawfully exerted. The public force of the where he, after securing possession of the property peaceably, but wrongfully, paces back and forth before it, carrying a gun, which he occasionally discharges, and orders the person dispossessed, who has remained in the vicinity, to keep off the property.

(April 25, 1911.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term for Onondaga County in defendant's favor, entered upon the dismissal of an action brought to recover damages for the forcible entry by defendant on certain premises of which plaintiff was in lawful possession under a lease. Reversed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

The material allegations of the complaint are that on the 10th of March, 1908, the state, lawfully exercised, cannot be the means of a criminal entry. Whoever, in the prescribed mode, calls the law to his assistance, instead of taking the law into his own hands, commits no breach of the peace, though in making the call he may commit perjury."

And in Janson v. Brooks, 29 Cal. 214, in holding that an action for a forcible entry and detainer would not lie against a party put in possession by a sheriff in good faith, and without force or threats, by virtue of a process not running against the party dispossessed or anyone with whom he was in privity, the court, quoted with approval from the opinion of Chief Justice Cope in Buckman v. Whitney (an unreported case decided by the California supreme court at its October term, 1863, upon an almost identical state of facts) as follows: "The statute provides for the maintenance of the action in three cases: First, where the entry is unlawful; second, where it is forcible; and third, where it is lawful and peaceable, but the detainer is unlawful. Whenever the entry is forcible, an action lies; and it lies in the absence of force where the entry is unlawful; but it is obvious that in this respect the language used is not to be taken in its ordinary sense. The term 'unlawful' embraces in its definition whatever is in violation of law; and strictly speaking, a wrongful entry is an unlawful one; but the mere fact that an entry is wrongful does not make it unlawful in the sense of the statute. The statute is penal as well as remedial, and punishment implies criminality in the offense,—not only a wrong done, but a wrongful intent in the party doing it. Both are essential; if either is wanting, the offense is not made out; and to justify the punishment of an entry as unlawful, a wrongful intent is necessary to be shown. An entry in good faith, under color of right, is not 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

defendant leased to one William Fults, the husband of the plaintiff, a farm of 240 acres, situate in the town of Camillus, county of Onondaga. The lease was in writing, and provided for a term of one year from the 1st of April, 1908. The lessee agreed to market the crops and pay to the lessor as rent for the use of the premises one half of all the proceeds of the farm. On the same day that the lease was made William Fults assigned it to his wife, the plaintiff herein, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, and thereupon, with like knowledge and consent, she entered into possession of the premises. She further alleged that on the 18th of July, 1908, "said defendant made forcible entry into the lands and premises," fully describing them, and "made forcible entry to the whole of said premises, and has forcibly put the plaintiff out of the possession thereof, and has continued to forcibly and unlawfully hold plaintiff out of possession thereof, and by within the statute; the remedy was not intended for the adjustment of adverse claims, but as a means of redress and punishment in cases of wilful wrong. It was not intended as a substitute for an action of ejectment, as it undoubtedly would be if the statute were construed as applying in all cases where the entry is wrongful. We regard it as applying only in those cases where the entry is mala fide as well as wrongful; and beyond this its provisions cannot with any propriety be extended."

So, in Wyatt v. Monroe, 27 Tex. 268, it was held that, regardless of whether process was valid or invalid, an entry by virtue thereof was by exercise of lawful authority and would not support an action of forcible entry and detainer, especially where, in reply to a demand to surrender the premises in obedience to the writ, the occupant peacefully acquiesced. In connection with this case, see Laird v. Winters, as set out infra.

And in Stark v. Billings, 15 Fla. 318, where defendant was put in possession by the sheriff under a void writ, it was held that such entry did not constitute a forcible entry under the statutes relating thereto, as there was no force or violence aside from the mere trespass.

In Marchand v. Haber, 16 Misc. 322, 37 N. Y. Supp. 952, the court held that one ejected in a peaceable manner from property of which he had the mere possession without any estate therein, on process void because of defective pleadings, is not entitled to treble damages under a forcible entry and detainer statute, the evident purpose of which is to prevent wanton invasion of rights of property.

In Seitz v. Miles, 16 Mich. 456, where the entry was made under an invalid writ, but without real violence, it was held that such an entry, accompanied by threats to put the occupant out of possession under the powers reason thereof said plaintiff has been damaged by the aforesaid acts of the defendant, his servants and agents, in the sum of $2,000, for treble which amount the plaintiff claims judgment against the defendant." The plaintiff also described the crops growing upon the premises at the time of the entry, and alleged that she "was receiving profits from seven milch cows, amounting to $30" per month. The defendant by his answer admitted the execution of the lease, denied all the other allegations of the complaint, and alleged that he was in possession under the judgment and warrant of a justice of the peace duly made and issued in a proceeding in which the defendant was the petitioner and William Fults, the lessee of the premises, was the defendant.

It appeared upon the trial that in July, 1908, the defendant began a proceeding before a justice of the peace to remove his tenant, William Fults, from the premises for the nonpayment of rent, but he did not make Mrs. Fults, the assignee of the lease, a party, although he knew of the assignment and had recognized her as in possession. After issue joined and a trial had in said proceeding, in which the plaintiff was sworn as a witness, judgment of dispossession was rendered in due form of law, and a warrant regular upon its face issued to a constable for execution. The officer went to the premises, and without using force or threats entered the dwelling house where Mrs. Fults resided and inquired for her husband. She said he was down in the lot, and asked the officer what he wanted. He answered: "I have come to put you out. If you don't take your $100 and put on your things and leave, I am going to put you out." She said: "Well, I guess you won't put me out." The defendant was not present when this took place, and the yielding of possession because of such threats, was forcible under the statutes. And in the following additional cases, which passed upon the question of the force essential to render an entry or detainer actionable under the statutes, it was held that facts constituting a cause of action were established, but in each instance there was either actual force or threats, for which reason the true importance attachable to the fact that the process was invalid as against the person dispossessed cannot be determined absolutely, but, from the decisions as a whole, it seems inferable that the courts assumed that something more than the exhibiting of a mere invalid process was necessary in order to render the entry forcible within the statutes relating to forcible entry and detainer. Chambers v. Collins, 4 Ga. 193; Brush v. Fowler, 36 Ill. 53, 85 Am. Dec. 382; Hubner v. Feige, 90 Ill. 208; Tibbetts v. O'Connell, 66 Ind. 171; Vess v. State, 93 Ind. 211 (holding that even actual force and threats necessary to take and hold possession under the process could be used where the process was issued by a court having jurisdiction and was valid on its face, and that the use of such force and threats did not constitute forcible entry and detainer under the Indiana statutes); Wallace v. Hall, 22 Kan. 271; State v. Anders, 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 15; Farnsworth v. Fowler, 1 Swan, 1, 55 Am. Dec. 718.

A few decisions, however, are to the effect that the fact that the warrant is invalid and the entry against the will of the occupant is sufficient to render the entry forcible under the statute, but in one instance, at least, this conclusion seems to have been due to the unusually broad statute under which the action was brought. Thus, in Chiles v. Stephens, 1 A. K. Marsh. 333, it was held that one turned out of possession under color of process not running against him or anyone with whom he was in privacy may maintain a writ of forcible entry and detainer. The facts and grounds upon which this decision was based are not set out in the report of the case, but the case is explained in Janson v. Brooks, supra, where it is said that the forcible entry and detainer act under which the action was brought provides that "the forcible entry intended by this act is, and shall be, any entry, with or without multitude of people, against the will or without the consent of the person or persons having the possession in fact of the premises into which such entry shall be made," and that under this act every entry "against the will or without the consent" of the occupant would be a forcible entry, regardless of the question of force. Assuming this statement to be correct, it justifies the conclusion reached by the court, and distinguishes it from those adhering to the general rule. Norton v. Sanders, 7 J. J. Marsh, 12, is to the same effect as Chiles v. Stephens, supra. But in Laird v. Winters, 27 Tex. 440, 86 Am. Dec. 620, it was held under the usual statute that a person who has been turned out of possession by a writ issuing by virtue of a decree to which he was in no sense a party may proceed by action of forcible entry and detainer to recover the possession, and that he ought not to be driven to an action in which the title may be called in question, nor even to a motion in the district court from which the writ issued, to be restored to his possession. And see also Martin v. Patchin, 4 Mo. App. 567, where the court held, without stating facts or reasons, that where one who is in lawful possession of premises at the time of the commencement of an action of unlawful detainer to which he is not made a party is dispossessed under and by virtue of a writ of possession issued in such action, he may maintain an action of forcible entry against the party obtaining possession under such writ.

place. Mr. Wood sat down in a chair, and Mrs. Fults, after saying, "These things are mine, don't you touch a thing in any way, shape, or manner in this house," went out, harnessed a horse, and drove to Syracuse. When she came back with a lawyer, the officer was removing the furniture, and placing it on the opposite side of the road in front of the house. After nearly everything was out, she went in to get some puppies which she swore belonged to her, and the officer told her she could not have them, and, to use her own words: "He took me by the arm and put me right off," taking her to the road, but using no violence to speak of. After this the defendant came to the premises, and she heard him identify certain articles, saying: "That is mine, don't take that out. This is theirs, take that out." Household furniture, horses, cows, wagons, farming implements and tools all belonging to the plaintiff were thus removed from the premises and put on the opposite side of the road, the horses being tied to the fence. That night she slept on the roadside with her things. One Lockwood, an assistant of the officer, walked up and down the road with a shotgun during the entire night. Twice after dark and once in the middle of the night he fired the gun. He told her to keep off of Mr. Munro's land; that he was in possession; that Mr. Munro had left him to keep guard; and that she should keep off.

An appeal was taken by William Fults, from the judgment of dispossession to the county court, and on the 15th of October, 1908, the judgment was modified as to the amount of rent due, and, as thus modified, affirmed, without costs. The next day this action was commenced. On the 13th of November following a further appeal was taken to the appellate division, and on the 2d of March, 1909, the judgment of dispossession was reversed by that court on the ground that the rent and costs were tendered before the warrant was issued, and that no proper demand had been made. The present action was tried in May, 1909, and, when the plaintiff rested, the defendant moved for a nonsuit. The plaintiff asked to go to the jury upon the question whether she was forcibly ejected and detained from the premises, upon the question of the damages sustained by her, and upon all the evidence in the case. The application of the plaintiff was denied, the motion of the defendant granted, and the plaintiff excepted to each ruling. Upon appeal to the appellate division, the judgment entered upon the verdict was unanimously affirmed.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Statutes relating to forcible entry and to forcible detainer, which are separate and distinct wrongs have existed for centuries. The earliest passed in 1831, provided that "none from henceforth make any entry into lands and tenements but in case where entry is given by the law, and in such case not with strong hand nor with multitude of people, but only in peaceable and easy manner; (2) And if any man from henceforth do to the contrary, and thereof be duly convicted, he shall be punished by imprisonment of his body, and thereof ransomed at the King's will." 5 Richard II. chap. 8; Pollock, Torts, 6th ed. 368.

Later the provisions of the statute were extended to forcible detainer (8 Henry VI. chap. 9), and since then legislation upon the subject in England and in this country has usually been addressed to both forcible entry and forcible detainer, and except in one or two states the offenses are still distinct. As time passed, many changes were made, and various remedies, both civil and criminal, provided, including the recovery of treble damages. The Revised Statutes contained the provision that "if any person be disseised, ejected, or put out of any lands or tenements in a forcible manner, or being put out, be afterwards holden and kept out by force or with strong hand, he shall be entitled to maintain an action of trespass, and shall recover therein treble the damages assessed by the jury or by a justice of the peace, in cases provided by law." 2 Rev. Stat. 1st ed. pt. 3, chap. 5, title 6, § 4. The Code of Civil Procedure provides that "if a person is disseised, ejected, or put out of real property in a forcible manner; or after he has been put out, is held and kept out by force, or by putting him in fear of personal violence, he is entitled to recover treble damages, in an action therefor against the wrongdoer. Code Civ. Proc. § 1009.

Under the head of summary proceedings to recover the possession of real property, the Code further provides that "an entry shall not be made into real property, but in a case where entry is given by law; and, in such a case, only in a peaceable manner, not with strong hand, nor with a multitude of people. A person who makes a forcible entry forbidden by this section, or who, having peaceably entered upon real property, holds the possession thereof by force, and his assigns, undertenants, and legal representatives, may be removed therefrom, as prescribed in this title." Id. § 2233. It is provided by the Penal Code that "a person guilty of using, or of procuring, encouraging, or assisting another to use, any force or violence in entering upon or detaining any lands or other possessions of another, except in the cases and the manner allowed by law, is guilty of a misdemeanor." Penal Code, § 465.

As this is an action at law, the right to judgment depends on the facts as they stood when it was commenced, instead of, according to the rule in equity, as they stood at the date of the trial. Sherman v. Foster, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

158 N. Y. 587, 593, 53 N. E. 504, and cases cited.

Hence the warrant to dispossess, being valid upon its face and having been issued pursuant to a judgment also valid upon its face, is to be regarded as valid when it was executed, although subsequently the judgment was reversed, not for want of jurisdiction, but for errors committed during the trial before the magistrate.

Mrs. Fulta, however, was not a party to the proceeding in which the judgment was rendered, so that she was not bound thereby, and the warrant was not good as against her. She was in possession as assignee of the lease, and there was evidence tending to show that the defendant had recognized her as lawfully in possession. She should have been joined as a party to the proceeding, and it was a trespass to dispossess her without giving her an opportunity to make her defense. As was said by Judge Van Hoesen in Croft v. King, 8 Daly, 265, 268: "She might have paid the rent to protect her possession, or she might have taken a valid objection to some of the landlord's proceedings. At any rate, the statute gave her a right to a hearing, and the landlord ought to answer in damages for the wrong." The following cases cited by the learned judge amply sustain his position: Sims v. Humphrey, 4 Denio, 185; Hill v. Stocking, 6 Hill, 314; Starkweather v. Seeley, 45 Barb. 164; Savacool v. Boughton, 5 Wend. 170, 21 Am. Dec. 181. See also Colt v. Eves, 12 Conn. 243, 259; Kendall v. Doctor, 4 How. Pr. 447. While the warrant would be no protection as against an action for simple trespass brought by her, it has an important bearing upon the question of forcible entry.

At common law and prior to the statutes to prevent forcible entry and detainer, if a lawful right of entry existed, the person entitled to possession was justified by law in regaining possession by force. Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. 150, 157, 4 Am. Dec. 258; 2 Hawk. P. C. 64. The present statutes upon the subject are the re-enactment of a long series of laws for the primary purpose of preventing landlords from taking the law into their own hands and ejecting tenants by violence, although they also apply to some other cases. The civil action to recover treble damages is penal in nature, and its object is to redress the forcible and wanton violation of the right to the possession of real estate.

The expression "in a forcible manner," as used in the statute, does not mean any kind of force, such as is involved in a mere trespass. Thus, as was held in a leading case, after a careful review of the authorities: "The entry or detainer must be riotous, or personal violence must be used, or there must be threats or menaces of violence, or other circumstances must exist inducing alarm or terror in the occupant of the premises." Willard v. Warren, 17 Wend. 257. As was said in another case which has frequently been cited: "It has always been held that, to make an entry forcible, it ought to be accompanied with some circumstances of actual violence or terror; and therefore an entry which hath no other force than such as is implied by the law in every trespass whatsoever is not within these statutes." People ex rel. Niles v. Smith, 24 Barb. 16, 18.

The force used must be unusual and tend to bring about a breach of the peace, such as an entry with a strong hand, or a multitude of people, or in a riotous manner, or with personal violence, or with threat and menace to life or limb, or under circumstances which would naturally inspire fear and lead one to apprehend danger of personal injury, if he stood up in defense of his possession. Pharis v. Gere, 110 N. Y. 336, 345, 1 L.R.A. 270, 18 N. E. 135; People ex rel. Kline v. Rickert, 8 Cow. 226; Waterbury v. Deckelmann, 50 App. Div. 434, 64 N. Y. Supp. 60; Bach v. New, 23 App. Div. 548, 48 N. Y. Supp. 777; Labro v. Campbell, 24 Jones & S. 70, 2 N. Y. Supp. 129; Milner v. Maclean, 2 Car. & P. 17; 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 28, §§ 26, 27; Wharton, Crim. Law, § 2033, 2034; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 397; 3 McAdam, Land. & T. 3d ed. 187. As was said by Judge Folger in Wood v. Phillips, 43 N. Y. 152, 157: "The main object still is to preserve the public peace and prevent parties from asserting their rights by force or violence, though by gradual additions the remedy has become in effect a private as well as a public one."

The entry itself in this case, leaving out of view for the present the detainer, was not made in a forcible manner within the meaning of the statute as read in the light of the authorities. Actual entry was made without force or the display or threat of force of any kind. After such entry the plaintiff of her own accord left the premises, and went off to get legal advice. The mere statement of the officer, made with the warrant in his hands, that he had come to put her out, and that if she did not put on her things and leave, he was going to put her out, with no threat to injure, or any overt act, did not make the entry forcible. While she did put on her things and leave, it was not through fear, but to procure a lawyer. She apprehended no danger, but held her own well in the conversation with the officer. Nothing occurred to suggest a breach of the peace. Moreover, the officer did not go there wantonly and with no semblance of right, but was armed with process valid 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) against William Fults, the lessee named in the lease, the husband of the plaintiff, and an actual occupant of the premises, although as the hired man of his wife, but invalid as to herself.

The warrant commended him "to remove all persons from the said property and to put the said petitioner into full possession thereof." It followed the language of the statute, which, however, does not mean literally all persons, but only those in actual possession who are made parties to the proceeding, and their guests, agents, servants, and the like. Croft v. King, supra. While the warrant under the facts recited therein did not upon its face authorize the officer to remove Mrs. Fults, the form of the command gave him color of authority to do so, and saved him from the imputation of wilful and reckless conduct such as is necessary to support an action of this character. The primary question in such cases is not who had title to the land, but who had the right to possession; and the next, not whether the entry was made without right, but whether it was made with such force or threats as to disturb the public peace. While the defendant had no right to possession when he entered as the entry was not made by force or through fear, it was not an entry in a "forcible manner" within the meaning of the statute. Although the entry was peaceable, still, if the plaintiff was kept out through fear of personal violence, she was entitled to recover treble damages for a forcible detainer.

After the dispossession was complete, she had the right to re-enter if she could do so peaceably, for she had been deprived of possession without right. Bliss v. Johnson, 73 N. Y. 529. Neither the officer nor the defendant had any authority to prevent her if she attempted to, or to keep her out by threats or a display of force. As she was put out wrongfully, she had the right to get in again if she could, and whoever prevented her by menace or intimidation was guilty of forcible detainer. Referring to that subject, Chief Justice Savage said in People ex rel. Kline v. Rickert, at page 232 of 8 Cow. supra: "The law is that the same circumstances of violence or terror which will make an entry forcible will make a detainer forcible also; and whoever keeps in the house an unusual number of people, or unusual weapons, or threatens to do some bodily hurt to the former possessor if he dare return, shall be adjudged guilty of a forcible detainer, though no attempt be made to re-enter."

Threats may be made by acts as well as words. There was some evidence tending to show that Lockwood, the officer's assistant, had been stationed on the premises by the defendant with instructions to guard them and keep the plaintiff off, and whatever Lockwood did within the line of this authority the defendant did. Welsh v. Cochran, 63 N. Y. 181, 20 Am. Rep. 519; Newberry v. Lee, 3 Hill, 523, 525; Brown v. Feeter, 7 Wend. 301.

Mrs. Fults testified that she saw Lockwood "there with Wood carrying the stuff out," and that she saw him there while the defendant was on the premises. When asked what Lockwood was doing there that night she answered, "Why, he kept walking back and forth in front of our things, and ordering us and threatening and pointing a gun and such things." Later, on being recalled by the plaintiff, in answer to a similar question she said that Lockwood "kept walking up and down, walking up and down, and during the night he fired that gun three times, while I was living on the opposite side of the road," twice shortly after dark and once in the middle of the night. During the night he told her "to keep off of that side of the road. . . . He said to keep off of Mr. Munro's land. That he was in possession. That Mr. Munro had left him to keep guard and for me to keep off."

The officer's aide, with a loaded gun on his shoulder, marching through the night up and down on one side of the road in front of the plaintiff sitting with her effects on the other side, and at intervals firing the gun, was such a personification of force as naturally to inspire fear. His actions spoke louder than words, with the meaning, as the jury could have found, that, if she attempted to regain possession or enter the house, she would sustain bodily harm. Moreover, threatening words were used, although what they were does not appear, and the gun was pointed, but at whom and under what circumstances was not disclosed. There was at least such a show of force as to strongly tend to bring about a breach of the peace, and to prevent the plaintiff from attempting to re-enter.

All the evidence taken together, if believed by the jury, would have authorized them to find the defendant guilty of forcible detainer, not committed by himself in person, but by an agent for whose acts in the line of guarding the premises and keeping the plaintiff off he was responsible. A case was made for the jury, and as there was some evidence, although slight, on the question of damages, the motion to nonsuit was improperly granted. After hearing the defendant and his witnesses, whose version of the facts has not yet appeared, it will be for the jury to say whether the plaintiff was kept out of possession through fear of personal violence, and, if so, to assess the damages sustained by her.

The judgment of nonsuit should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide event.

Courts — jurisdiction — counterclaim — excess — effect.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

The action was instituted by plaintiff to recover $199 due by contract. Defendant denied the indebtedness, and set up a counterclaim for breach of contract of warranty on other sales of cheese. On the hearing before the justice, there was judgment in defendant's favor for an excess of $38.36. Plaintiff having appealed on trial in superior court, four issues were submitted, as follows: "First. In what amount, if any, is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? Second. In what amount, if any, is the plaintiff, Stacey Cheese Company, indebted to the defendant? Third. What amount, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? Fourth. What amount, if any, is the defendant entitled to recover?" And it was agreed by parties that the court should answer the third and fourth issues according to the findings of the jury in the first and second. The jury rendered verdict as to defendant's indebtedness to plaintiff. Answer first issue $199, and second issue, as to plaintiff's indebtedness to defendant, $210. On the verdict defendant moved for judgment that plaintiff take nothing by his suit, and defendant recover his costs. The court being defendant's answer merely alleges facts showing the amount in controversy to be above the jurisdictional limit. Nor is it intended to go into the question of the effect on the defendant's cause of action in a subsequent suit.

The question as to what constitutes a counterclaim in excess of jurisdiction, or the manner of determining that question, has not been discussed separately, and is considered herein only as it bears upon the main question annotated.

As a general rule a court has no jurisdiction of a set-off or counterclaim in an amount in excess of its jurisdictional limit. But the defendant cannot oust the court of jurisdiction by setting up such a claim. 24 Cyc. 479.

I. In court of original jurisdiction.

a. Effect upon plaintiff's claim.

The filing of a counterclaim in excess of jurisdictional limit does not oust the court of jurisdiction of the plaintiff's claim. Alexander v. Peck, 5 Blackf. 308; Barber v. Kennedy, 18 Minn. 216, Gil. 196 (dictum); Corley v. Evans, 69 S. C. 520, 48 S. E. 459; Bennett v. Forrest, 69 Fed. 421; McIlroy v. McEwan, 12 Manitoba L. Rep. 164; Read v. Wedge, 20 U. C. Q. B. 456.

In Hoffman v. Reading, 3 N. J. L. 561, it was held that the defendant could not oust the justice of jurisdiction by an unverified plea setting up a demand in excess of jurisdiction, where after the plea was filed, the cause was referred to referees by consent.

And in Montgomery v. Snowhill, 2 N. J. L. 362, a statement by the defendant, with an offer to make affirmance of the same, that the plaintiff owed him more than $100 (apparently the jurisdictional amount), was not a ground for nonsuiting the plaintiff.

But the court should proceed to hear and determine the plaintiff's claim. Bunch v. Potts, 57 Ark. 257, 21 S. W. 437; Kilgore Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 95 Ark. 43, 128 S. W. 62; Gharkey v. Halstead, 1 Ind. 389; State, Clancy, Prosecutor, v. Neumeyer, 51 N. J. L. 299, 17 Atl. 154; Kienzie v. Gard- 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ner, 73 N. J. L. 258, 63 Atl. 10; Corkran v. Taylor, 77 N. J. L. 195, 71 Atl. 124; Raisin v. Thomas, 88 N. C. 148; Holden v. Wiggins, 3 Penn. & W. 469; Milliken v. Gardner, 37 Pa. 456; Walden v. Berry, 48 Pa. 456; Kraus v. Bickhart, 1 Chester, Co. Rep. 479; Cain v. Culbreath, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 35 S. W. 809; Johnson v. W. H. Goolsby Lumber Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 121 S. W. 883.

In Ware v. Fambro, 67 Ga. 515, the Code governing this matter provided that where the defendant pleads a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdictional amount, the plaintiff's debt may be credited on the counterclaim, leaving the defendant free to sue on his claim with this credit, in a court having jurisdiction.

So, in Beckham v. Peay, 1 Bail. L. 121, it was held that where the plaintiff was insolvent, and the defendant filed a set-off in excess of the jurisdictional amount, upon a proper case made the plaintiff should be compelled to declare in a higher court, so that the defendant might have the benefit of his set-off; the judgment in this case was reversed on other grounds.

In Jourdain v. Lichsinger, 91 Minn. 111, 97 N. W. 740, a statute provided that when a counterclaim is filed in excess of the jurisdictional amount, the court shall certify the same to a court of general jurisdiction, which shall proceed to final judgment; and it was held that the only question the justice could pass upon was as to the sufficiency of the answer to determine whether the claim was such a one as required transfer.

In Kilgore Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 95 Ark. 43, 128 S. W. 62, infra, the statute provided that the amount due the plaintiff should be ascertained and given him as a credit on the claim used as a set-off or counterclaim. The court does not specifically mention this part of the statute, but it treats the plaintiff as having a right to sue on the contract before the circumstances which gave rise to the counterclaim had accrued, and for this reason says that the matter set up in the counterclaim could not be used merely as a defense to the plaintiff's claim.

of opinion that as the counterclaim of defendant was in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, and that defendant had at no time remitted the excess or offered to do so until after verdict, the court, in accordance with the agreement, answered the third issue $199, and fourth issue nothing, and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff for said amount of $199 and costs, and dismissed defendant's counterclaim for lack of jurisdiction, etc. Defendant excepted and appealed, assigning for error that the court refused to sign the judgment as tendered by him; second, to the judgment as entered.

Messrs. Aycock & Winston and W. R. Dortch for appellant.

Mr. M. T. Dickinson for appellee.

And in Smith v. Burke, 10 Johns. 110, where the defendant set up a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdictional amount, it was held that if it was proved to the satisfaction of the justice in such excess, the plaintiff should be nonsuited, and if in any sum within the jurisdiction, the judgment should be rendered against the plaintiff for the difference between the amounts so found due.

Where the plaintiff does not object to the jurisdiction, the judgment for the defendant in excess of the jurisdictional amount will not be reversed, under a statute which provides that where set-off is pleaded in the justice court, and satisfactorily proved, the justice shall give judgment for the overplus, provided it does not exceed the jurisdictional amount; and if it exceeds that amount the judgment is to be given for the defendant for costs. Smith v. Fleming, 9 Ala. 768. It is not quite clear from the report of this case whether the set-off was filed in the justice court or not until after it reached the appellate court. See Jackson v. Swope, 49 Ind. 388, infra.

Where the court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the defendant's claim, and an amount is found due him, such amount is used as an offset to any amount found due the plaintiff on his claim. This question is discussed in the division below as to disposition of the defendant's claim, where other questions relating to the effect upon the plaintiff's claim are discussed also.

b. Disposition of counterclaim.

1. In general.

The court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine a set-off or counterclaim in excess of the jurisdictional amount. Cash v. Cash, 1 Ga. Dec. pt. 1, p. 97; Holden v. Wiggins, 3 Penr. & W. 469; Walden v. Berry, 48 Pa. 456; Kraus v. Bickhart, 1 Chester Co. Rep. 479; Salser v. Mackenzie, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 280; Hall v. McGill, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 38 S. W. 828; Corley v. Evans, 69 S. C. 520, 48 S. E. 459; Robinett v. Nunn, 9 Mo. 248 (statute provided against jurisdiction L.R.A. (N.S.))

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is apparent conflict of authority with us on the question presented, and at least two or more decisions of this court would seem to be in direct support of his Honor's ruling. Raisin v. Thomas, 88 N. C. 148; Meneely v. Craven, 86 N. C. 364. The cause having originated in the court of a justice of the peace, questions of jurisdiction must be considered and determined in reference to that fact, and numerous and repeated cases with us are to the effect "that the jurisdiction of the superior court on appeals from a justice of the peace is entirely derivative, and, if the justice had no jurisdiction in an action as it was before him, the superior court can derive none tion); Turgrinson v. Meyer, 155 Ill. App. 553; Sullivan v. Owens, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 373.

In Bunch v. Potts, 57 Ark. 257, 21 S. W. 437, an action for damages for breach of contract to deliver goods, it was held that the defendant could not counterclaim for the purchase price of the goods, which was an amount in excess of the court's jurisdiction.

And in Kienzle v. Gardner, 73 N. J. L. 258, 63 Atl. 10, an action for the price of goods sold and delivered, it was held that the defendant could not sustain a claim of recoupment in excess of the jurisdictional amount, and the defense of a failure of consideration could not be maintained where the defendant in his notice did not discriminate between the two defenses, under a statute which authorized the defendant to recoup all damages he may have sustained by reason of any cause of action arising out of a contract or transaction set forth in the plaintiff's demand or connected with the subject of the action. There is a dictum to the effect that this statute does not authorize entertaining jurisdiction unless the claim in itself, or by an admitted credit, or by a waiver of the surplus, does not exceed the jurisdictional amount. Both the claim and the balance, however, were in excess of the jurisdictional amount.

In Raisin v. Thomas, 88 N. C. 148, an action on a note given as evidence of the purchase price of goods, it was held that the court could not entertain jurisdiction of a counterclaim in damages in excess of the jurisdictional amount. It appears that the defendant recovered judgment for an amount in excess of the jurisdiction, and proposed to remit the excess, extinguish the plaintiff's demand with the balance, and obtain judgment for costs. The principal case modifies this holding, as will be seen by reference thereto.

In Martin v. Eastman, 109 Wis. 286, 85 N. W. 359, an action for the balance of the price of goods, it was held that the defendant could not set up a breach of warranty as a defense, and counterclaim for an amount in excess of the court's jurisdiction.

by amendment" (Ijames v. McClamroch, 92 N. C. 362)—a principle fully approved by the present chief justice delivering the opinion of the court in Robeson v. Hodges, 105 N. C. 49, 11 S. E. 263, and reaffirmed and applied at the present term in Wilson v. Life Ins. 155 N. C. 173, 71 S. E. 79.

Considering the present case in that aspect, however, we are of opinion that it is a fair and correct deduction from the better considered decisions of our court, and is in accord with reason and the enlightened policy and expressed purposes of our present Code, that, whenever one is sued in a court of justice of the peace and has a valid counterclaim against plaintiff's demand, though the same may be in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, it may be pleaded, and, if established to an amount equal to or greater than plaintiff's claim, it may avail to defeat the action. On a counterclaim resting in contract, no recovery for an excess can be had in favor of defendant except on demands for $200 or less, or unless the excess over $200 has been remitted in the justice's court and in apt time (Ijames v. McClamroch, supra); but whether set up strictly as a counterclaim or not, where it exists, and has been pleaded and established, it should avail as a defense and defeat recovery by plaintiff, where the amount is sufficient for the purpose. This position is not in violation of our Constitution, limiting the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in actions ex contractu to cases involving $200 or less. Though a larger counterclaim

In Bennett v. Forrest, 69 Fed. 421, an action for work and labor, the defendant pleaded a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdictional amount, and then moved to dismiss the action on the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction. This motion was denied, and thereupon the cause came on for hearing, and defendant refused to introduce evidence. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. It was held that this judgment would not be reversed, because no error had been assigned on the misleading character of the statement of the court in overruling the defendant's motion, which the defendant claimed prevented him from introducing evidence. There is dictum in this case that if the defendant's claim were established, it would defeat the plaintiff's cause of action, and judgment to the amount of the court's jurisdiction could be rendered for the defendant, and he would be presumed to have waived the excess by filing his counterclaim in such court.

In Haygood v. Boney, 43 S. C. 63, 20 S. E. 803, an action for work and labor, it was held that the defendant could not counterclaim in tort for a sum in excess of the jurisdictional amount. There is dictum to the effect that the defendant might reduce his counterclaim to a sum within the jurisdictional amount, in which case the court would have jurisdiction to hear and determine it.

So, in Cane v. Culbreath, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 35 S. W. 809, an action for rent, it was held that the defendant could not counterclaim for work and labor and for damages in excess of the jurisdictional amount.

In Johnson v. W. H. Goolsby Lumber Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 121 S. W. 883, the defendant, with whom others were joined pro forma, in an action for materials used in the construction of a house, was held not to have the right to counterclaim against one of his codefendants for an amount in excess of the court's jurisdiction.

In Henry Bill Pub. Co. v. Curtis, 1 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 476, 7 Ohio N. P. 202, under a statute which provided that after a transcript on appeal was filed, the appellate court should proceed in all respects as though the case had been originally brought there, it was held that the defendant could prosecute a counterclaim only in such sum as that of which the magistrate had jurisdiction, unless the plaintiff filed an answer to the counterclaim, or did some other act by which he submitted to the jurisdiction.

And so, in Malson v. Vaughn, 23 Cal. 61, an action against the maker and indorser of a note, it was held that the maker could not plead in defense a set-off or counterclaim against the indorser (who was the payee) in excess of the jurisdictional amount of the court.

In Milliken v. Gardner, 37 Pa. 456, an action on a duebill given upon the settlement of accounts between the parties, it was held that the defendant could not prove error in settling the accounts, and set up a counterclaim for the amount of the error which exceeded the jurisdiction of the court.

And in Newman v. McCallum, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 111, an action on a note, it was held that the defendant could not plead in reconvention two separate and distinct claims for damages for an amount in excess of the jurisdiction, but that he might be allowed to amend his pleading in reconvention, and ask for an amount within the jurisdiction of the court.

In denying a writ of prohibition to restrain the lower court from proceeding with a case in which a counterclaim in excess of jurisdiction was filed, the court in People ex rel. Brownson v. Marine Ct. 36 Barb. 341, states that the court would have power to render judgment not exceeding the jurisdictional limit, and if defendants refused to take judgment for such an amount only, the court should dismiss the suit. It appears from the statement of facts, however, that judgment was asked in the counterclaim only for the jurisdictional amount. The writ was denied, however, on the ground that the action was brought prematurely.

In Russell v. Conway, 5 U. C. Q. B. 256, it is stated that the defendant may prove his counterclaim only up to the jurisdictional limit, by pleading set-off to that amount, and making claim to have it allowed, but may be presented, the question determined is limited to $200 or less, to wit, the amount required to defeat the plaintiff's claim, and is no more forbidden by the Constitution than in cases where the excess of a larger counterclaim is remitted to $200, or an equitable defense has been entertained in bar of plaintiff's demand. Under our former system and in actions at law, this principle of balancing one claim against another was much more restricted than at present, and was included in the general term, "set-off," confined usually to actions of debt or indebitatus assumpsit for a moneyed demand and of a liquidated nature. It was so held with us in Lindsay v. King, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 401, but under the present system, by which actions at law and suits in equity are instituted and determined in one and the same court, and as far as permissible in one and the same action, the doctrine has been included and very much extended under the general term "counterclaim." In Smith v. French, 141 N. C. 6, 53 S. E. 437, the court said: "Our statute on counterclaim is very broad in its scope and terms, is designed to enable parties litigant to settle well-nigh any and every phase of a given controversy in one and the same action, and should be liberally construed by the court in furtherance of this most desirable and beneficial purpose." And, after quoting our statutory provisions on the subject, said further: "Subject to the limitations expressed in this statute, a counterclaim includes well-nigh every kind of cross de-it was held that where he does not so plead, but no objection is taken to the jurisdiction, a judgment for the difference between the plaintiff's demand and the jurisdictional limit will not be disturbed.

In Davis v. Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. 38 L. T. N. S. 769, 47 L. J. C. P. N. S. 503, L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 228, 26 Week. Rep. 431, under a statute giving the court jurisdiction when a counterclaim is in excess of the jurisdiction, to dispose of the whole matter in controversy, it was held that the court might consider a counterclaim in excess of jurisdiction, but not grant relief beyond so much as would be a defense, either by way of counterclaim or set-off to the plaintiff's claim. The court distinguished between using a counterclaim as a mere defense and as a counterclaim, but the effect of this decision would seem to be that, at least, it was used merely to defeat the plaintiff's claim. See also Smith v. Burke, 10 Johns. 110, infra.

So, in Maxfield v. Johnson, 30 Cal. 546, there is dictum to the effect that the defendant cannot file a counterclaim in excess of the justice's jurisdiction. It is stated, however, that the counterclaim was not legally filed, and it is not clear that jurisdiction would not have been retained if it had been rightly filed.

On the contrary, in Howard Iron Works v. Buffalo Elevating Co. 176 N. Y. 1, 68 N. E. 66, reversing 81 App. Div. 386, 81 N. Y. Supp. 452, it was held that a counterclaim for damages growing out of the contract on which the plaintiff sued, in excess of the jurisdictional amount, on which judgment was demanded, could be heard and determined by the court. It is stated that the amount of the plaintiff's claim is the sole test of determining the jurisdiction of the court, and when the plaintiff has brought his action in a court of limited jurisdiction, the right of that court to try and render judgment on any counterclaim the defendant has follows the case as a necessary incident of the jurisdiction, without regard to its amount. A statute governing this case provided that when a court has jurisdiction of an action or special proceedings, it possesses the same jurisdictional power and authority as a court of general jurisdiction.

In Heigle v. Willis, 50 Hun, 588, 3 N. Y. Supp. 497, under a jurisdictional statute which is not set out in the opinion, but which is stated by the court to relate only to plaintiff's cause of action, it was held that the court might hear and determine a counterclaim growing out of the transaction which was the basis of plaintiff's claim, in excess of the jurisdictional amount.

In Wood v. O'Ferrall, 19 Ohio St. 427, the plaintiff filed a reply to a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdiction, and trial was had, and the parties by their pleadings were held to have waived the jurisdictional question, and the appellate court to have exercised original and not appellate jurisdiction.

So, where a balance is claimed which is in excess of the jurisdictional amount, the court has no jurisdiction. Picquet v. Cormick, Dudley (Ga.) 20; Seafkas v. Evey, 29 Ill. 178; Alexander v. Peck, 5 Blackf. 308; Gharkey v. Halstead, 1 Ind. 389.

So, in State, Clancy, Prosecutor, v. Neumeyer, 51 N. J. L. 299, 17 Atl. 154, it is stated that a set-off of an amount in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and which could not be reduced within the jurisdiction by crediting plaintiff's claim, cannot be heard and determined by the justice. It does not appear, however, in this case, that the defendant offered to reduce his claim by crediting plaintiff's, or that he demanded anything less than the full amount of his claim.

In Orr v. Foot, 2 Brev. 379, a summary process on a promissory note, where the defendant gave notice of a discount, and offered in discount as much of a certain note held by him as would be sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's demand, it was held that the court could not take jurisdiction, the judge stating that the defendant could not divide or reduce his cause of action so as to bring any part or the balance of it within the summary jurisdiction of the court. The defendant apparently sought only to defeat the plaintiff's claim, but it does not appear that it was pleaded as a defense merely.

mand existing in favor of defendant against the plaintiff in the same right, whether said demand be of a legal or an equitable nature. It is said to be broader in meaning than set-off, recoupment, or cross action, and includes them all, and secures to defendant the full relief which a separate action at law, or a bill in chancery, or a cross bill would have secured to him on the same state of facts." Several of the earlier New York decisions showed a disposition to establish some of the common-law restrictions on the relief available under their statutory counterclaim, and confine this user of one claim against another to the old technical doctrine of set-off, and Mr. Green, in his work on Code Pleading and Practice, comments on the doctrine of these cases as follows: "Now, if the term 'counterclaim' includes set-off and recoupment, and, in fact, nearly all counterclaims are either set-offs or recoupments, how is it, and why is it, that a set-off may be interposed as a defense, and that a counterclaim cannot? Or why should the same state of facts be a good defense when called a 'set-off,' and liable to demurrer when called a 'counterclaim?' There seems to be literally no sense at all in the distinction here made between a 'counterclaim' and a 'set-off;' and such hairsplitting is even worse than that under the old system in regard to the distinctions between the actions of trespass and case." And further the author says: "Indeed, it makes no difference what name a party may give to his pleading under the

In Wells v. Reynolds, 3 Brev. 407, a defendant in a summary process who had completed a set-off by way of defense, which was over the jurisdictional amount, and on the trial offered to relinquish a part of his demand and set off the remainder, was held not entitled to do this, as the demand consisted of one entire sum. See also Wood v. O'Ferrall, 19 Ohio St. 427, supra.

2. Where counterclaim is pleaded as a defense merely.

Where the counterclaim is pleaded as a defense merely, the fact that it is above the jurisdictional amount of the court does not prevent the court's determining its validity as such defense. McClennahan v. Cotten, 83 N. C. 332. See opinion in STACEY CHEESE CO. v. PIPKIN.

So, in Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft Bros. 155 N. C. 63, 71 S. E. 61, a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdictional amount of the justice was allowed to defeat a claim of the plaintiff. Nothing is said on the question of defense merely, in the prevailing opinion, except that it relies on the case of McClennahan v. Cotten, supra. One of the judges in a concurring opinion discusses this point, and sustains it on the ground that the jurisdiction of the appellate court is original, and not derivative. It does not clearly appear whether this claim was exhibited for the first time in the appellate court or not.

So, in Temple v. Bradley, 14 Vt. 254, it was stated that in an action on a book account, the defendant might plead a book account in excess of the jurisdictional amount as a defense merely, but may not obtain judgment for the balance thereon, under a statute which provides that no demand shall be allowed in offsetting any actions before a justice, unless the same would have been within the jurisdiction of the justice if an action had been commenced thereon. It does not appear that this statement was more than dictum, as the defendant's claim was apparently within the jurisdiction of the court, and the decision was based on this ground.

See also on this question Orr v. Foot and Wells v. Reynolds, supra.

3. Where a balance within the jurisdictional amount is claimed.

(a) In general.

On this question there is a greater difference in the decisions. The better considered cases hold that where the claims are entirely independent, and where there has been no previous agreement to accept the claim set forth by the defendant as payment of the claim sued upon by the plaintiff, and therefore it becomes necessary to adjudicate or pass upon the entire claim, the court does not acquire jurisdiction to grant an affirmative judgment, even though the balance is within the jurisdictional amount; but where there has been an agreement to accept the claim of the defendant as payment, or a waiver of the excess by the defendant, so that it is not necessary for the court to adjudicate as to an amount in excess of his jurisdiction, it does acquire jurisdiction, where the balance is within the jurisdictional amount. As stated above, however, the decisions are not in accord on this point.

In General Electric Co. v. Williams, 123 N. C. 51, 31 S. E. 288, an action for goods sold and delivered, it was held that the court had no jurisdiction of a counterclaim set up by the defendant in excess of the plaintiff's claim, but which is remitted so that it is equal to the plaintiff's claim, and, in addition thereto, another counterclaim of the defendant in excess of jurisdiction, which excess is remitted by him. The court distinguishes between payment and counterclaim by saying that payment extinguishes the debt and is itself extinguished, while a counterclaim is an assertion of an independent demand which might be the subject of an independent action. Payment extinguishes the debt at the time of payment, while a set-off requires mutual existing debts and operates as payment only when pleaded, and by judgment of the court.

So, in Lancaster, Ohio, Mfg. Co. v. Colgate, 12 Ohio St. 345, it was held that the Code system, if the facts constitute a good cause of action or ground of defense." In the line of these comments, and in direct support of the disposition we make of the present appeal, are the well-considered decisions in our own court of Hurst v. Everett, 91 N. C. 399, and McClenahan v. Cotten, 83 N. C. 333. In Hurst v. Everett plaintiff sued before a justice of the peace in five separate actions on five separate promissory notes, aggregating $800. These actions were consolidated in the superior court, but this in no way affects the bearing of the decision on the point presented. Defendant claimed damages for breach of warranty in failing to supply goods of the quality contracted for, to the amount of $400; the sale and warranty attached to one entire transaction, to wit, a single sale. It was objected that, as this was for breach of warranty in an indivisible transaction, the claim was not available as a set-off to plaintiff's actions in the court of a justice of the peace. The lower court sustained plaintiff's objection, and on appeal this court, in reversing the judgment, after referring to the effect of our statute extending the doctrine of set-off to all matters embraced within our statutory counterclaim, said further on the question chiefly involved: "This view of the case, founded upon the statutes, the authorities, and the 'reason of the thing,' leads us to the conclusion that when the defendants were sued, no matter whether for goods sold and delivered, or upon one of the notes given in payment therefor, they court did not acquire jurisdiction to hear the defendant's claim for unliquidated damages in excess of the jurisdiction, by the defendant's asserting only so much of said claim as would not exceed the jurisdiction of the justice, under a statute giving the defendant the right, without remitting excess, to withhold setting the same off, and providing that a recovery for the amount set off and allowed, or any part thereof, should not be a bar to a subsequent action for the amount withheld.

So, in Woolever v. Stewart, 36 Ohio St. 146, 38 Am. Rep. 569, under a similar statute it was held that an unliquidated demand in excess of the jurisdiction could not be split up and only an amount equal to the jurisdiction pleaded, but that the excess must be remitted, or the justice would be without jurisdiction.

So, in Kilgore Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 95 Ark. 43, 128 S. W. 62, supra, an action for goods sold and delivered, it was held that the defendant could not plea a counterclaim in liquidated damages on an independent cause of action, notwithstanding only a balance within the court's jurisdiction was claimed to be due, and a statute which provided that a set-off or counterclaim, though exceeding in amount the jurisdiction of the court, might be used to bar and extinguish the demand of the plaintiff, but that no judgment should be rendered in favor of the defendant for the excess unless such excess was within the limits of the court's jurisdiction as to amount, was held unconstitutional.

So, in Gimbel v. Gomprecht, 89 Tex. 497, 35 S. W. 470, an action on an account under which goods had been attached and sold, it was held that the defendants could not plead in reconvention damages, actual and exemplary, in excess of the court's jurisdiction, and, by admitting the plaintiff's claim, bring the balance within the jurisdiction and ask for judgment for this balance only. It is stated that the claim for damages does not operate as an extinguishment of the plaintiff's debt, nor does the plaintiff's debt operate as an extinguishment pro tanto of the defendants' claim for 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) damages, but the two classes of claims are not such as of themselves would have the effect to extinguish each other, until ascertained by the court and by its judgment thus applied.

Similar facts and holding appear in Smith v. Dye, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 662, 52 S. W. 981. The court in this case stated that the total amount of damages is in litigation and subject to controversy; that, before the defendant is entitled to extinguishment of any of the demands asserted by the plaintiff, he will be required to prove that he has sustained the damages alleged in his plea of reconvention, and he cannot arbitrarily dispose of a part of those damages and thereby say that it is not in litigation, by undertaking to credit it on the plaintiff's demands, and thus reduce the amount of damages sued for to the jurisdiction of the justices' court.

So, in Pennybacker v. Hazlewood, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 183, 61 S. W. 153, an action for rent of a farm and for damages, it was held that the defendant could not plead in reconvention that, under the contract of lease, he had made certain improvements at a stated price, which amounted to a sum in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and, by admitting his indebtedness for the rent claim, and claiming only a balance due within the jurisdiction of the court, thus give the court jurisdiction.

In Clark v. Smith, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 363, 68 S. W. 532, it was held, in passing upon the question as to whether or not the judgment of a court in dismissing a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdiction, and passing upon the plaintiff's claim, was a final judgment for purposes of appeal, that the counterclaim, being in excess of the jurisdictional amount, could not be heard by the court, notwithstanding an attempt to reduce the amount by offsetting part against the plaintiff's claim, and therefore the judgment of the lower court was a final judgment, from which an appeal would lie.

And in Times Pub. Co. v. Hill, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 81 S. W. 806, an action on an open account, it was held that the defendant could not plead a breach of contract and had the right to recoup the damages they had sustained to the amount of the sum claimed in the plaintiff's complaint, and so on in each action, 'toties quoties,' until the amount of their damages should be exhausted. And this defense, having attached to the action while in the justice's court, followed the cases on appeal; and when the several actions were consolidated in the superior court, the defendants had the right to recoup the whole amount of such damages as they might be able to prove they had sustained, from the plaintiff's recovery." In McClenahan v. Cotten, the court spoke of the rights available to a defendant under a counterclaim as follows: "The question now arises, How may a party use and rely on his cross demand? The answer is, he may plead it or not at his will, but, if he elect to plead it, he may do so, and then, if it be equal to or greater than the opposing demand, he may plead it in bar as formerly, or plead it as a defense, so called, under the Code, the plea or defense having the operation merely to defeat the action, and not to admit of any judgment for an excess; or he may, if he will, instead of pleading it as a bar merely, set up his demand under the name and with the proper prayer of a counterclaim as introduced by the Code, and then the defendant will have judgment for the excess. This construction is within the words of the Code, and is just in itself, for no reason can be given why A, having a debt of $200 against B, who has a debt of $1,000 on him, should have judg-consequent damages in an amount in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, although he asked for judgment for an amount within the jurisdiction, as the damages alleged were greatly in excess. It is not clear from the report of this case whether or not the amount sought to be recovered was the amount remaining after defeating the plaintiff's claim. It would seem that the defendant had waived the excess from the statement of the case, but nothing is said as to this.

In Williamson v. Bodan Lumber Co. 36 Tex. Civ. App. 446, 82 S. W. 340, an action for services, it was held that the defendant could not set up a counterclaim on an account for an amount in excess of the jurisdiction of the justice, and, by admitting part of the plaintiff's claim and pleading his claim as an offset thereto, in addition demand judgment for an amount equal to the jurisdictional amount of the justice. It is stated that the demand was a lump sum, and the court would have been called to inquire into the correctness of the entire claim, and in doing this would have gone into an amount in excess of the jurisdiction. It seems here also that the defendant might have been regarded as waiving the excess, but nothing is said as to this in the opinion. See cases below on waiver of excess.

So, in Almeida v. Sigerson, 20 Mo. 497, it was held that a defendant could not, by crediting his claim against the plaintiff's and demanding judgment for the balance only, which was an amount within the jurisdiction, thus give the court jurisdiction, as the effect would be suing on the whole sum, and asking that a sum equal to the amount of the plaintiff's claim be applied in the extinguishment of that claim.

The case of Reed v. Snodgrass, 55 Mo. 180, is a case with similar facts, except that the defendant withdrew his set-off after taking exception to the ruling of the appellate court refusing to permit him to support such set-off with testimony, and the reviewing court says that it is perhaps not necessary to pass upon the correctness of the ruling, but cites with approval the case 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of Almeida v. Sigerson, supra.

So, in Pioneer Sav. & L. Co. v. Wilson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 39 S. W. 1095, an action by a real estate agent for commissions, the defendant was held not entitled to set off a sum paid the plaintiffs, and a claim for damages in an amount in excess of the jurisdiction, although he asked judgment for only so much of the said sum as the court had jurisdiction to render judgment for. The court states that his claim was in excess of jurisdiction, as he had asked judgment for the amount of the payment, and also for an amount equal to the jurisdictional amount on the claim for damages, thus making a total in excess of the jurisdictional amount.

In Cable Co. v. Rogers, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 620, 99 S. W. 736, an action on notes given in part payment of the purchase price of goods, the balance of which had been paid in cash and property, it was held that the defendant could not plead in reconvention a failure of consideration of the notes, asking for their cancelation and the return of the money already paid, and the property or its value in money, where the total amount of the property and money, together with the notes sued upon, exceeded the jurisdictional amount of the court, as the effect of the counterclaim was for the rescission of a contract which involved a sum in excess of the jurisdiction. The excess of the counterclaim above the jurisdictional amount was remitted, but the court treated the total amount of the contract as determining jurisdiction.

In Rylie v. Elam, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 326, overruling — Tex. Civ. App. —, 58 S. W. 51, it was held that the court has no jurisdiction of a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdictional amount, although it was sought to bring it within such amount by crediting the plaintiff's claim thereon; but as nothing was allowed on the counterclaim, no reversible error resulted.

In Pickett v. Edwards, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 25 S. W. 32, a defendant was held not entitled to plead in counterclaim a note ment for his debt without the right in B to defeat the action by a plea of his larger debt as a set-off in bar. Such a distinction between set-off set up as a bar and as a technical counterclaim is laid down as proper to be taken, by an intelligent writer (Bliss on Code Pleading, § 368), and is recognized and admitted under the Code in New York. Tillinghast & S. Pr. 158; Burrall v. De Groot, 5 Duer, 379; Prentiss v. Graves, 33 Barb. 621. In our opinion, therefore, the judgment, if not otherwise liable to objection, was properly pleadable as a defense, formerly a plea in bar, without any remittitur whatever, and that there was no error in the ruling on this point except in requiring the excess above plaintiff's demand to be remitted, which was an error against the defendant of which the plaintiff cannot complain." And in that case the decision of the court expressly holds: "A defendant, sued on contract in a justice's court, may plead as a defense an independent cross demand arising ex contractu, the principal of which is beyond the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace." The same principle is applied in many well-considered decisions of this court holding that an equit-bearing interest on which a payment had been made, and which, if the payment were applied to the principal, would have reduced the note to the jurisdictional amount. The court states that, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the payment will be applied to the extinguishment of of the interest first, and the balance to the principal, thus leaving the amount claimed beyond the jurisdiction. A statute in this case provided for determining the jurisdictional amount by the claim exclusive of interest.

In Finch v. Ives, 28 Conn. 115, where the statute provided that a balance in set-off of only a certain amount could be recovered, the defendant, who gave notice of a claim that he would, if necessary, set off against the plaintiff's claim, but asked for no judgment, cannot thereafter obtain a judgment for the balance on a claim that he had previously put in judgment in a separate action, and which had not accrued at the time of the commencement of the plaintiff's suit.

On the contrary, in Mulhaul v. Feller, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 663, an action of attachment, it was held that the defendant might plead in reconvention damages in excess of the jurisdictional amount, when, by deducting the plaintiff's claim, the balance is brought within the jurisdictional amount, and judgment is asked for this balance. This case relies upon Dalby v. Murphy, 25 Tex. 354, infra. The court, in Gimbel v. Gomprecht, 89 Tex. 497, 35 S. W. 470, supra, distinguishes the case of Dalby v. Murphy from the facts of the case which the court was considering. The case of Mulhaul v. Feller is referred to in that opinion also, and nothing further is said with reference to it than that the facts do not fully appear, and that it is not in point in the case which the court is there considering. There seems, however, to be little distinction between this case and the case of Gimbel v. Gomprecht, especially with reference to the reason given for the decision in the latter case, and it seems that that case overrules the case of Mulhaul v. Feller.

Likewise, in the following cases it was held that the court had jurisdiction of the counterclaim:

—where the defendant admitted the plain-

tiff's claim, and claimed only a balance within the jurisdiction. Glass v. Moss, 1 How. (Miss.) 519;

—where the defendant claimed judgment for the amount that might be found due him after deducting what might be found due the plaintiff, not to exceed the jurisdictional amount. Pate v. Shafer, 19 Ind. 173;

—where, in an action on mutual accounts, the defendant set off an account, the total amount of which was in excess of the jurisdictional amount, but the balance was within the jurisdictional amount, a statute providing that all claims of each party which do not exceed $100 shall be brought forward, and also that all debts or demands originally exceeding $100, if reduced below that sum by fair credits, shall be within the jurisdiction. Nichols v. Ruckells, 4 Ill. 298;

—where a set-off in excess of the jurisdiction was filed, but only a balance within the jurisdiction was claimed. West v. Hatfield, Morris (Iowa) 493; South v. Hall, 1 N. J. L. 29.

(b) Where counterclaim is treated as a payment or extinguishment of plaintiff's claim.

Where the counterclaim is in the nature of a payment of the plaintiff's claim, and the balance is within the jurisdictional amount of the court, the court may hear and determine the claim. Thus, in Eule v. Dorn, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 520, 92 S. W. 828, a defendant who previously agreed with the plaintiff to ship some goods to market upon the plaintiff's guaranty that they would sell for a stated sum, and to apply the purchase price thereof to the extinguishment of the plaintiff's debt which was being sued upon, may counterclaim in damages for breach of the guaranty, although the amount of such damages exceeds the jurisdictional amount of the court, but the balance is within such amount.

And in Dalby v. Murphy, 25 Tex. 354, an action on an account and note, it was held that the defendant might plead that he delivered goods in payment of the sum, to an amount in excess of the justice's jurisable defense may be interposed to defeat a recovery in a justice's court, though affirmative equitable relief in such court is not allowed, as in Garrett v. Love, 89 N. C. 205; Lutz v. Thompson, 87 N. C. 334. In all the cases examined, except the two heretofore mentioned, which seem to uphold a contrary view, as in General Electric Co. v. Williams, 123 N. C. 51, 31 S. E. 288; Derr v. Stubbs, 83 N. C. 539, etc., the claimant continued to insist on his right to recover on his counterclaim an amount in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, and such claim was very properly denied. Even the two cases referred to

—that is, Raisin v. Thomas, 88 N. C. 148, and Meneely v. Craven, 86 N. C. 364—perhaps permit of that interpretation, but to the extent that these cases hold that a valid demand by way of counterclaim cannot be had as a defense to an action in justice's court, because the entire amount of same is in excess of such jurisdiction. We are of opinion that these cases are not well decided. In the cases themselves, and in others which refer to them with apparent approval, the decisions seem to lay much stress upon the form of the statement that it was set forth as a counterclaim, but substantial diction, and recover the balance, which was within the jurisdiction.

And in Bowler v. Osborne, 75 N. J. L. 903, 70 Atl. 149, reversing 74 N. J. L. 216, 64 Atl. 697, the defendant was held entitled to plead a note on which the amount of principal and interest exceeded the jurisdictional amount of the court, where he admitted the plaintiff's claim, and, without objection from the plaintiff, trial was had, since, there being no objection by the plaintiff to crediting the amount of his claim on the defendant's claim, the amount in dispute would be the balance, and this was within the jurisdiction of the court. It appears in this case that the plaintiff requested an instruction to the jury to the effect that if they should find more than the jurisdictional amount due the defendant, the defendant could not recover. This instruction was refused, and thereupon the defendant waived the excess. No question seems to have been raised as to the effect of the waiver, except as to the right to make it at the time it was made.

(c) Where there was a waiver of the excess.

Where the defendant's bill of particulars shows an amount in excess of the jurisdictional amount, but a claim is made for an amount within the jurisdiction only, the court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause, under a statute providing that the defendant may waive the excess of his claim over the jurisdictional amount. State, Loc'lanowski, Prosecutrix, v. McKeone, 60 N. J. L. 118, 36 Atl. 882, affirmed in 61 N. J. L. 288, 41 Atl. 1117.

So, under a similar statute, in Derr v. Stubbs, 83 N. C. 539, it was held that the defendant must remit the excess over the jurisdictional amount absolutely, and that he cannot remit all but an amount sufficient to offset the plaintiff's claim, and obtain a judgment in addition to an amount equal to the jurisdictional amount of the court, as the constitutional provision contemplates keeping the claim within the prescribed limits, and to allow such a claim would be to pass upon the validity of an account exceeding those limits.

jurisdiction where the defendant waived all in excess of the jurisdictional amount. A concurring opinion in this case took a view different from that of the majority as to the amount really waived.

In Barber v. Kennedy, 18 Minn. 216, Gil. 196, it was held that the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause where the counterclaim, although in excess of the jurisdictional amount, was reduced by the defendant, and judgment claimed for only the jurisdictional amount, and no objection was made by the plaintiff. It is not clear from the opinion that the defendant objected in the court in which the trial was had, to the jurisdiction of that court on the ground that the amount in controversy was beyond the jurisdictional amount of the court. On one jurisdictional point objection was made by him, and disallowed because made for the first time in the reviewing court.

So, in Haygood v. Boney, 43 S. C. 63, 20 S. E. 803, it is stated that the defendant might reduce his counterclaim to a sum within the jurisdictional amount, but it does not clearly appear that this statement was more than dictum in this case.

So, in Robinett v. Nunn, 9 Mo. 248, there is dictum to the effect that the defendant may waive a portion of his demand so as to bring it within the jurisdictional amount of the justice.

See also on this point the cases of Kienzle v. Gardner, 73 N. J. L. 258, 63 Atl. 10, supra; Newman v. McCallum, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 111, supra; Times Pub. Co. v. Hill, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 81 S. W. 806, supra; Bennett v. Forrest, 69 Fed. 421, supra.

In Scott v. Mexican Nat. R. Co. 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 496, 18 S. W. 136, it was held in an action against a railway company for services as engineer, that the railway company might plead in recoupment damages in excess of the jurisdiction, by waiving such excess. See Times Pub. Co. v. Hill, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 81 S. W. 806; Williamson v. Bodan Lumber Co. 36 Tex. Civ. App. 446, 82 S. W. 340; and Mulhaul v. Feller, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 663, supra; and Ostrom v. Tarver, infra.

On the contrary, in Ostrom v. Tarver, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 28 S. W. 701, it was rights should not to that extent be made a matter of form.

In numerous and repeated decisions of this court, we have held that neither a particular form of statement nor a special prayer for relief should be allowed as determinative or controlling, but that rights are declared and justice administered on the facts which are alleged and properly established. Virginia-Carolina Peanut Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 155 N. C. 148, 71 S. E. 71; Williams v. Carolina & W. R. Co. 144 N. C. 498-505, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 191, 57 S. E. 216, 12 Ann. Cas. 1000; Vorhees v. Porter, 134 N. C. 591, 65 L.R.A. 736, 47 S. E. 31; Bowers v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 107 N. C. 721, 12 S. E. 452. Defendant having pleaded, and the verdict having established, a counterclaim in his favor of $2.10, and plaintiff's claim being for a lesser sum, said defendant is entitled to have judgment entered that he go without day and recover costs. Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft Bros. 155 N. C. 63, 71 S. E. 61.

He is not entitled to a judgment for the excess, for that would be to uphold the justice's jurisdiction in excess of the constitutional provision, but to the amount required to defeat plaintiff's demand, to wit, $199, such court has jurisdiction, and may award relief by rendering judgment that defendant go without day.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Superior Court must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Clark, Ch. J., concurs that Raisin v. Thomas, 88 N. C. 148, and Meneely v. Craven, 86 N. C. 364, should be overruled, held that the court did not have jurisdiction of a plea in reconvention setting up an amount in excess of the jurisdiction, but waiving all in excess of such amount. Not a very full report of this case appears, and it is not clear whether or not the defendant sought to recover the jurisdictional amount after defeating plaintiff's claim.

II. In appellate court.

a. In general.

The jurisdiction of the appellate court is the same as that of the court in which the action was begun. Bunch v. Potts, 57 Ark. 257, 21 S. W. 437; Finch v. Ives, 28 Conn. 115; Purcell v. Booth, 6 Dak. 17, 50 N. W. 196; Picquet v. Cormick, Dudley (Ga.) 20; Turgrinson v. Meyer, 155 Ill. App. 553; Gharkey v. Halstead, 1 Ind. 389; Glass v. Moss, 1 How. (Miss.) 519; Raisin v. Thomas, 88 N. C. 148; Woolever v. Stewart, 36 Ohio St. 146, 38 Am. Rep. 569; Hinds v. Willis, 13 Serg. & R. 213; Holden v. Wiggins, 3 Penn. & W. 469; Walden v. Berry, 48 Pa. 456; Temple v. Bradley, 14 Vt. 254; Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft Bros. 155 N. C. 63, 71 S. E. 61; Cable Co. v. Rogers, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 620, 99 S. W. 730. See also Hurst v. Everett, 91 N. C. 399, supra.

On the contrary in Bowman v. Gary, Minor (Ala.) 326, an early Alabama case, it was held that an appellate court in which the trial is de novo acquires jurisdiction to hear and determine a set-off pleaded in the lower court, in excess of that court's jurisdiction.

And so, in Crannell v. Comstock, 12 Hun, 293, where the defendant's claim was greatly in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, and the cause was tried without objection apparently, and from a judgment an appeal was taken which was stated by the court not to have been on a question of law, the appellate court was held to have jurisdiction for all purposes of the trial, and judgment the same as if the action had been commenced in that court originally. 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Hurst v. Everett, 91 N. C. 399, where separate notes had been given for a purchase of goods which constituted a single transaction, and separate suits were brought on such notes in a court of limited jurisdiction, and the defendants set up a recoupment by way of damages, it was held that they could recoup the damages they had sustained to the amount of the sum claimed in the plaintiff's complaint, and so on in each action until the amount of their damages should be exhausted, and this defense, having attached to the action while in the justice's court, followed the cases on appeal, and when the several actions were consolidated in the appellate court, the defendants had the right to recoup the whole amount of such damage as they might be able to prove they had sustained.

b. Where counterclaim is first exhibited in appellate court.

So, where the counterclaim was exhibited for the first time in the appellate court, such court does not acquire jurisdiction to hear and determine a claim in excess of the jurisdiction of the court in which the action was begun. McLeod v. Gray, — Miss. —, 4 So. 544; Deihm v. Snell, 119 Pa. 316, 13 Atl. 283.

So, in Thompson v. Stone, 63 Kan. 881, 64 Pac. 969, where the defendant appeared and filed a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdiction of the court in which the action had been begun, without offering to withhold any portion of the same, it was held that the appellate court was without jurisdiction of such counterclaim.

In Meneely v. Craven, 86 N. C. 364, an action for the price of goods, in which the defendant set off a breach of warranty of the goods sued upon, it was held that the defendant could not set up a counterclaim arising from such breach of warranty so as to defeat the plaintiff's claim, and be the foundation of a judgment, for an amount which, together with the amount of the plaintiff's claim thus defeated, was in ex-

but finds no authority in the Constitution for the doctrine of derivative jurisdiction. It has been created solely by judicial construction. The jurisdiction of the superior court is fixed by the Constitution, and contains no limitation because the case may have been previously tried in another court. When the case gets into the superior court, its jurisdiction is general and unlimited, and it can make no difference whether the case was brought into the superior court by summons or by appeal. In either event, the case is in that court which has full jurisdiction to give an adequate remedy. I am therefore of an opinion that judgment should be rendered against the plaintiff, and in favor of the defendant, for the excess of the counterclaim pleaded and proven over and above the amount of the claim proven to be due the plaintiff by the defendant.

If, on appeal from the justice of the peace to the superior court, the inquiry were confined to the question whether error had been committed in the court below, there would be a logical basis for the doctrine of derivative jurisdiction. But on such appeal the trial is de novo, and it is proceeded with precisely as if it had been begun in the superior court, without any consideration as to whether the action of the justice was erroneous or not. There is therefore no reason to restrict the remedy to the limits of the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace. The case is tried exactly like any other in the superior court, and the remedy should not be restricted to that which might have been granted by a justice of the peace.

cess of the jurisdictional amount of the court. This case is modified by the decision in the principal case. It is stated in the opinion that no amendment can be permitted in the superior court after appeal, which serves to enlarge the sum demanded beyond the jurisdiction of the original court. It does not clearly appear, however, from the facts stated, that this was an amendment; the claim seems rather to have been first exhibited in the appellate court.

So, in Wagstaff v. Challiss, 31 Kan. 212, 1 Pac. 631, under a statute which provided that when the defendant has a claim against the plaintiff in a sum in excess of the jurisdictional amount, he may withhold setting off such excess, and a recovery for the amount set off shall not be a bar to a subsequent action for the amount withheld, it was held, in an action for the recovery of money only, that a defendant of whom no bill of particulars had been demanded until after the cause had been remanded to the appellate court by the supreme court, and who, upon demand therefor, filed a set-off in excess of the jurisdictional amount of the original court, and demanded the whole amount, was not entitled thus to set up his claim and have it determined by the court.

So, in Boyett v. Vaughan, 85 N. C. 363, reversing on rehearing 79 N. C. 528, the plaintiff was held not entitled to file a counterclaim in the appellate court in reply to a counterclaim of the defendant, which, with the amount of the plaintiff's original claim, exceeded the jurisdictional amount of the court in which the action had been begun. It is stated that it is the jurisdiction of the court in which the action was begun, which, on appeal, gives jurisdiction to the appellate court, and if the original court had no jurisdiction, the appellate court could have none, and therefore, by allowing an amendment in the appellate court which enlarges the cause of action beyond the jurisdiction of the original court, it must necessarily oust itself of jurisdiction.

In Beekman Lumber Co. v. Glendale Lumber Co. 158 Mo. App. 309, 138 S. W. 90, under a statute which provided that the defendant, to be entitled to set-off and demand, must give notice thereof, the defendant, who did not appear in the lower court, but took an appeal from the judgment against him, and did not plead the counterclaim in the appellate court, but relied on it merely as a defense, was held not to be entitled to introduce the claim in excess of the justice's jurisdiction. This case, however, is put on the ground of notice. It was urged in favor of the admissibility that it could be regarded as payment, but the court states that it could not be brought within that term, but must be regarded as a counterclaim, which, to entitle it to be heard, must be pleaded.

And in Ramer v. Smith, 4 Colo. App. 434, 36 Pac. 302, it was held that the jurisdiction to hear and try the plaintiff's claim could not be defeated by a counterclaim filed in the appellate court for the first time, in excess of the jurisdiction of the court in which the action had been begun. It is stated that the counterclaim which was presented in this case was not presented in such a manner as to be available to defeat the jurisdiction, and the case was thus decided upon a question of practice.

Under a statute which provides that where a set-off is pleaded in the justice's court, and the justice finds a balance in favor of the defendant, he shall enter up a judgment against the plaintiff for the sum that may appear due, it was held in McClain v. Kincaid, 15 Yerg. 232, that the defendant, against whom a judgment had been rendered in the justice's court, and who had appealed to the higher court, might set up a counterclaim in an amount in excess of the jurisdiction of the justice's court, if the balance, after deducting the plaintiff's claim, is within the jurisdiction.

But the amount of the judgment thus obtained by the defendant cannot exceed the jurisdiction of the justice's court, nor will the defendant be allowed to remit the excess in the supreme court, and thus validate the judgment. Crow v. Cunningham, 5 Coldw. 255.

But under a statute which provided that where a set-off is pleaded in the justice's court and satisfactorily proved, the justice shall give judgment for the overplus, provided it does not exceed the jurisdictional amount, and if it exceeds that amount, judgment is to be given to the defendant for costs, and provided the plaintiff does not object to the exercise of the jurisdiction,—a judgment in excess of the jurisdictional amount will not be reversed. Smith v. Fleming, 9 Ala. 768.

On the contrary, in Boone v. Boone, 17 Serg. & R. 386, it was held that where the plaintiff appealed from a judgment, the appellate court may hear and render judgment on a claim in excess of the jurisdictional amount of the original court, for the reason that, the plaintiff having brought the defendant before a tribunal that is incompetent to act on the subject of his defense, the jurisdiction of the appellate court will not be limited in this way, as the effect would be to frustrate the very purpose of the appeal.

In Richardson v. Chynoweth, 26 Wis. 656, the amounts did not appear, and it is not clear that the counterclaim was in excess of the jurisdiction, but it is stated by the court that the defendant may be allowed to amend by setting up a counterclaim in excess of the justice's jurisdiction, under a statute providing that an appeal case should be tried in the appellate court as if originally brought there. In this case the defendant had asked leave to amend in the lower court and set up a counterclaim, but this was denied as it would require an adjournment for the securing of evidence.

And where the plaintiff makes no objection to the jurisdiction of the appellate court, it was held in Gregg v. Garverick, 33 Kan. 190, 5 Pac. 761, that the plaintiff could not object in the supreme court to the jurisdiction of the appellate court of an action in which the defendant set up a counterclaim for an amount in excess of jurisdiction of the court in which the action was begun and trial was had. See also Smith v. Fleming, 9 Ala. 768, supra.

Where the defendant demanded judgment for costs only, the appellate court was held in Murphy v. Evans, 11 Ind. 517, to have jurisdiction of a counterclaim in excess of the jurisdictional amount of the court in which the action was begun, and to be competent to render judgment against the plaintiff for costs.

c. Where counterclaim is amended in appellate court.

In Boudon v. Gilbert, 67 Tex. 689, 4 S. W. 578, it was held that a defendant cannot in the appellate court enlarge his counterclaim, on which relief other than the defeat of the collection of the note sued on §7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the plaintiff was asked, to an amount which exceeded the jurisdiction of the court in which the action was begun, under a statute which provided that on appeal no set-off or counterclaim shall be set up by the defendant which was not pleaded in the court below. It was apparently under this prohibition of the statute that this case was decided.

In Cross v. Eaton, 48 Mich. 184, 12 N. W. 35, it was held that the appellate court cannot render judgment on a set-off in excess of the jurisdictional amount of the court in which the action was begun, under a statute which provided that if the balance found due the defendant exceeds the jurisdictional amount, the justice shall set off so much of the defendant's demand against the plaintiff's debt as shall be sufficient to satisfy it, if so requested by the defendant, and shall render judgment for the defendant for costs; and if the defendant shall not require such set-off, the justice shall render judgment of discontinuance against the plaintiff with costs.

But where the defendant counterclaimed in the justice's court for a balance within the court's jurisdiction, and after appeal to the higher court amended and asked judgment for a balance greatly in excess of the original court's jurisdiction, and no objection was made by the plaintiff until after the cause had been heard by arbitrators under an agreement, an objection to the jurisdiction of the court was waived, and it had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case. Jackson v. Swope, 49 Ind. 388.

Neither can the defendant reduce his claim in the appellate court to an amount within the jurisdiction of the court in which the action was begun. I James v. McClamroch, 92 N. C. 362; Brigman v. Aultman, M. & Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 55 S. W. 509. W. A. E.

CASUALTY COMPANY OF AMERICA,
Appt.

(232 Pa. 210, 81 Atl. 212.)

Insurance — accident — injury in taxicab — double indemnity.

A provision in an accident insurance policy, for double indemnity in case of injuries received while riding as a passenger in a public conveyance provided for passenger service and propelled by gasoline, applies

Note. — Insurance: scope and construction of provision for indemnity in case of injury while riding in or on a public conveyance.

The general question of the applicability of a provision in an accident insurance policy exempting the insurer in case of ap-to injuries received while a passenger in a taxicab hired from one engaged in the business of letting automobiles to the public generally for hire, whose chauffeur drove and controlled the vehicle.

(Mestrezat and Stewart, JJ., dissent.)

(July 6, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 1, for Philadelphia County, in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under a clause of an accident insurance policy providing for double payment in case of injuries received while riding as a passenger in a conveyance provided for passenger service. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas Leaming, for appellant:

The deceased was not a passenger, nor was the automobile a public conveyance provided for passenger service, within the terms of the contract of insurance.

McColligan v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 214 Pa. 229, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 544, 112 Am. St. Rep. 739, 63 Atl. 792.

Messrs. Ira Jewell Williams and Simpson & Brown, for appellee:

Insured was a passenger.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Price, 96 Pa. 256; Ryan v. Cumberland Valley R. Co. 23 Pa. 384; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Books, 57 Pa. 339, 98 Am. Dec. 229; O'Donnell v. Alle-

What constitutes public conveyance.

No case other than PRIMROSE v. CASUALTY Co. seems to have passed upon the question whether or not a taxicab hired by an insured falls within the term "public conveyance," but the question as to whether other transportation facilities constitute a public conveyance, within the meaning of such a term as used in an accident insurance policy, has arisen in a few instances. Thus, it has been held that traveling on a steamboat as a passenger is covered by a policy insuring against injuries sustained "while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam," although the steamboat was not a "public conveyance in the usual lines of travel as a common carrier of passengers." Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Frierson, 51 C. C. A. 424, 114 Fed. 56.

So, it has been held that injuries received on a steamboat chartered for a lump sum by a society for an excursion were covered by a policy insuring against injuries sustained while "actually riding as a passenger in a place regularly provided for the transportation of passengers, within a . . . steamboat . . . provided by a common carrier for passenger service only." Dunn v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. 141 App. Div. 478, 126 N. Y. Supp. 229, affirming on this point 67 Misc. 109, 121 N. Y. Supp. 686.

And in Berlinger v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 121 Cal. 458, 41 L.R.A. 467, 66 Am. St. Rep. 49, 53 Pac. 918, the court held that a provision for double insurance for injuries sustained "while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam" covers injuries sustained while riding as a passenger upon a locomotive of a passenger train, at the request of an official, it being said that a passenger train is to be considered as composed of the locomotive and cars forming a conveyance of which the locomotive is a part, and that the policy cannot be construed as excluding the insured 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

as a passenger while in any part of the conveyance, where not so excluded by apt words in the policy. But in connection with this case, see dictum in Brown v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 45 Mo. 221, to the effect that a locomotive, although a necessary part of, is not itself a conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers, it being said that a passenger would have no right to go upon the engine, and that if he was so indiscreet as to venture on such a place, and injury ensued, he would not be protected. And in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Austin, 116 Ga. 264, 59 L.R.A. 107, 94 Am. St. Rep. 125, 42 S. E. 522, a coach specially equipped and used as a pay car, and not a vehicle for the transportation of passengers, was held not a passenger car within the meaning of an insurance policy granting double indemnity to the insured if injured while riding as a passenger on a passenger car; and this although it had formerly been used as a passenger car, and was capable of being so used again.

What constitutes "traveling by" public conveyance.

In Champlin v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 6 Lans. 71, an insurance policy insuring against "any accident while traveling by public or private conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers" was held to insure against injuries received in attempting to jump on a moving public omnibus, the insured having succeeded in getting on the steps, where he was injured.

But traveling on foot along a public road from a steamboat upon which insured had been carried, to his home, was held not traveling by "public or private conveyance," in Ripley v. Railway Pass. Ins. Co. 16 Wall. 336, 21 L. ed. 469, affirming 2 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 738, Fed. Cas. No. 11,854. But see dictum in Hendrick v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 62 Fed. 893, to the effect that going from train to home would be a continuance of insured's journey, and within a policy covering injuries received while traveling "as a passenger in a public conveyance provided by a common carrier." And see Northrup v. Railway gheny Valley R. Co. 59 Pa. 239, 98 Am. Dec. 336; Creed v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 86 Pa. 139, 27 Am. Rep. 693; Hall v. Second & T. Street Pass. R. Co. 14 W. N. C. 242; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Rosenzweig, 113 Pa. 519, 6 Atl. 545; Ham v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 142 Pa. 617, 21 Atl. 1012; Hartzig v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 154 Pa. 364, 26 Atl. 310; Perry v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 41 Pa. Super. Ct. 591; Fox v. Philadelphia, 208 Pa. 127, 65 L.R.A. 214, 57 Atl. 356; Coryell v. Dubois, 226 Pa. 111, 75 Atl. 25.

The conveyance in which the insured was riding was owned by and operated by a common carrier, and hence there can be no doubt as to the applicability of the double indemnity clause.

Lloyd v. Haugh, 223 Pa. 148, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 188, 72 Atl. 516; Beckman v. Shouse, 5 Rawle, 187, 28 Am. Dec. 653; Smith v. Seward, 3 Pa. St. 342; Gordon v. Hutchinson, 1 Watts & S. 285, 37 Am. Dec. 464; Giffin v. South West Pennsylvania Pipe Lines, 172 Pa. 580, 33 Atl. 578; Fuller v. Bradley, 25 Pa. 120; Harrington v. M'Shane, 2 Watts, 443, 27 Am. Dec. 321; Robertson v. Kennedy, 2 Dana, 431, 26 Am. Dec. 466; The Huntress, 2 Ware, 89, Fed. Cas. No. 6,914; Buckland v. Adams Exp. Co. 97 Mass. 124, 93 Am. Dec. 68; Christenson v. American Exp. Co.

Pass. Assur. Co. 43 N. Y. 516, 3 Am. Rep. 724, reversing 2 Lans. 160, wherein a traveler's accident policy providing for payment of a certain sum in the event of death "when caused by any accident while traveling by public or private conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers," which contained no double indemnity provision, was held to cover death from injuries received while necessarily walking over the customary route between a steamboat landing and a railway station, for the purpose and in the actual prosecution of continuing by railway the journey with reference to which the insurance was taken; and this although insured might have procured a carriage to make the transfer, the usual method being to walk.

In Brown v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 45 Mo. 221, under a general accident, as contradistinguished from a mere passenger or traveling, policy, insuring against death "caused by accident while traveling by public or private conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers," it was held that a locomotive attached to a passenger train was a necessary part of a conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers, and that, as the policy was not limited to passengers, a locomotive engineer killed while operating his locomotive was within the terms of the policy.

Cases interpreting term "in or on."

The question as to what constitutes riding "in or on" a public conveyance has been decided in the following cases: Thus, it has been held that where the policy provides for double indemnity in case of injury "while riding as a passenger in or on a public conveyance," the policy cannot be limited to riding "inside" the cars, but covers death caused by being thrown from the platform of a public conveyance. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. v. Muir, 61 C. C. A. 456, 126 Fed. 926.

But a clause for double indemnity in case of injury received "while riding as a passenger in or on a public conveyance" was held, in Anable v. Fidelity & C. Co. 73 N. J. L. 320, 63 Atl. 92, affirmed on opinion 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

below in 74 N. J. L. 686, 65 Atl. 1117, not to cover the case of one who left the train on which he was traveling to procure a newspaper, and while the train was moving ran to it and grasped the hand rail of a car for the purpose of boarding the train to continue his intended journey, but, failing to retain his hold, fell and was injured, the court saying that in view of the double indemnity it was the obvious intent of the parties that the insured should remain aboard the train during his journey, and not incur the greater risk of getting on and off at intervals.

Cases interpreting term "on."

And the question as to what consists in riding "on" a public conveyance was involved in the following cases: Thus, in James v. United States Casualty Co. 113 Mo. App. 622, 88 S. W. 125, where insured ran and got a foothold on the platform of a street car just as it started, from which position he was either jostled by passengers or thrown from the car by a sudden jerk, it was held that insured was a passenger, within the meaning of a policy insuring against injury received while "actually riding as a passenger on a public conveyance."

And in Fidelity & C. Co. v. Morrison, 129 Ill. App. 360, in holding that insured was riding "on" a public conveyance within the meaning of a double indemnity policy insuring against injuries received while so riding, where he had procured a ticket and caught hold of the hand rail of a moving railway car which he wished to board, and got upon the platform of the car with one foot, the court said that the essential question was whether insured had become a passenger upon the train which he was attempting to board when injured.

So, in Powis v. Ontario Acci. Ins. Co. 1 Ont. L. Rep. 54, one injured while boarding a street car after he had got on the step or platform, but before the car had begun to move, was held to have been "riding as a passenger on a public conveyance," within the meaning of an accident policy providing for double indemnity for injuries received while so riding.

tural Iron Works v. Hurlbut, 158 N. Y. 34, 70 Am. St. Rep. 432, 52 N. E. 665; Shepard v. Jacobs, 204 Mass. 110, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 442, 134 Am. St. Rep. 648, 90 N. E. 392.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant company issued an accident insurance policy to Frank J. Primrose, the husband of the plaintiff, by the terms of which it covenanted to pay her $10,500 in the event of his sustaining bodily injuries which should result in his death. In addition to this, there was the following clause: "B. Double indemnity.—If

Cases interpreting term "in."

A number of cases have decided what constitutes riding or traveling "in" a public conveyance. Thus, it has been held that an insured is "riding as a passenger . . . in an elevator provided for passenger service," within the meaning of a policy providing for double indemnity for injuries received while so riding, where he was substantially in the door, as must have been the case, where his foot was caught between the floor of the car and the grating above the door, while the body was thrown outward. Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Davis, 191 Fed. 343. And an insured was held in Depue v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 166 Fed. 183, to have been riding "in" an elevator within a policy insuring against accidents, while "in a passenger elevator," where it appeared that the insured was found hanging head down in an elevator, having been caught between the roof of the car and the floor of the building, that no one saw the accident, and that the lever which controlled the operation of the elevator was on the inside. In this case the policy did not contain a double indemnity clause, and this may have led to the liberal construction of the clause under consideration.

So, in Theobald v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 10 Exch. 45, 26 Eng. L. & Eg. Rep. 436, 2 C. L. R. 1034, 23 L. J. Exch. N. S. 249, 18 Jur. 583, 2 Week. Rep. 528, injuries received in getting off a train were held to be covered by a policy insuring against injuries sustained "from railway accident whilst traveling in any class carriage on any line of railway," the court saying that, as the accident occurred while the insured was doing an act which, as a passenger, he must necessarily have done, he may not be considered as disconnected with the machinery of motion until he has safely descended.

And it has been held that a provision for double indemnity for injuries sustained "while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using . . . electricity as a motive power" covers injuries sustained while attempting to alight from a moving electric street car, such provision, in the absence of words requiring a different construction, being said to protect from the moment of entering until the passenger had alighted. King v. Travelers Ins. Co. 101 Ga. 64, 65 Am. St. Rep. 288, 28 S. E. 661. And injuries received while necessarily getting on or off a railway train were said, in Tooley v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 3 Biss. 399, Fed. Cas. No. 14,098, to be covered by a policy insuring against injuries received "while actually traveling in a public conveyance provided by common carriers for the transportation of passengers."

But in Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Vandecar, 30 C. C. A. 48, 67 U. S. App. 446, 86 Fed. 282, a provision for double indemnity for injuries received "while riding as a passenger in a passenger conveyance using steam" was held not to apply to one riding on the platform of a railroad car, it being said that the words "in a passenger conveyance" were doubtless used advisedly, and for the express purpose of limiting the insurer's liability to injuries received while riding "in" a passenger conveyance, which is a comparatively safe place. There was a vigorous dissent in this case, however, on the ground that the opinion of the majority attached undue importance to a single word, was highly technical, and did violence to the probable intention of the parties. But this decision, and the reasoning therein applied, were followed in Van Bokkelen v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 34 App. Div. 399, 54 N. Y. Supp. 307, affirmed without opinion in 167 N. Y. 590, 60 N. E. 1121 (two of seven judges dissenting), it being held that a passenger who lost his life by falling from the platform of a railroad car was not killed while "riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance," within the meaning of a policy providing for double indemnity in case of death while so riding, and single indemnity in other cases.

So, injuries received by an insured after alighting from a railroad train, while crossing the platform of a car to speak to the trainman about a matter entirely disconnected with the relation of a passenger, have been held not covered by a policy insuring one riding "as a passenger in a public conveyance provided by a common carrier." Hendrick v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 62 Fed. 893, G. J. C.

those injuries are received while riding as a passenger in or on a public conveyance provided for passenger service, and propelled by steam, compressed air, gasoline, naphtha, electricity, or cable, including passenger elevators, or while in a burning building, the amounts otherwise payable under clause A shall be doubled." While the policy was in force, the insured and several friends were riding in an automobile hired by them from the Pennsylvania Taximeter Cab Company. It was in the charge of and driven by a chauffeur in the employ of that company. The night was dark and foggy, and the machine left the road, striking a telegraph pole with such violence that all of the occupants were thrown out of it. Primrose sustained injuries from which he subsequently died. The appellant paid to the appellee the amount of the single indemnity, and in this action she recovered a judgment in the court below for the additional sum of $10,500, with interest; the trial judge having held that the injuries to the deceased were "received while riding as a passenger in a public conveyance provided for passenger service and propelled by gasoline." From that judgment, we have this appeal, to be disposed of under undisputed facts. No testimony was offered by the defendant, and there is no assignment of error complaining of anything proven by the plaintiff.

That the automobile in which the insured was riding was a conveyance is not questioned; that it was propelled by gasoline is conceded, and, if it was "a public conveyance provided for passenger service," the deceased was a passenger in it, within the terms of the double indemnity clause of the policy. The only question, then, is whether the conveyance was one embraced within that clause.

The contention of the learned counsel for the appellant is that the double indemnity clause is applicable only to the case of a person occupying a place for which he pays a fare in a railway car or conveyance operated for the common use of himself and of such promiscuous persons as may happen to take passage en route, over which conveyance he exercises no control. It is to be noted that the clause was inserted by the insurer itself in the policy of insurance which it issued to the insured, and, if it intended that the same should have the restricted meaning for which its counsel now contend, it could have readily so worded the clause. The insurance company could have so framed it that there would now be no doubt that the appellee could not insist that it was intended to extend to her claim. It is next to be remembered that, as the words used in the clause are the language of the insurer, a salutary rule of construction requires them to be construed most favorably to the insured (Hughes v. Central Acci. Ins. Co. 222 Pa. 462, 71 Atl. 923; May, Ins. § 175); and, for the same reason, if the clause is capable of two interpretations equally reasonable, that is to be adopted which is most favorable to the insured. Bole v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 169 Pa. 53, 28 Atl. 205; McKeesport Mach. Co. v. Ben Franklin Ins. Co. 173 Pa. 53, 34 Atl. 16. "If the language of the policy is doubtful or obscure, it will be construed most unfavorably to the insurer. Merrick v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 54 Pa. 277. A contract of insurance must have a reasonable interpretation, such as was probably in the contemplation of the parties when it was made; and when the words of a policy are, without violence, susceptible of two interpretations, that which will sustain a claim to the indemnity it was the object of the assured to obtain should be preferred. Humphreys v. National Ben. Asso. 139 Pa. 214, 11 L.R.A. 564, 20 Atl. 1047." Frick v. United Firemen's Ins. Co. 218 Pa. 409, 67 Atl. 743. As applied to the admitted facts in the present case, we regard the double indemnity clause as having but one meaning.

The Pennsylvania Taximeter Cab Company was engaged in the business of hiring automobiles to the public—"to the public generally," is the language of the witnesses describing its business. "Anybody at all" who was financially responsible could hire one. The secretary and treasurer of the company testified: "They would be hired to anyone for rides, or for other personal transportation as passengers, from wherever they might get them to wherever they might want to go." The machines, however, were never turned over to the control and management of those who hired them, but were always operated by a chauffeur or driver in the employ of the company. All that those who rode in them did was to direct where they were to go. They were as much passengers in them as they would have been if riding in a specially chartered car of a railroad company, from which all but themselves were excluded; the only difference being that, as automobiles do not run on rails, the occupants could select their own traveling route; and it is not to be pretended that the double indemnity clause does not include passengers riding on a specially chartered railroad car.

The words, "public conveyance provided for passenger service and propelled by gasoline," are to receive a reasonable meaning.

All conveyances are either for public or private use. The automobile in the case at bar was not one for merely private use. It belonged to a company which, as already stated, was engaged in the business of hiring automobiles for general public use. The use of no one of its machines was limited to any particular person, but anyone able to pay the price for the privilege of riding in it, while it was under the control of and being operated by one of the company's employees, could do so. In some cases a fare per head was charged for the use of the machine for a stipulated time, or for a specified journey; in other instances, there was a charge for the use of the car of so much by the hour, and, under this arrangement, the deceased and his friends hired the car in which they were riding.

Counsel for appellee have submitted most elaborate briefs in an effort to sustain the judgment of the court below, but no parallel case is found in the innumerable authorities cited by them, and the general principles upon which they rely are not questioned. We affirm the judgment, because the conditions contemplated by the double indemnity clause existed at the time the automobile struck the telegraph pole, and concur with the learned court below in its opinion that "the injuries to the deceased were 'received while riding as a passenger in a public conveyance provided for passenger service and propelled by gasoline,' within the reasonable meaning of, and the proper construction to be put upon, the policy."

Judgment affirmed.

General rules.

To be entitled to enforce such a covenant, the owner of land must either be the original covenantee or hold in privity of estate with him, unless the rights in question are of that class which when once acquired attach to the land and pass with it, irrespective of privity, into all hands, even those of a disseisor. 11 Cyc. 1080.

The right of a grantee to enforce restrictive covenants in a prior conveyance by his grantor of other property depends upon the intention of the parties to the prior conveyance as to the effect of the covenants; that is, if the restrictions were intended for the benefit of the grantor's other land, subsequently conveyed, the subsequent grantee is entitled to enforce the restrictive covenants. 11 Cyc. 1096; Nalder & C. Brewery Co. v. Harman, 83 L. T. N. S. 257; Riverbank Improv. Co. v. Bancroft, 209 Mass. 217, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 730, 95 N. E. 216; Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54; DeGray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388; Roberts v. Scull, 58 N. J. Eq. 396, 43 Atl. 583 (obiter); Fairmount Cemetery Asso. v. First Presby. Church, 60 N. J. Eq. 142, 46 Atl. 213; Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14, affirmed without opinion in 63 N. J. Eq. 804, 52 Atl. 1132; Brouwer v. Jones, 23 Barb. 153; Lydick v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 427.

As said in Clark v. McGee, 159 Ill. 518, 42 N. E. 965: "We think it well settled by the authorities that when the owner of two adjoining lots conveys one, and incorporates into the deed of the lot conveyed a covenant restricting the right of the grantee to build in a certain specified manner, which covenant is intended for the benefit of the other lot held by the grantor, a subsequent conveyance of the lot retained will pass or transfer the covenant to the grantee or grantees of such lot, as an easement for the benefit of the lot, and the grantee may enforce the covenant against the owner of the other lot in an appropriate action."

equity, as an agreement, a condition subsequent inserted by his grantor for the benefit of the latter's remaining land, in a prior conveyance of a lot. Watrous v. Allen, 57 Mich. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 363, 24 N. W. 104.

So, in Hayes v. Waverly & P. R. Co. 51 N. J. Eq. 345, 27 Atl. 648, the court said: "It is settled by adjudication in this state as a general rule that where a grantor, retaining a portion of the land out of which the grant is made, enters into an express written understanding with his grantee, whatever may be its form, whether covenant, condition, reservation, or exception, which restricts the enjoyment of the portion of the land which is conveyed, in order to benefit the portion retained, and the restriction is reasonable and consonant with public policy, whether it runs with the land and is binding at law or not, it will be enforced in equity against the grantee and anyone subsequently acquiring title to the land with notice of it, at the instance of the grantor or of the subsequent owner or owners of parts of the remaining land, when its violation results in material detriment to the portion of the remaining land which the complainant in the suit holds."

But if the covenants were intended merely for the personal benefit of the grantor, to enable him to make the most of his remaining property, they cannot be enforced by a subsequent grantee of another parcel of the grantor's land, though the enforcement would greatly benefit him as the owner of such parcel. Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 332, 50 L.R.A. 120, 57 N. E. 692; Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54.

Most of the cases, therefore, involving this right of a subsequent grantee, turn upon the question whether or not the restrictions in questions were made for the benefit of the property subsequently conveyed.

land conveyed are expressly made for the benefit of the grantor's remaining land, or where the whole language of the conveyance, alone or in connection with surrounding circumstances, shows that restrictive covenants therein are for such benefit, it is clear, under the general rule, that they may be enforced by a subsequent grantee of the land to be benefited, or any part thereof. Thus, where the owner of a block of land in a city has sold a lot with a restrictive covenant expressly declared to be for the benefit of the owners of lots then owned by the grantor, a subsequent grantee of one of such lots, with "all the easements, rights, covenants, privileges, benefits, and advantages belonging or appertaining" thereto, is entitled to enforce the covenant, so long as it remains of substantial value to him. Latimer v. Livermore, 72 N. Y. 174.

And where an owner of building land laid out in plots on each side of a highway, for the erection of large houses and mansions for residential purposes, has conveyed one plot thereof by indenture containing a covenant by the grantee for the benefit of the grantor, his heirs and assigns, and others claiming under him all or any of his land adjoining or near to the plot conveyed, that no more than one dwelling house shall at any one time be erected or be standing on the plot, and the grantor subsequently conveys a neighboring plot with a similar restrictive covenant,—although the second grantee at the time knows nothing of the covenant in the first indenture, the benefit of that covenant, annexed to the land, passes to him therewith, and he is entitled to enforce the covenant. Rogers v. Hosegood, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 59, 81 L. T. N. S. 515.

So, where a grantee has covenanted with the grantor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, not to erect any building on the part of the premises conveyed adjoining the remaining land of the grantor, a subsequent grantee of such remaining land is entitled to enforce the covenant for the benefit of his land. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Continental Ins. Co. 87 N. Y. 400 (obiter).

And where the owner of three adjoining city lots conveys them to different persons

Sweetland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity brought by Cassius C. Ball against Myrtis A. Milliken, praying that the respondent be ordered to convey to the complainant by quitclaim deed all her right, title, and interest in a certain parcel of land in the town of New Shoreham; and also, as alternative relief, that the respondent be enjoined from letting, leasing, or subletting said premises or any part thereof for any purposes other than those specifically set forth in a certain deed from Nicholas Ball to John W. Hooper.

It appears from the allegations of the bill and the testimony, that in 1861 one Nicholas Ball owned a tract of land in New by three separate deeds of the same date, each executed by both parties, and the description in each referring to the adjoining lot or lots as "intended to be this day granted" by the owner to the purchaser or purchasers of such adjoining lot or lots, respectively, the grantee of one of the outside lots may enforce a restrictive covenant in the deed of the middle lot against building thereon farther back than a certain distance from the line of the street, which restriction, by its terms, in the light of the facts, is susceptible of no other reasonable construction than that it was intended to create and did create an easement of light and air in favor of the adjoining lots. Muzzarelli v. Hulshizer, 163 Pa. 643, 30 Atl. 201.

Likewise, one holding land through sundry mesne conveyances, under a conveyance by a grantor who had previously conveyed neighboring property with certain restrictive covenants, the language of which permits no other conclusion than that they were made for the benefit of his then remaining land, may enforce such covenants against one deriving his title under the first deed, containing the covenants. Bowen v. Smith, 76 N. J. Eq. 456, 74 Atl. 675.

And a lessee of land may enforce a covenant in a prior conveyance by his lessor of other property, where, from the conveyance itself and the circumstances under which it was made, the intention of the parties is clear that the covenant was made for the benefit of the grantor's other land. Brockmeyer v. Sanitary Dist. 118 Ill. App. 49.

And in Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190, it was held that a grantee is entitled to the benefit of a restrictive covenant in a prior conveyance by his grantor of adjoining property, where, by the construction of the prior grant, it appears that it was the intention of the parties to create or reserve a right in the nature of a servitude in the land granted, for the benefit of the other land of the grantor subsequently conveyed.

—intention indicated by surrounding circumstances.

As held in BALL v. MILLIKEN, however,

Shoreham. That by deed dated June 12, 1861, he conveyed a certain part thereof about 90 feet square to one John W. Hooper. That said deed contained the following restriction or condition: "And it is expressly understood that the premises herein conveyed is for the specific purpose of a blacksmith and wheelwright shop. The said J. Hooper, his heirs and assigns, shall not convert the shop or building that may be erected to any other purpose than here specified, to wit, blacksmithing, wheelwrighting, repairing tin, copper, saddles, harness, tackle, and the using of a turning lathe, and repairing of firearms, and no other purpose whatever. And the said grantee, for himself and his heirs and assigns, promises to reconvey said estate to said grantor, his heirs, executors, and assigns, in case of any violation of the foregoing provisions in this deed." That the said lot conveyed to Hooper came by mesne conveyance to the control and management of this respondent, who now holds the legal title of record to said lot. That at the time the said respondent acquired title to said lot, she knew of the said condition contained in the deed from Nicholas Ball to John W. Hooper. That previous to his death the said Nicholas Ball conveyed to this complainant another portion of his said tract of land, upon which was a store in which the said Nicholas Ball had carried on for many years the business of selling groceries and general merchandise, which business was continued by this complainant up to the time of filing this it is not necessary that the language of the deed should show that restrictive covenants therein were inserted for the benefit of the remaining land of the grantor, provided the intention to benefit such land appears from all the surrounding circumstances; and restrictive covenants in deeds have accordingly been held, in numerous cases, to be enforceable by subsequent grantees of other parcels of the same grantor's lands, where, as in BALL v. MILLIKEN, the nature of the restriction and the surrounding circumstances sufficiently show that the covenants were intended for the benefit of the land subsequently conveyed.

Thus, where the owner of two adjoining city lots has sold one of them, a corner lot, with the restriction that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall not erect any building on the back part of the lot higher than 10 feet, which restriction is attributable only to the purpose of benefiting the adjoining lot, a subsequent grantee of the latter lot may enforce the restriction by injunction. Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289.

And where the representative of an estate has sold a part of the land belonging thereto, with a covenant on the part of the grantee to extend a certain street to the boundary of the land purchased, and to do the work and labor therein, which covenant is for the benefit of the remaining land of the estate, a subsequent grantee of a part of such remaining land is entitled to the benefit of the covenant, and can require the prior grantee, at any time, to extend the street, pursuant to the covenant. Jayne v. Cortland Waterworks Co. 107 App. Div. 517, 95 N. Y. Supp. 227.

So, where an owner of property on opposite sides of a city street has conveyed that on one side with a restrictive covenant against building outside of certain lines thereon, without the consent of the grantor or his heirs, which covenant is obviously beneficial to the grantor's sole remaining land, it was held, in Hemsley v. Marlborough House Co. 68 N. J. Eq. 596, 61 Atl. 455, reversing 65 N. J. Eq. 167, 55 Atl. 994, that the right to enforce the restriction is appurtenant to that land, and passes with 57 L.R.A. (N.S.) it by a subsequent conveyance to another grantee.

And where the owner has granted to a railroad company a right of way through his farm in consideration of an agreement by it, expressed in the deed, to make a switch to his mill door on the farm, which agreement is obviously for the benefit of any owner of the mill, a subsequent owner may enforce in equity the company's agreement. Lydick v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 427.

In Child v. Douglas, 2 Jur. N. S. 950, it was held that the grantee of a lot on a highway, whose conveyance contains a restrictive covenant against his building within a certain distance of the highway, is entitled to the benefit of, and can himself enforce, a like covenant in a prior conveyance by his grantor to another person, of a neighboring lot on the same highway, as he buys with his lot all the rights of his grantor relating to it, including the right to enforce such prior covenant.

And a grantee of a piece of land on a certain road, subject to a provision that he shall not erect any building thereon nearer to the road than the line of frontage of the then present houses on neighboring lots along the road, may enforce by injunction a like covenant in a prior conveyance by his grantor of an adjoining lot to another purchaser. Manners v. Johnson, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 673, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 404, 24 Week. Rep. 481.

In Peck v. Conway, 119 Mass. 546, it was held that a grantee of a homestead lot is entitled to enforce in equity a restriction in a prior deed by his grantor of a small adjoining parcel of land, that no building shall be erected thereon,—the fair inference being that the parties to the first conveyance intended the restriction for the benefit of the grantor's adjoining estate.

So, where the owner of two adjoining lots, one of which is his house lot, conveys the other with the restriction and reservation that no building thereafter erected on the lot conveyed shall be erected within 10 feet of the line of the house lot, a negative easement for the latter lot as a dominant estate bill. That Nicholas Ball died on July 31, 1896. That his last will and testament, dated May 18, 1894, was duly admitted to probate by the probate court of said New Shoreham. That in said will Nicholas Ball devised to this complainant, his son, all of said tract of land owned by said Nicholas Ball as aforesaid, excepting that part which he had conveyed by said deeds to John W. Hooper and to Cassius C. Ball, the complainant, and also devised to the complainant all the right, title, and interest of said Nicholas Ball in and to the said lot conveyed to John W. Hooper. The respondent contends that this interest is not devised by said will to the complainant; but we are of the opinion that it appears by the provision of said will that the testator intended to devise to the complainant all the interest in the so-called "Hooper lot" which the testator had reserved by his said deed. That the respondent, in violation of the condition contained in the deed to Hooper, has let, leased, and sublet the premises described in said deed for the purpose of making and repairing watches and jewelry, for the sale of intoxicating liquors, for repairing boots and shoes, and for keeping swine and horses.

The respondent, by her answer, admits that since she has owned her said lot and building, she has not used the same for any or either of the specific purposes set forth in said deed from Nicholas Ball to Hooper, and has used and allowed to be used portions of said building for other purposes, is created over the lot conveyed, which easement a subsequent grantee of the house lot may claim. Herrick v. Marshall, 66 Me. 435.

And where the owner of a square of land in a city, near the center of which his own residence stands, conveys a parcel of the square with restrictions as to the nature and location of the improvements to be erected thereon by the purchaser, such restrictions are for the benefit not only of the grantor, but of anyone to whom he may sell adjacent lots; and a subsequent grantee of an adjacent lot may enforce the restrictive covenants in the prior conveyance. Roberts v. Porter, 100 Ky. 130, 37 S. W. 485.

A grantee whose deed contains restrictive covenants against certain noxious uses of the premises conveyed, similar to covenants included in very many of the deeds from the same grantor of contiguous land, may enforce a like restriction in a prior conveyance by the common grantor of a neighboring parcel. DeLima v. Mitchell, 49 Misc. 171, 98 N. Y. Supp. 811.

And where the owner of several neighboring lots conveys them all with covenants against nuisances and against the erection of steam engines, an easement is created in the lot for the benefit of each of the respective owners of the other lots, which easement may be enforced by any one of such owners against any of the others. Birdsall v. Tiemann, 12 How. Pr. 551.

Where the owner of a plot of land in a city has sold lots with restrictive covenants against the erection of any building thereon costing less than a certain amount, it was held in Isham v. Matchett, 18 Ohio C. C. 338, 10 Ohio C. D. 267, that the grantee of any lot may enforce such restriction in a prior deed of an adjoining lot.

And in Francis v. Ziering, 128 App. Div. 253, 112 N. Y. Supp. 647, it was held that a grantee of a city lot may enforce a covenant against building within a certain distance of the street line, contained in a conveyance by his grantor, of a lot on the opposite side of the street.

—intention indicated by uniform scheme of restrictions.

While, as held in BALL v. MILLIKEN, the absence of a general plan for the development of a tract of land from which a parcel is sold with restrictive covenants does not prevent injunctive relief against a breach of the restriction, the existence of such a plan, in accordance with which uniform restrictions are inserted in conveyances of separate parcels of the tract, is the best of circumstantial evidence of an intention on the part of the common grantor of the respective parcels, that the restrictions in each conveyance are for the benefit of all the other land in the tract. Nalder & C. Brewery Co. v. Harman, 83 L. T. N. S. 257.

Where the owner of property in a city has laid it off into lots and blocks, and has offered the lots for public sale, proclaiming that the sale will be made in consideration of restrictions to be contained in the deed of each lot sold, that neither the purchaser nor anyone claiming under him shall erect or keep or permit on the premises conveyed to him any milk dairy, etc., the effect of such restrictions inserted in contemporaneous conveyances is to confer a right in the nature of an easement in all the lots in the tract, on each person acquiring by such deeds, and any such person may enforce the covenants contained in any other of the contemporaneous conveyances. Hall v. Wesster, 7 Mo. App. 56.

And where a city owning a tract of land has divided it into building lots, and has made and duly recorded a plan thereof, and conveys the several lots by deeds subject to the condition that the front line of the building to be erected on each lot shall be placed on a line parallel with, and 10 feet back from, the street, which condition is inserted by the city to establish a general plan of building upon all the lots, for the general improvement of the neighborhood and for the benefit of all purchasers of the lots who derive title thereto through the city, a grantee of one of the lots may enforce such restriction in the deed of a and she sets up in defense and claims the same benefit of each of the following defenses as if she had pleaded them in bar, or for these reasons had demurred to said bill: (1) That the complainant by his bill shows no right as devisee to maintain it; (2) that the agreement, or whatever it may be called, in the Hooper deed, does not run with the land, and is not obligatory upon the defendant; (3) that the complainant's action is barred by laches, and he is estopped from claiming, and has waived the breach; (4) that under our statute of adverse possession for twenty years, and since the General Laws of 1896 for ten years, the defendant's title has become absolute, and the complainant's action is barred; (5) that the complainant's action is barred by our statute of limitations. The respondent contends that the right or interest which remained in Nicholas Ball under the deed to John W. Hooper was not such an estate or interest as could be devised by him, either at common law or under chapter 201, § 23, Gen. Laws 1896, and so that the complainant is not entitled to the conveyance of the estate as prayed by his bill.

If it was necessary to determine in the case before us, as to the legal nature of the restriction contained in the deed to Hooper, and what were the rights at law of Nicholas Ball under it, authority would not be lacking to warrant the court in finding that the provision contained in the deed was a condition that there remained in Nicholas Ball a right of re-entry for breach neighboring lot. Hamlen v. Werner, 144 Mass. 396, 11 N. E. 684.

Likewise, where an owner has divided his land into lots, with streets and alleys and in the conveyance of each lot inserts the restriction that no building shall be erected thereon within 20 feet of the street on which it fronts, the restriction inures to the benefit of all the grantees, and any one of them may enforce it against any other. Fete v. Foerstel, 159 Mo. App. 75, 139 S. W. 820.

And the grantee of a city lot may enforce a restrictive covenant as to a building line, in a contemporaneous conveyance by his grantor of the adjoining lot, where the adjoining lot was plainly included in the benefits of the restriction, which was imposed as part of a building scheme for that portion of the street. Payson v. Burnham, 141 Mass. 547, 6 N. E. 708.

Where the owner of a single tract of land in a city, having conveyed two lots without restriction, draws a plan dividing the remainder of the tract into lots, and in accordance with a general plan sells all of the lots which are desirable, for the erection of first-class dwelling houses, by contemporaneous deeds to different parties, with the restriction in each deed that such dwelling houses only are to be erected on the premises, it is clear that the restriction is imposed on each lot for the benefit of the owners of all the others, and anyone of such owners may enforce the restriction in any of the other deeds. Hano v. Bigelow, 155 Mass. 341, 29 N. E. 628.

And where the owner of a block of land in a city filed a map showing upon it courtyards 5 feet wide, by which the streets upon two opposite sides of the land were widened along the whole length of the block, and then entered into an agreement with the owners of the adjoining block, under which this restriction as to the use of the 5 feet of the property adjoining the streets for courtyards should be perpetual, and should bind the property in both blocks for all time to come, and should be binding upon all persons who might thereafter become interested in the two blocks as owner, tenant, occupant, or otherwise, and might be enforced by or against any one or more of those persons, as occasion might require, and subsequently sells lots on the restricted streets to different purchasers by deeds expressly subject to the provisions of the restriction in the prior agreement, an easement is created appurtenant to the lots of each purchaser in the strip of 5 feet, to which the lots of the other purchasers are subject, and which each purchaser is entitled to enforce against the others. Batchelor v. Hinkle, 132 App. Div. 620, 117 N. Y. Supp. 542, later appeal in 140 App. Div. 621, 125 N. Y. Supp. 929.

So, where the owner of a tract of land in a city has divided it into lots located on streets, with a strip 10 feet wide along each side of each street between the sidewalk and the lot lines, and conveys each lot "with the privilege of using 10 feet in front of the front line of the lot for yard, vault, porch, piazza, cellar, and bay windows, and for no other purpose," the restriction as to other uses is for the mutual and reciprocal benefit of subsequent adjoining lot owners, and the owner of any lot may enjoin a breach of the restriction on the part of the owner of an adjoining lot. Vetter v. Flaherty, 4 Lack. Leg. News, 175.

And where the owner of a city block has laid it out into lots, and conveyed such lots to different purchasers by deeds each containing a restrictive covenant against nuisances and other offensive erections upon the lots conveyed, which covenant was evidently not designed to be made for the benefit of the grantor further than it might be applicable to any portion of the block he might retain, but was for the benefit of persons acquiring the title to the several lots in the block, a subsequent grantee of one of the lots subject to the restriction is entitled to enforce the restriction against the owner of any other of such lots. Raynor v. Lyon, 46 Hun, 227.

And where an owner has divided his land into lots, and has caused a map thereof to be filed and copies of the map to be made, stating that "this property, when sold, is restricted, thus making it a first-class residence locality," and thereafter sells the en-of condition, and that, according to some authorities, the interest remaining in Nicholas Ball was one which he could devise at common law. Whatever may be said as to these authorities, there can be no question that the interest retained by Nicholas Ball was devisable under chapter 201, § 23, Gen. Laws 1896, now chapter 252, § 23, Gen. Laws 1909.

Conditions are not favored in law, as they tend to destroy estates; but conditions may be created if such an intention appears from an examination of the whole deed. There are certain words which are considered appropriate to create a condition; but when these apt words are used, the provision is not always construed as a condition; and without these words conditions have been found to exist when such appears to be the intention of the parties. Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 332, at page 341, 50 L.R.A. 120, 57 N. E. 692. "Whether the words amount to a condition or a limitation or a covenant may be a matter of construction, depending on the contract." 4 Kent, Com. 132. If it clearly appears by the deed that it was the intention of the parties that upon a breach of the restriction the estate conveyed to the grantee should be defeated, and should return to the grantor, such a restriction is a condition. And if it is found that a provision in a deed is a condition, then a breach of that condition works a forfeiture of the estate, and there is a right of re-entry in the grantor without express provision for tire tract in separate parcels to various persons, each of the deeds containing restrictive covenants against the use of the lots for buildings other than detached dwelling houses of a certain description and cost, and against building within certain distances of the street lines, which covenants are expressly made with the grantor, "his heirs and assigns," and are "to run with the land, and are to be construed as covenants running with the land, until" a certain date, any of the owners of the land shown on the map, and thus conveyed, may enforce the covenants in equity. McDougall v. Schneider, 134 App. Div. 208, 118 N. Y. Supp. 861.

When the owner has divided a tract of land and conveyed parcels thereof to separate purchasers at different times, by deeds containing similar restrictive covenants, intended for the benefit of all the several purchasers, mutual negative easements are created, and the grantee of any parcel may enjoin interference with his negative easement by any other grantee having notice thereof, actual or constructive. Landsberg v. Rosenwasser, 124 App. Div. 559, 108 N. Y. Supp. 929.

And where a general plan has been adopted by the owner for the improvement of a large tract of land, and all of the land sold by him on a certain avenue has been conveyed with a uniform restriction as to the building line, intended for the benefit of each purchaser on that avenue, any purchaser is equitably entitled to enforce the restriction against any other purchaser. Morrow v. Hasselman, 69 N. J. Eq. 612, 61 Atl. 369.

As said in DeGray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388: "Where there is a general scheme or plan adopted and made public by the owner of a tract, for the development and improvement of the property, by which it is divided into streets, avenues, and lots, and contemplating a restriction as to the uses to which buildings or lots may be put, to be secured by a covenant embodying the restriction to be inserted in each deed to a purchaser; and it appears, by writings or by the circumstances, that such covenants are intended for the benefit of all the lands, and that each purchaser is to be subject to and to have the benefit thereof; and the covenants are actually inserted in all deeds for lots sold in pursuance of the plan,—one purchaser and his assigns may enforce the covenant against any other purchaser and his assigns, if he has bought with knowledge of the scheme, and the covenant has been part of the subject-matter of his purchase."

And in Hyman v. Tash, — N. J. Eq. —, 71 Atl. 742, it was held that where a grantor had in mind a scheme of improvement for his land along a certain street, a grantee of a lot may enforce a building restriction inserted in a prior conveyance by his grantor of a neighboring lot pursuant to such scheme for the benefit of all the other lots, although he imposed no restriction upon himself, and the scheme was not made public, and it does not appear that each purchaser was made aware that every other purchaser was to be subject to, and to have the benefit of, the plan.

Covenants personal to grantor.

In accordance with the general rule that restrictive covenants in a deed, not intended for the benefit of other land of the grantor, but merely for his personal benefit, to enable him to make the most of his remaining property, cannot be enforced by subsequent grantees of other parcels of the grantor's land, a grantee of a city lot is not entitled to enforce a restriction in a prior conveyance by his grantor of another lot, where there is nothing in the conveyance or in the surrounding circumstances from which it can be inferred that the restriction was inserted for the benefit of the property of the grantor which has been subsequently conveyed. Badger v. Boardman, 16 Gray, 559.

And while, as held in BALL v. MILLIKEN, and as noted above, it is not necessary, in order that a grantee may enforce a restrictive covenant in a prior conveyance by his grantor of another lot, that the intention of the parties to the prior conveyance to grant a negative easement for the benefit of the land of the grantor subsequentforfeiture and re-entry. It clearly appears by the deed to Hooper that it was the intention of the parties that, upon a breach of the provisions restricting the use of the premises conveyed, the property should return to the "grantor, his heirs, executors, and assigns," and in addition to the right to re-enter, the grantor obtained for himself, his heirs, executors, and assigns, the right to demand a reconveyance in case of any violation of the provision in the deed.

The provision for reconveyance in case of breach of a restriction in a deed is not a common one. The authorities throw but little light upon the effect of such a provision upon the estate conveyed. The provision for reconveyance establishes the intention of the parties that the land should return to the grantor upon a violation of the provision, and the restriction could well be construed to create a condition. If a condition, there was in the grantor a right to claim a forfeiture for its breach and to re-enter. It does not appear that the provision for reconveyance was intended to diminish the rights of the grantor, or was a substitute for a forfeiture and the right to re-enter, but was intended as a right in addition to his rights at law. The future contingent right of entry for condition broken would pass to this complainant by the will of Nicholas Ball, under the provision of Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 201, § 23. This section, in force at the time of the death of the testator, is as follows: "Hereafter a contingent, an execuly conveyed should be expressed in the deed, provided it is otherwise apparent, —the omission from the deed of such an expression is an evidentiary circumstance tending to show that the restriction was made only for the personal benefit of the grantor. Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54.

So, a grantee of a lot with a restriction as to the building line cannot enforce a like restriction in a prior conveyance by his grantor of a neighboring lot, where it does not appear from the language of the respective deeds, when construed with reference to the extrinsic circumstances shown, that it was the intention of the parties to the prior deed to insert the restriction for the benefit of the lot subsequently conveyed. Ibid.

And one deriving title to a city lot through a mesne conveyance from the Commonwealth is not entitled to enforce a restrictive covenant in a deed from the Commonwealth of a lot adjoining his lot in the rear, against the building thereon of a stable, where there is no express provision in either conveyance giving him the benefit of the covenant, and the circumstances tend to show that the commonwealth did not intend by this restriction to give the neighboring lots the right to prevent the erection and use of a private stable. Beals v. Case, 138 Mass. 138.

Where the owner of a large estate has sold a small portion thereof, the purchaser entering into restrictive covenants for himself, his heirs and assigns, with the grantor, his heirs, executors, and administrators, only as to the character and value of the buildings to be erected thereon, the grantor entering into no covenants as to the land retained; and the grantor subsequently sells several other parcels of the estate to other purchasers, without restrictive covenants, and without informing them of the covenants in the first conveyance, it was held, in Keates v. Lyon, L. R. 4 Ch. 218, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 357, 20 L. T. N. S. 255, 17 Week. Rep. 338, that the benefit of such covenants is not a benefit reserved by the grantor in respect of the unsold portion of the estate, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) which attaches to the land and passes by the subsequent conveyances, and the subsequent grantees cannot enforce the covenants.

Nor can the grantee of a city lot enforce a condition in a prior conveyance by his grantor of an adjoining lot, that no building or edifice of any description exceeding 8 feet in height shall at any time be erected within 32 feet of the rear line of the lot, where there is no reservation in the deed of the condition to the heirs or assigns of the grantor, and no words giving the right of re-entry for condition broken, and the condition is not mentioned or referred to in the subsequent conveyance of the grantor's adjoining lot, but all the facts and circumstances tend to show that the condition was intended as a mere personal restriction for the benefit of the common grantor of the property. Krekeler v. Aulbach, 51 App. Div. 591, 64 N. Y. Supp. 908, affirmed in 169 N. Y. 372, 62 N. E. 416.

And while a grantee may enforce in equity a restrictive covenant in a prior conveyance by his grantor of other property, provided the restriction was originally made for the benefit of the remaining land of the common grantor, a grantee of a city lot cannot enforce a restriction as to a building line contained in a prior conveyance by the same grantor of another lot on the opposite side of the street and 150 feet distant, where the prior conveyance contains no statement that the restriction is for the benefit of any part of the grantor's unsold property, and there is no evidence of a general building scheme, or other sufficient evidence that the restriction was intended for the benefit of the land subsequently conveyed to the grantee seeking to enforce the restriction. McNichol v. Townsend, 73 N. J. Eq. 276, 67 Atl. 938, on final hearing, 74 N. J. Eq. 318, 70 Atl. 965.

tory, and a future interest, and a possibility coupled with an interest, in any tenements or hereditaments of any tenure, also a right of entry, whether immediate or future, and whether vested or contingent, in-to or upon any tenements or hereditaments of any tenure, may be disposed of by legal conveyance or will; but no such disposition shall, by force only of this section, defeat or enlarge an estate tail."

Austin v. Cambridgeport, 21 Pick. 215, was a writ of entry sur disseisin to recover possession of demanded premises. The demandant claimed as devisee under the will of Benjamin Austin, one of the grantors of an estate upon condition, against a grantee of the first grantee. After deciding that the estate in the first grantee was an estate upon condition subsequent, and that there had been a forfeiture, the court said: "It then becomes important to ascertain whether the interest of Benjamin Austin in the premises at the time of executing his will was a devisable interest, and, if so, whether the demandant acquired a title to the same under the will." And the court decided that the interest of the testator "was not a present right of entry, but a contingent possible estate. That such an interest is devisable in England seems well established by the case of Jones v. Roe, 3 T. R. 88, and the cases there cited. Chancellor Kent states the rule to be that all contingent possible estates are devisable. 4 Kent, Com. 498, in notes."

might be an annoyance to the neighborhood or to the lessees or tenants of the lessor, his heirs or assigns, or diminish the value of the adjoining property, and had subsequently made a similar lease of an adjoining parcel with a like covenant, the lessee, however, knowing nothing, at the time, of the covenant in the first lease, which was not mentioned in the second lease,—it was held that the covenant in the first lease was not taken for the benefit of the lessor's land adjoining that leased, but for his own benefit, that he might be able to make the most out of his estate, and that the second lessee accordingly could not enforce the covenant, or require the lessor to do so.

And in Renals v. Cowlishaw, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 125, affirmed in L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 866, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 830, 41 L. T. N. S. 116, 28 Week. Rep. 9, where the owner of a mansion house and residential estate, and of certain pieces of land adjoining thereto, had sold two of these adjoining pieces to one who covenanted with the vendor, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, as to the location, character, and use of the buildings to be erected thereon, etc., the conveyance, however, not stating that this restrictive covenant was for the protection of the residential property, or making any statement with reference thereto; and where the owner, without any representation that the purchaser should have the benefit of such covenant, subsequently sold the residential estate by conveyance without covenants like those in the first conveyance, and without any reference to or mention of that conveyance or the existence of the restrictive covenant therein,—it was held that the second grantee could not enforce the restrictive covenant in the first conveyance, as the benefit of the covenant was not a part of the subject-matter of his purchase, having been put in the first conveyance by the grantor, not for the benefit of this particular property conveyed to the second grantee, but for the benefit of the grantor himself.

Where the owner of property has divided it and sold a part with certain building restrictions, while there is a general presumption that such restrictions are for the benefit of the property retained, a subsequent grantee of a lot cannot enforce the restrictions in a prior conveyance, where it appears that they were not in fact intended for the benefit of any particular lot, but were conceived as a part of the general scheme of improvement, and not intended to be operative unless that scheme should be carried out, and the scheme has in fact failed. Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54.

And a grantee of a city lot is not entitled to enforce restrictive covenants as to a building line and as to the sale of liquor, contained in a prior conveyance by his grantor of another lot, although his own deed contains the same restrictions, where they were not inserted in accordance with a general plan,—other lots in the immediate neighborhood having been sold with different restrictions,—and there is nothing else to indicate that the restrictions as to the lot first conveyed were made for the benefit of the lot subsequently conveyed. Haines v. Einwachter, — N. J. Eq. —, 55 Atl. 38.

So, a grantee of a city lot is not entitled to enforce a restrictive covenant in a prior conveyance by his grantor of an adjoining lot, although a similar restriction is contained in his deed, where the first deed contained no covenant on the part of the grantor that, on the sale of other lots in the block, all of which he owned; he would impose any restrictions, and the restrictions imposed were not part of a general plan to restrict all the grantor's lots in the block, and some of the lots were sold without restriction, while others did not have the same restrictions, though they were similar. Clark v. McGee, 159 Ill. 518, 42 N. E. 965.

And a grantee cannot enforce a covenant against building within a certain distance of a street, contained in a prior conveyance by his grantor of another lot, where the restriction does not constitute part of a general and uniform plan of restriction, and was intended to run only to the grantor personally, and not in favor of the land retained by him or any subsequent grantee thereof. Schworer v. Leo, 39 Misc. 505, 80 N. Y. Supp. 399, affirmed without opin-

Gray, at page 160, 63 Am. Dec. 725, the court, in commenting with approval upon Austin v. Cambridgeport, supra, says: "That was a grant by deed of an estate, defeasible on a condition subsequent, which was legal and valid. The possibility of reverter was in the grantor and his heirs or devisees; the residue of the estate was vested in his grantee, the parish. The two interests united made up the entire fee simple estate, and were vested in persons ascertainable and capable of conveying the entire estate. . . . The conditional estate in the parish, and the possibility of reverter in the devisees of the grantor, were vested estates, and interests capable of conveyance, and constituting together an entire title or estate in fee simple."

The doctrine laid down in Austin v. Cambridgeport, supra, has been followed in a number of Massachusetts cases. In Dunlap v. Bullard, 131 Mass. 163, the court held that when an estate is conveyed to be held by the grantee upon a condition subsequent, there is left in the grantor a contingent reversionary interest. In Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 337, 50 L.R.A. 120, 57 N. E. 692, the court, in considering a deed conveying land upon a condition, held that the right of reverter, remaining in the grantor up to the time of his death, went, upon his death, to his heir or devisees. Austin v. Cambridgeport, supra, found in the common law the power to devise the right of reverter. Later cases approve the doctrine of the earlier case that the right remaining in the grantor of an estate upon condition constituted an interest in the land. After Austin v. Cambridgeport, a statute was enacted in Massachusetts which provided that lands to which the testator has the right of entry may be devised, and shall pass to the devisee. The Massachusetts statute was as follows (Rev. Stat. Mass. 1836, chap. 62): "Sec. 2. When any person shall devise lands of which he may not then be seised, but to or for which he has any right of entry, or when, after the making of any devise, the deviser shall be disseised or ousted of the devised premises, they shall nevertheless pass to the devisee, in like manner as they would have descended to the heirs of the deviser, if he had died intestate; and the devisees shall have the like remedy for the recovery thereof, either by entry or by action, as the heirs might have had." This statute has remained in force in practically the same form to the present time, and appears as § 24, chap. 135, Rev. Laws Mass. 1902. The Massachusetts statute gives to testators no greater power of disposition of contingent interests in land by devise than was given in this state by Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 201, § 23.

The case of Upington v. Corrigan, 151 N. Y. 143, 37 L.R.A. 794, 45 N. E. 359, cited by the respondent, takes a view of the right remaining in a grantor who conveys land upon a condition subsequent, different from that adopted by the Massachusetts cases. The New York court held that there remained in the grantor no estate or interest in the land, and as, under the New York statute, only an "estate or interest in real property" could be devised, the right remaining in the grantor was not devisable; but there was no statute in New York at the time of the decision in Upington v. Corrigan, with reference to the devise of contingent estates, of the nature of the Massachusetts and Rhode Island statutes.

Whether we are prepared to accept the

Where a land company has sold three parcels of a large tract, with the restrictions that the property shall be used only for residence purposes, that each dwelling erected thereon shall cost not less than a certain sum, and that no liquors shall be sold on the premises; and the grantee has sold one of the three tracts with like restrictions, but there are no restrictions in any other deed from the land company, or in the subsequent conveyances of the other two of the three lots first sold with the restrictions, and nothing to show any intention on the part of the parties to confer upon any other person the right to enforce the restrictions in these two deeds, and the acts and conduct of the parties show that no such right was intended to be conferred,—no subsequent grantee of either the first grantor or the subgrantor can enforce such restrictions. Foreman v. Sadler, 114 Md. 574, 80 Atl. 298. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And in Judd v. Robinson, 41 Colo. 222, 124 Am. St. Rep. 128, 92 Pac. 724, 14 Ann. Cas. 1018, it was held that the grantees of certain town lots were not entitled to enforce a covenant inserted in a prior conveyance of other lots, pursuant to a general plan in the conveyance of town lots, whereby the parties stipulated for themselves, their heirs, successors, and legal representatives, that intoxicating liquors should never be manufactured, sold, or otherwise disposed of as a beverage on the premises conveyed, and that, in case of a breach of the condition, the deed should become void and the property revert to the grantor, "its heirs, successors, and assigns,"—as it did not appear that the covenant was for the benefit of the other lands of the grantor, or for the benefit of subsequent purchasers of other town lots, and the subsequent purchasers did not buy with reference to the general plan, nor did the restrictive covenant enter into the consideration of their purchase.

doctrine laid down in Austin v. Cambridgeport, supra, or not, if at law the estate conveyed to Hooper was one upon condition subsequent, then the right of reverter remaining in Nicholas Ball was devisable, under Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 201, § 23. This complainant, however, is not seeking to enforce any legal right. Whatever may have been the legal interest remaining in Nicholas Ball in the estate conveyed to Hooper, he obtained a certain equitable interest which he had a right to devise, and which he did devise, to his complainant, and the complainant is now seeking to enforce the equitable right which he claims that equitable interest gives to him. When Hooper accepted the deed from Nicholas Ball, he bound himself, his heirs and assigns, to reconvey the estate described in the deed, to Nicholas Ball, his heirs, executors, and assigns, in case of a violation of the provision in the deed. This gave to Ball an equitable interest in the land.

It is well established that a right to demand a conveyance of land constitutes an equitable interest in that land. In London & S. W. R. Co. v. Gomm, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 562, it appeared that the plaintiff was seised of certain land which was no longer required for the purpose of the railway, and the plaintiff conveyed the land to C. P., and the grantee covenanted with the company that he, his heirs and assigns, whenever the land might be required for the railway or works of the company, and whenever thereunto requested by the company, after a certain notice and on payment of a certain sum, would reconvey the land to the company. The land passed by conveyance to the defendant with notice of the covenant, and the company gave the defendant notice and requested him to reconvey the land. It was found that the land was at the time of the notice required for railway purposes. Jessel, master of the rolls, held that the covenant gave an interest in the land, and said: "But if it binds the land, it creates an equitable interest in the land. The right to call for a conveyance of the land is an equitable interest or equitable estate. In the ordinary case of a contract for purchase, there is no doubt about this, and an option for repurchase is not different in its nature. A person exercising the option has to do two things: He has to give notice of his intention to purchase, and to pay the purchase money. But, as far as the man who is liable to convey is concerned, his estate or interest is taken away from him without his consent, and, the right to take it away being vested in another, the covenant giving the option must give that other an interest in the land."

The interest of Nicholas Ball in the land conveyed to Hooper does not differ in its essential quality from the interest of the railway in the land referred to in London & S. W. R. Co. v. Gomm, supra. The railway had the right to demand a reconveyance from its grantee or his assigns upon the happening of the contingency that the growth of the railway's business should make requisite the use of the land by the railway. Nicholas Ball had the right to demand a reconveyance from Hooper or his assigns upon the happening of the contingency that the land was used in violation of the provisions of the deed. In such case an equitable interest in the land was given to the grantor.

Where a person has entered into a contract to purchase land, and before he receives a deed, dies, it is well established that, although the purchase money has not been paid, the testator's equitable interest in the land will pass by a devise. Acherley v. Vernon, 9 Mod. 69, 3 Bro. P. C. 91, 1 Comyns, Rep. 381, 1 P. Wms. 783, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 209, and 10 Mod. 518.

An equitable interest in land, though it is but a contingent equitable interest, clearly might be devised, under Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 201, § 23, and the doctrine that it might have passed by devise, before the enactment of said chapter 201, is well supported by the case, Bailey v. Hoppin, 12 R. I. 560. In that case the court held that a certain interest in land, then under consideration, was a contingent equitable interest, and that such an interest conveyed before his death to a testator is transmissible in equity to his devisee, notwithstanding the precarious nature of the subject of the deed. The court said: "Under the English statute [32 Hen. VIII. chap. 1], a devise of equitable estates including estates which have only been contracted for, and even where the contract by its terms is not performable until after the execution of the will, is upheld as good in equity. Greenhill v. Greenhill, Prec. in Ch. 320, 2 Vern. 679, Gilb. Eq. Rep. 77; Acherley v. Vernon, 9 Mod. 68, 78, 3 Bro. P. C. 91, 1 Comyn's Rep. 381, 1 P. Wms. 783, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 209; M'Kinnon v. Thompson, 3 Johns. Ch. 307. Under these precedents the only difficulty here is that the estate contracted for was, when the will was made and until after it went into effect, something which might never exist. The contract, however, was, as we have seen, valid in equity; and therefore the contract itself, whatever subtle lawyers may think of the subject of it, was a valuable property, and as such we think it must be held to have passed to William A. Hoppin under the will."

The provision of the deed to John W. Hooper, giving to Nicholas Ball the right to demand a reconveyance of the land upon the violation of the restrictions contained in the deed, gave to said Ball an interest in the land. This interest might be devised, and the right to demand a reconveyance is now in the complainant as devisee of Nicholas Ball, and is not in the heirs of Nicholas Ball.

The next question is whether the complainant shall be given the relief which he seeks, and shall obtain a decree for specific performance ordering a conveyance of the land to him for a breach of the provisions of the deed.

A bill for specific performance is an application addressed to the judicial discretion of a court of equity. "Even if the plaintiff were entitled to a specific performance of the defendant's agreement, such right is not an absolute one, but rests in the discretion of the court, to be exercised on equitable considerations in view of all the circumstances of the case." Graves v. Goldthwait, 153 Mass. 268, 10 L.R.A. 763, 26 N. E. 860. From the testimony in the case it appears that in the use of this property by successors in title to Hooper there have been departures from the letter of the restriction in the deed. It is not clear that all of these violations came to the knowledge of Nicholas Ball or of this complainant. These breaches of the condition were known to the respondent, and, not unreasonably, she might have believed that they were known to the complainant, and that the restrictions in the deed had been to some extent waived by him. Now, upon another violation of the restriction on her part, the proceeding to compel a conveyance of the property to the complainant, and thus destroy the estate of the respondent, in the circumstances of the case, would not be viewed with favor by a court of equity. It is one of the principles of equity that it will not decree a forfeiture. It "will never aid in the divesting of an estate for a breach of a covenant on a condition subsequent, although they will often interfere to prevent the divesting of an estate for a breach of a covenant or condition." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1319. It is true that the ancestor in title of the respondent agreed to a reconveyance in the event of a breach; but to grant a specific performance of that agreement is, in effect, to decree a forfeiture. Equity has in some cases taken jurisdiction for the protection of a grantor, and ordered specific performance of a covenant to reconvey in case of a breach of condition, and thus aided in the divestiture of an estate. This has usually been in cases where a conveyance has been made by an aged or infirm person in consideration that the grantee should support and care for the grantor, with the condition that if the grantee fails in his obligation he shall reconvey. Upon a breach of this condition, equity has taken jurisdiction and decreed specific performance. Stamper v. Stamper, 121 N. C. 251, 28 S. E. 20; Robinson v. Robinson, 9 Gray, 447, 69 Am. Dec. 301. In Baker v. St. Louis, 75 Mo. 671, affirming and adopting the opinion in Baker v. St. Louis, 7 Mo. App. 429, specific performance was compelled of a covenant to reconvey. In that case land was conveyed for a street and market house, with the provision that as soon as the granted premises should cease to be used for that purpose, the parcel of land should revert to the grantor, his heirs and assigns, "and the said parties of the second part, upon failure to use said market house for the purposes aforesaid, [shall] reconvey to said parties of the first part." The court found the justification for the decree for specific performance in the consideration that the covenant "contains an express undertaking on the part of the city to reconvey the property upon a failure to use the market house as stipulated." "The conveyance by Peter and Jesse Lindell, taken with all its reservations and conditions, was in effect nothing more than a dedication upon condition subsequent. . . . The reservation or reversion upon breach of condition was equivalent to a retention of the fee subject to the public easement as appurtenant to the lot from which the strip was severed."

In these cases the circumstances warranted an exercise of the discretion of the court to decree a specific performance. Such circumstances are not presented in the case at bar, and to decree specific performance would be unreasonably to oppress the respondent, and would violate equitable principles.

We are of the opinion that the complainant is entitled to an injunction. He is the possessor of the land which the restriction was made to benefit. In a similar case (Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289) the court held that the remedy asked for was one which the law authorizes courts of equity to grant to prevent or restrain "the commission or continuance of acts contrary to law and prejudicial to the interests of the community or the rights of individuals." Cases are numerous in which injunctions have been granted to restrain the violation of similar restrictions in deeds, without reference to pecuniary damage; the courts, apparently without hesitation, placing the right to relief upon the sole ground of the disregard of a duty which the complainant was entitled to have observed. It is urged that an injunction should not be granted, as it does not appear that the restriction contained in the deed from Nicholas Ball to Hooper was part of a general scheme for the development of the remainder of the tract. It must very frequently happen that such restrictions are imposed by the owner of a platted tract of land as part of a general scheme for the improvement and disposition of the platted lots. This is an incident common to many cases of this nature, and naturally has been taken into account by courts in considering the circumstances surrounding the grant, for the purpose of determining the intent of the restriction. But from these circumstances, which are the common circumstances of many cases, the court is not justified in deducing a principle that, in the absence of such general scheme, complainants are not entitled to the relief of injunction.

As was said in the minority opinion in Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 342, 50 L.R.A. 120, 57 N. E. 696: "The decisions in which this has been done have not been confined to any particular class of cases, such as, for instance, building schemes and plans of general improvement; but the rule has been applied in other cases, and has been recognized in cases where it was not applied." And later in the same opinion: "But conditions are construed as restrictions in such cases, not because courts have any special fondness for or leaning towards building schemes or plans of general improvement, but because it would be inequitable and unjust, as against the owners of adjoining and neighboring estates, to construe them otherwise, and to permit a party taking an estate with notice of a valid agreement respecting its mode of use and occupation towards such estates to avoid it." In Clark v. Martin, supra, the court said: "It was objected at the argument that this remedy [injunction] applies only as a means of compelling an observance of the terms involved in a general plan of lots; and this element actually exists in about half of the cases just cited; yet they are not decided on that consideration. It is not because a plan is deranged that the court interferes, but because rights are invaded, or about to be; and this fact may exist in a plan of two lots, as well as in one of two hundred. The plan often furnishes the proof of the terms on which sales were made; but the fact of the alleged terms is as effective when proved by a single deed as when proved by a plan."

The respondent relies upon the opinion in the case of Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 332, 50 L.R.A. 120, 57 N. E. 692. The case of Clapp v. Wilder is clearly distinguish-able from that at bar. It is not, and it is not intended as, a departure from the general rule laid down in Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, and a long line of Massachusetts cases, but is a case where an injunction was denied because, from the facts, the court found that the restriction was imposed for the personal benefit of the grantor, and not for the benefit of his remaining land. In Clapp v. Wilder the facts were that one Eaton was the owner of lot B, upon which was his dwelling house, and lot A, upon which was a store. While negotiations for the purchase of lot A were pending between Eaton, an invalid, and the defendants, and prior to the delivery of the deed, the grantor told the defendants that if he sold them the property he did not wish his view of Central street from his sitting room window cut off, and he should have some clause inserted in the deed to prevent this, and when the deed was delivered he told the defendants he had put in a clause so that his view of Central street from his sitting room window should not be cut off, and this was the restriction contained in the deed. From these facts the majority of the court found that the condition was imposed for the grantor's personal benefit, and not for the benefit of the land, and, in a suit commenced a number of years after the grantor's death, the court refused to grant an injunction in favor of the owners of lot B.

In the case at bar we cannot consider the provision in the deed to Hooper as a form of idle words. It had some purpose. It was intended either for the benefit of the adjoining land or for the benefit of Nicholas Ball personally. If, upon a reading of the provision by one unacquainted with the circumstances, the advantage sought for the adjoining land is not very clearly shown, the benefit to be derived from the provision by Mr. Ball personally, unconnected with his ownership of the adjoining land, is incomprehensible. The necessary and reasonable presumption in this, as in all such cases, is that the restriction is for the benefit of the remaining land, and courts will never hold it to be for the personal benefit of the grantor in the absence of circumstances indicating it. In addition to the natural presumption that the restriction was not for the personal benefit of Nicholas Ball, we have the assistance of the language of the provision: "The said J. Hooper, his heirs and assigns, shall not convert," etc., and "the said grantee for himself and his heirs and assigns promises to reconvey said estate to said grantor, his heirs, executors, and assigns, in case of any violation of the foregoing promises in this deed,"—clearly inapt language to impose a restriction for the grantor's personal benefit during his life. And if the provision was not for the benefit of Mr. Ball, it must have been for the benefit of the remaining land. It appears in testimony that on the remaining land was a general store conducted by Nicholas Ball and later by this complainant. In a rural and fishing community, such as Block Island is, it is of great advantage to land containing a general store to have in its immediate neighborhood a building used for the purposes named in the restriction, to which farmers and fishermen will be constantly attracted. Also the restriction would prevent the use of said land for the purposes of a general store in competition with the general store situated on the remaining land, and the restriction in that way was for the benefit of the remainder of the tract. All the surrounding circumstances fail to show any possible benefit to Nicholas Ball except as owner of the land, and the restriction is clearly in some respects of benefit to the adjoining land. It is unreasonable to object that it does not appear by express language that the restriction is for the benefit of the land. Such language is unusual. In a large number of cases appearing in the reports where injunctions have been granted, no such language has been incorporated in the deed.

This case, in our opinion, is not governed by that of Clapp v. Wilder. It falls clearly in the rule of Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715; Hopkins v. Smith, 162 Mass. 447, 38 N. E. 1122, and other cases in Massachusetts and other jurisdictions.

In Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632, the court said: "Restrictions and limitations which may be put on property by means of such stipulations derive their validity from the right which every owner of the fee has to dispose of his estate either absolutely or by a qualified grant, or to regulate the manner in which it shall be used and occupied. So long as he [the grantee] retains the title in himself, his covenants and agreements respecting the use and enjoyment of his estate will be binding on him personally, and can be specifically enforced in equity. When he disposes of it by grant or otherwise, those who take under him cannot equitably refuse to fulfil stipulations concerning the premises of which they had notice. It is upon this ground that courts of equity will afford relief to parties aggrieved by the neglect or omission to comply with agreements respecting real estate after it has passed by mesne conveyances 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) out of the hands of those who were parties to the original contract."

In Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, the court considered the effect of a restriction upon the use of land contained in a deed. The case was a suit in equity for an injunction against a subsequent grantee to restrain a violation of the provision in the deed. The court said, at page 364 of 11 Gray: "In like manner, by taking an estate from a grantor with notice of valid agreements made by him with the former owner of the property, concerning the mode of occupation and use of the estate granted, the purchaser is bound in equity to fulfil such agreements with the original owner, because it would be unconscientious and inequitable for him to set aside and disregard the legal and valid acts and agreements of his vendor in regard to the estate, of which he had notice when he became its purchaser. In this view, the precise form or nature of the covenant or agreement is quite immaterial. It is not essential that it should run with the land. A personal covenant or agreement will be held valid and binding in equity on a purchaser taking the estate with notice. It is not binding on him merely because he stands as an assignee of the party who made the agreement, but because he has taken the estate with notice of a valid agreement concerning it, which he cannot equitably refuse to perform. Sugden, Vendors, 11th ed. 734-743; Bedford v. British Museum, 2 Myl. & K. 552, 2 L. J. Ch. N. S. 129; Bristow v. Wood, 1 Colly Ch. Cas. 480, 14 L. J. Ch. N. S. 50, 9 Jur. 99; Whatman v. Gibson, 9 Sim. 196, 7 L. J. Ch. N. S. 160, 2 Jur. 273; Schreiber v. Creed, 10 Sim. 9, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 346, 3 Jur. 625; Barrow v. Richard, 8 Paige, 356, 360, 35 Am. Dec. 713. The validity of agreements similar to those in the plaintiff's deed to White has been also recognized and established, and their performance enforced in equity, as against subsequent purchasers with notice, upon the ground that such stipulations create an easement or privilege in the land conveyed, for the use and benefit of the grantor and those who might afterwards claim under him as owners of adjacent land, of which the land granted originally formed a part. In such cases, although the covenant or agreement in the deed, regarded as a contract merely, is binding only on the original parties, yet, in order to carry out the plain intent of the parties, it will be construed as creating a right or interest in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament or easement, appurtenant to the remaining land belonging to the grantor at the time of the grant, and arising out of and attached to the land, part of the original parcel, conveyed to the grantee. When therefore it appears by a fair interpretation of the words of a grant, that it was the intent of the parties to create or reserve a right in the nature of a servitude or easement, in the property granted, for the benefit of other land owned by the grantor, and originally forming with the land conveyed one parcel, such right will be deemed appurtenant to the land of the grantor, and binding on that conveyed to the grantee, and the right and burden thus created will respectively pass to and be binding on all subsequent grantees of the respective lots of land."

In Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phill. Ch. 774, it appeared that land had been conveyed with a restriction upon its use contained in the deed. The land had come to the ownership of the defendant. The defendant, with notice of the covenant contained in the conveyance, manifested an intention of acting in violation of the covenant. In a bill praying for an injunction to restrain the defendant, Lord Chancellor Cottenham said: "It is said that, the covenant being one which does not run with the land, this court cannot enforce it; but the question is, not whether the covenant runs with the land, but whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor, and with notice of which he purchased. Of course, the price would be affected by the covenant, and nothing could be more inequitable than that the original purchaser should be able to sell the property the next day for a greater price, in consideration of the assignee being allowed to escape from the liability which he had himself undertaken." And further the court said: "If an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased."

A case in point is Post v. Weil, 115 N. Y. 361, 5 L.R.A. 422, 12 Am. St. Rep. 809, 22 N. E. 145. One Hogan was the owner and occupier of two estates; one "Monte Alta" and the other "Cleremont" in upper New York city. In 1811 Hogan and wife deeded the two estates to trustees. In a few months thereafter, Monte Alta was conveyed to one Mark by deed in which were joined Hogan and wife and the trustees as grantors. The deed, which was a warranty deed, contained in the habendum clause the following provisions, viz.: "Provided always, and these presents are upon this express condition, that the aforesaid premises shall not, nor shall any part thereof, or any building or buildings thereon erected or to be erected, be at any time hereafter used or occupied as a tavern or public house of any kind." The court said, at page 371 of 115 N. Y.: "If we can construe this clause as an obligation to abstain from doing the thing described, which, by acceptance of the deed, became binding upon the grantee as an agreement, enforceable in behalf of any interest entitled to invoke its protection, I think we are in conscience bound to give that construction." And the court further said: "Now the obvious and only purpose which Hogan could have had in view, when the contract was made, was to protect the adjacent property which he then owned from being injured by the vicinity of an undesirable structure or business. I think we all will agree that the presumption here, as in every other case where a restriction is inserted in a deed against undesirable structures or trades, is that the insertion was for the purpose of protecting rights which the grantor had in adjacent property. In this case the clause obviously was for the benefit of the Cleremont estate. . . . The clause in question in the case at bar was intended as a restriction, created for the benefit of the adjoining property, expressed in the strongest terms, and which was enforceable as a covenant running with the land, and was not a condition subsequent, imposed for the personal benefit of the grantors and their heirs."

Watrous v. Allen, 57 Mich. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 363, 24 N. W. 104, is a proceeding in equity to enforce by injunction a condition contained in a deed restricting the use of premises conveyed. Cooley, Ch. J., writing the opinion of the court, approved those cases in which it is held that the fact that a penalty or forfeiture is imposed for doing a prohibited act is no obstacle to the interposition of equity by injunction. The opinion cites with approval Clark v. Martin, 40 Pa. 289, and Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, in which cases the remedy was sought by a grantee of the party in whose favor the condition was reserved, and an injunction was granted on the ground that the condition was imposed for the benefit of the remaining land of the grantor. In Clark v. Martin, supra, the defendant, at the time of filing the bill, was the owner of building and lot immediately adjoining to the south. Both lots were formerly parts of a large lot which, before 1814 was held by one Henry and wife. In 1814 Henry and wife conveyed the lot which, at the time of filing the bill, belonged to the defendant, upon the express condition that the grantees, their heirs and assigns, should not build any buildings except outbuildings for the accommodation of the dwelling house, exceeding the height of 10 feet from the level of the ground. The defendant's lot passed to him by mesne conveyance, and the other lot passed by conveyance to the complainant. The bill alleged that it was the intention of the defendant to build on the corner lot, without regard to the restriction, under pretense of a right so to do, and prayed an injunction to restrain the defendant. The court said: "Here the duty of the defendant is so plain that one may read it running; it is clearly inscribed on every link of the chain of his title to the lot. He took his title expressly on the terms already briefly mentioned. He was not to erect on the back part of his lot any building higher than 10 feet, afterwards changed to 11. To whom then does he owe the duty? No one doubts that it is to the grantor who reserved or imposed the duty, and to his heirs and assigns. But did the grantor reserve this duty to himself, his heirs and assigns, as a mere personal duty, and thus retain in himself or them the vain right of saying that lot is not mine, but the owner is subject to my pleasure in the mode of building upon it? Common sense forbids this, and the law would not allow itself to be troubled with such vain engagements. . . . We have no other resource, therefore, than to attribute the restriction to the purpose of benefiting the adjoining lot then owned by Henry. Common sense cannot doubt its purpose, and thus it becomes plain that the duty created by the condition and restriction is a duty to the owner of the adjoining lot, whoever he might be."

From this review of the authorities we are of the opinion that the complainant, as the owner of the land for the benefit of which the restriction in the Hooper deed was imposed, should have an injunction as prayed, unless, as the respondent claims, "the complainant's action is barred by laches, and he is estopped from claiming, and has waived the breach," or "the complainant's action is barred by our statute, of limitations."

From the testimony in the case it appears that in the lifetime of Nicholas Ball, and since the ownership of the adjoining land by this complainant, there have been certain slight departures from the terms of the restriction in the deed on the part of the owners of the Hooper lot. At one time a portion of the building was used as a place to build a number of boats; but blacksmithing formed a considerable part of the process of boat building. A portion of the building was for a time used as a place of meeting for the Masonic and Odd Fellows lodges of the town, after their regular meeting place had been destroyed by fire. A part of the building was used for a considerable time as a cobbler's shop; but it appears by the testimony that the repairing of shoes was carried on in connection with harness making, one of the trades permitted by the restriction in the deed. Another portion of the building was used for the making, repairing, and storing of sails; but the repairing of tackle was permitted by the deed. All these departures were violations of the letter of the restriction rather than its spirit. It is not shown clearly by the testimony that Nicholas Ball was aware of these violations of the condition in the deed. The complainant admits that he went to the cobbler's shop to have harness repaired, but claims that he knew of no violation of the deed until he learned of the acts of this respondent and her tenants, and that then, at once, he commenced this suit. It is abundantly supported by authority, however, that a permission for the use of a portion of the building for some trades, such as shoemaking or as a sail loft, or the temporary use of a portion of the building for holding society meetings, will not prevent an insistence upon the restriction to prevent a violation of the condition by other uses of the building, such as for the sale of intoxicating liquors or for the keeping of horses or swine.

We are of the opinion, from an examination of the testimony, that the complainant's right to an injunction is not barred by laches or by the statute of limitations, and that he has not waived the breach of the condition contained in the Hooper deed. The complainant, as owner of the remainder of the tract of land which was in Nicholas Ball after the deed from said Ball to John W. Hooper, is entitled to an injunction restraining the respondent from any violation of the restriction contained in said deed to Hooper, except as to the trade of repairing shoes, the use of which trade we find that the complainant has permitted in a room upon the second floor of said building, and as to the continued use of said trade in said place in said building the respondent should not be restrained.

The parties may present a form of decree in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

A motion for reargument having been filed, the following per curiam response was handed down January 20, 1911 (78 Atl. 625):

We find nothing in the motion for reargument which has not been argued by counsel and considered by the court, or which affects the conclusions set out in the opinion. The suggestions contained in this motion relating to costs can be addressed to the court more seasonably when the form of decree is presented for entry.

Respondent's motion is denied and dismissed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

C. S. JACKSON, Appt.,
v.
A. W. STEARNS, Resp't.

(58 Or. 57, 113 Pac. 30.)

Contract — statute of frauds — sufficiency of letters.

1. Letters passing between an alleged vendor and vendee cannot be read together to constitute a contract for the sale of real estate, if they do not identify the land which is intended to be the subject-matter of the contract, as to which there is a dispute, so that parol evidence would be required to substantiate the truth of the matter.

Same — action for breach — recovery for services.

2. The value of services performed in consideration of a parol agreement to convey real estate cannot be recovered in an action for damages for breach of the contract.

(February 7, 1911.)

Note. — Right to recover value of services rendered in consideration of contract to convey or devise property, which is void by the statute of frauds.

As to the right to recover for services rendered beyond the statutory period of limitation, upon breach of parol contract to make provision by will, see the note to Goodloe v. Goodloe, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 703.

As to the right to recover on quantum meruit for services performed or material furnished under express contract invalid because the minds of the parties did not meet as to the terms thereof, see the note to Vickery v. Ritchie, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 810.

And as to the right of one who breaks contract to support another for life, to recover on quantum meruit, see the note to Ptacek v. Pisa, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 537.

Generally, where services are rendered on an agreement which is void by the statute of frauds, an action will lie on the implied promise to pay for such services; but the promise is implied not from the services alone, but from the benefit to defendant as well, and if defendant has received no benefit, there can be no recovery. 20 Cyc. 300.

The law is abundantly well settled that in cases where services have been rendered in consideration of a contract to convey or devise property, or make provision for one by will, which is unenforceable and void by the statute of frauds, and the adverse party has either refused or become unable to per-

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Josephine County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. Affirmed.

Statement by Moore, J.:

This is an action by C. S. Jackson against A. W. Stearns to recover damages resulting from the breach of an agreement. The facts are that plaintiff, an attorney, prepared duplicate copies of a contract wherein it was stipulated that if he could secure a decree quieting the defendant's title to 320 acres of land, describing the premises, and would advance the court expenses, if so required, the defendant, in consideration thereof, would execute to him a good and sufficient deed to one half of the real property so obtained. The plaintiff subscribed his name to the writings and sent them by mail to the defendant, and thereupon began in the proper court a suit in which Stearns was plaintiff and the parties asserting title to such lands were defendants, alleging in the complaint that the deed executed to them by Stearns was intended as security for the payment of a debt, and praying that the mortgage be canceled. Issue having been joined, plaintiff wrote defendant that the cause had been referred form his part, the party having rendered the services may treat the contract as a nullity, and sue on a quantum meruit for the value of such services. This rule finds support in JACKSON v. STEARNS as well as in the following additional cases: Butler v. Kent, 152 Ala. 594, 44 So. 863; Grant v. Grant, 63 Conn. 530, 38 Am. St. Rep. 379, 29 Atl. 15; Watson v. Watson, 1 Houst. in order to take the testimony. Upon the receipt of such information, the following letter was written:

Canyonville, Or., Oct. 26, '04.

C. S. Jackson.

Dear Sir:—

I received your letter and agreement, and you did not state whether your would stand good for Ira B. Riddle taking the evidence. If you will pay him, I will sign the agreement and send it down. Please let me know as soon as possible.

Yours respectfully,
A. W. Stearna.

In reply Jackson wrote, inter alia, as follows: "Yes; I will advance Mr. Riddle his costs, and please insert it in the contract and return my copy to me." Stearna did not sign either copy of the contract, but upon the receipt of $300 from the adverse parties, he, without plaintiff's consent, dismissed the suit. Thereafter this action was commenced, the complaint stating in substance the facts as hereinbefore detailed, and averring that by reason of dismissing such suit plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $4,500; that he had performed all the conditions of the contract required of him, and would have recovered the lands, but was prevented from doing so by the wrongful acts of the defendant; that plaintiff was at all times ready, able, and willing to prosecute such suit to final termination, and to recover the lands, the rea-

Grover, 60 Wis. 240, 19 N. W. 62; Ellis v. Cary, 74 Wis. 176, 4 L.R.A. 55, 17 Am. St. Rep. 125, 42 N. W. 252; Koch v. Williams, 82 Wis. 186, 52 N. W. 257.

And Burlingame v. Burlingame, 7 Cow. 92, seems to support this rule, notwithstanding it has been cited as sustaining the proposition that in order to recover for services rendered under a void contract to convey, one should found his action on the special contract. It is very clearly pointed out, however, in King v. Brown, 2 Hill, 486, that the whole scope of the doctrine of the Burlingame Case went to show that the plaintiff must recover, if at all, under the general counts, on the ground that the contract was void.

"This doctrine," it was said in Cozad v. Elam, 115 Mo. App. 136, 91 S. W. 434, "runs through all the books. The principle underlying it is that parol contracts of this class, although not legally, are morally, binding, and payments made under them cannot be reclaimed so long as the party receiving such payment is not in fault; but if he repudiates the contract, a right of reclamation upon the principles of equity and good conscience accrues to the other party. This doctrine is eminently just, and permeates our entire jurisprudence under this head. It is unnecessary to accumulate authorities thereon."

The rule rests on the strongest equity, compelling a party who has received a benefit from a part execution of a contract which binds neither party, to make compensation for the benefit which he has received. Cohen v. Stein, 61 Wis. 508, 21 N. W. 514.

This is the universal rule in cases where the contract is void for any cause not illegal, if the defendant be in default. And it is the value of the services, not that of the land, that is to be recovered. Erben v. Lorillard, 19 N. Y. 299.

In Koch v. Williams, 82 Wis. 186, 52 N. W. 257, the court, after holding that the plaintiffs, who had rendered valuable services to the defendants under a void contract to convey, were entitled to recover what such services were reasonably worth, said: "This, at first blush, might appear to be a hardship on the defendants, who never agreed to pay for such services in money, and have offered to pay according to the oral contract by a conveyance of the lot. But it is inevitable, from holding the contract void. The statute must be complied with as long as it is in force. It is no hardship to put such a contract in writing, and if parties suffer by not complying with the statute, it is a penalty due to their own negligence, and they have no reason to complain."

Where the plaintiff was to pay for land by the rendition of services, it was held in Bonnon v. Urton, 3 G. Greene, 223, supra, that if the defendant failed to make payment in the land, the plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover the value of the land at the time payments should have been made, with interest, although the contract was not in writing. It was said: "If the plaintiff worked for a particular object, and performed the work according to contract, he was surely entitled to the object or its value. Law, justice, and common honesty unite in support of this proposition."

In Dix v. Marcy, 116 Mass. 416, where the plaintiff conveyed property to the defendant upon an oral agreement of the defendant to furnish him and his family with support during their lives, and to give a mortgage on the property or a life lease to secure the support, it was held, after the defendant partly performed the contract and then refused to give the mortgage, that, while the agreement was within the statute of frauds and void, the plaintiff was nevertheless entitled to recover the value of the property conveyed, less the value of the support furnished in part performance.

And in Graham v. Graham, 134 App. Div. 777, 119 N. Y. Supp. 1013, where the premises to be purchased by the promisor were not to be conveyed to the promisee, but to a third party, in consideration of the rendition of services, etc., by the promisee, and sonable worth of all of which is $9,000, and the value of the part agreed to be conveyed to plaintiff for his services is $4,500; and "that by reason of defendant's wrongful acts, he has unjustly enriched himself, and the plaintiff has suffered great damage and loss in the sum aforesaid, which plaintiff alleges to be reasonable compensation for said services." Judgment is demanded for the sum of $4,500.

The answer admits that plaintiff is an attorney; that defendant retained him to perform the services specified; and that, pursuant to such employment, plaintiff instituted in the proper court the suit referred to, which defendant caused to be dismissed. All the other averments of the complaint are denied, and for a further defense it is alleged that plaintiff and defendant entered into negotiations with a view of making a contract whereby plaintiff was to receive a deed for the east half of the particular 160 acres described in the complaint; and that no writing or memorandum was ever signed by defendant or by any person on his behalf, respecting such negotiations, in consequence of which the verbal understanding referred to in the complaint as a contract is void. A reply having put in issue the allegations of new matter in the answer, the cause was tried, but the jury, failing to agree, were discharged. The parties hereto thereupon stipulated that the testimony taken at that trial, supplemented by the depositions of certain witnesses, should be submitted to the agreement was unenforceable because not written, in so far as the third party was concerned, it was held that the promisee, having performed the services and the other requirements, was entitled to recover the value of the services rendered in performance of the voidable parol contract, on the implied contract to repay. The court said: "This implied promise is raised, for the reason that the court will not allow the statute of frauds to be made an instrument of fraud."

In Sims v. McEwen, 27 Ala. 184, it was held that, notwithstanding the parol agreement in respect to lands was void, so that no action at law might be maintained for its breach, yet for services rendered under it a quantum meruit claim might be successfully prosecuted. In Butler v. Kent, 152 Ala. 594, 44 So. 863, however, it was said of Sims v. McEwen, supra, that "at the time the decision was made, our statute of frauds did not declare parol agreements void. It simply declared that no action could be maintained on them."

In McDaniel v. Hutcherson, 136 Ky. 412, 124 S. W. 384, where the defendant, to induce the plaintiff to leave his home and business in the state of Illinois, orally agreed that if the plaintiff and his family would come to Kentucky to live with the defendant, he would furnish him with a home during the defendant's life, and give the plaintiff his home place at the defendant's death, and then refused to perform, it was held that, while the agreement was within the statute of frauds, the plaintiff could, nevertheless, recover reasonable compensation for what he did under the contract before it was disaffirmed by the defendant. "That is to say, he may recover his reasonable expenses in moving to Kentucky, a reasonable compensation for the time lost in so doing, and a reasonable compensation for any loss that he actually sustained in giving up his home and business in Illinois and coming to Kentucky."

And the measure of damages in such cases is the value of the services, and not the value of the property agreed upon. Flowers v. Poorman, 43 Ind. App. 528, 87 N. E. 1107; 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Wallace v. Long, 105 Ind. 522, 55 Am. Rep. 222, 5 N. E. 666.

In assumpsit for the recovery of services rendered upon a void contract for the conveyance of lands, the measure of the plaintiff's relief is the reasonable value of the services rendered, without reference to, and disconnected with, the express contract; the defendant's liability in such case rests upon an implied promise or assumpsit, and evidence of the value of the land stipulated to be conveyed in the express void agreement is inadmissible as a measure of the value of services rendered by plaintiff. Fuller v. Reed, 38 Cal. 99, wherein it was said: "To permit such testimony for the purpose of establishing the reasonable value of services rendered by plaintiff . . . would, in effect, allow a party in one breath to disaffirm a contract, and in the next to affirm and claim the benefit of the same contract as valid and subsisting, and substantially enable him to recover as for breach of a valid express contract in a simple action of assumpsit upon an implied contract."

But it has been held that the unenforceable contract, in which the rate or mode of compensation for the services is fixed, is competent evidence on the question of the value of the services. Capers v. Stewart, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 355.

The rule in Kentucky, it was said in Waters v. Cline, 121 Ky. 611, 123 Am. St. Rep. 215, 85 S. W. 209, is "that the statute [of frauds] is a shield, not a sword, and that, where the party has received the consideration of the contract, the court will not allow him to rely upon the statute and keep the consideration. . . . In applying this rule in cases where the party who has performed the contract cannot be restored to the situation in which he was before the contract was made, and it is impossible to estimate by any pecuniary standard the value of what the other party has received, this court has adopted the rule that in such cases the contract itself is the best evidence of the value of what has been received, and, while it will not enforce specific performance by decreeing a conveyance of the land, it will adjudge compensa-the court, which, considering the evidence, found the facts in effect as stated hereinbefore, and as a conclusion of law based thereon found, inter alia, as follows: "The contract sued upon is for the conveyance of real property, and in order to be valid it must be shown to have been in writing and signed by the defendant. The evidence failing to show that defendant signed the alleged contract, the plaintiff cannot recover in his action,"—and from a judgment rendered in accordance therewith, the plaintiff appeals.

Where an attorney makes a special con-tion for what has been received by the defendant under the contract, measured by the consideration which, by the contract, he agreed to as the value of what he received."

But as is held in JACKSON v. STEARNS, while the rule is clearly established that one who renders services under an unenforceable contract is entitled to recover on quantum meruit the fair value of such services, he is not entitled to recover their value in an action for damages for breach of the contract. See, to the same effect, the following cases: Baxter v. Kitch, 37 Ind. 554; Hershman v. Pascal, 4 Ind. App. 330, 30 N. E. 932; Banta v. Banta, 103 App. Div. 172, 93 N. Y. Supp. 393, reversing on another point 84 App. Div. 138, 82 N. Y. Supp. 113; Hamilton v. Thirston, 93 Md. 213, 48 Atl. 709; King v. Brown, 2 Hill, 485.

And so in Howard v. Brower, 37 Ohio St. 402, it was held that a verdict rendered in a suit on a void agreement to devise property could not be regarded as a finding of the value of services as upon a quantum meruit, where the case was not submitted to the jury for such finding, but under instructions to assess the damages according to the terms of a void agreement.

And in an action to recover on quantum meruit the value of labor and services rendered under a contract void by the statute of frauds, an instruction which rests on the theory that part performance validates the contract, and permits a recovery in precise accordance with its terms as if it were valid, constitutes error. Leslie v. Smith, 32 Mich. 64.

But in Graham v. Graham, 134 App. Div. 777, 119 N. Y. Supp. 1013, supra, where it was insisted that the complaint was not in proper form, it was said: "The case of King-

v. Brown, 2 Hill, 485, is cited as requiring a complaint to be upon the common counts. That case, however, was decided when different forms of actions were required and technical pleading was necessary. Since the abolition of forms of actions by the Code, a plaintiff may simply state the facts upon which he claims relief, and, if the facts stated are sufficient to authorize relief, his complaint cannot be challenged as not in any particular form. The complaint in this case alleges a parol contract to convey land, unenforceable by the statute of frauds, a repudiation of that oral contract by the promisor, the payment of money and the performance of labor and service upon the faith of said contract by the plaintiff, and seeks to recover therefor. These allegations would seem to contain all the allegations necessary to a cause of action upon the contract, which the law implies where services are rendered under a contract void by the statute of frauds, which the promisor refuses to fulfil."

In Johnston v. Myers, 138 Iowa, 497, 116 N. W. 600, while one was held to be entitled to recover the reasonable value of services rendered under an unenforceable contract to devise property, she was not entitled to a lien on a specific lot, since it did not appear that the will intended to charge the specific lot with a lien for the payment of the services.

But in Pragoff v. Flood, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 636, where one by parol was promised a gift of realty in consideration of services rendered, and the promisor died before drawing the deed, it was held that the promisee was entitled to a lien on the realty for the value of his services.

tract with the client in a suit or action for a certain fee contingent upon success in the case, and the client afterwards dismisses the case or settles the same without the attorney's consent, the attorney is not entitled, as a matter of law, to recover the whole contingent fee, but he may recover on a special count or a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of his services.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The question to be considered is whether or not the conclusion of law quoted is deducible from the facts as found. As a matter preliminary to a determination of the inquiry, attention will be called to certain clauses of our statute: "No estate or interest in real property, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust or power concerning such property, can be created, transferred, or declared, otherwise than by operation of law, or by a conveyance or other instrument in writing, subscribed by the party creating, transferring, or declaring the same, or by his lawful agent, under written authority, and executed with such formalities as are required by law." L. O. L. § 804. "In the following cases the agreement is void unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration, be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his lawfully authorized agent; evidence, therefore, of the agreement, shall not be received other than the writing, or secondary evidence of its contents, in the cases prescribed by law: . . .

6. An agreement . . . for the sale of real property, or of any interest therein." Id. § 808.

It will be remembered that Jackson signed duplicate copies of the contract which he mailed to Stearns, but the defendant never subscribed his name to the writing, and no memorandum was executed by him, unless it can be said that his letter of October 26, 1904, when read in connection with other correspondence, is sufficient to answer the requirements of the statute of frauds. In the communication referred to Stearns promised to sign the agreement if Jackson would pay the referee's fees. The plaintiff's answer presupposes an insertion in the contract of his consent to advance such fees, a provision 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which, in substance, was originally included therein. It will thus be seen that both parties intended some affirmative acts should be performed by Stearns before the contracts would become effective.

Separate writings exchanged by parties and relating to the same subject-matter cannot constitute a contract between them, unless it was then their intention that an agreement should be consummated by their correspondence. Bishop, Contr. 2d ed. § 165. The writings stipulated that Jackson should receive from Stearns a deed conveying one half of all the lands for which a decree quieting the title could be secured. The complaint avers that the land thus agreed to be granted to plaintiff for his services is a particular 160 acres, which is a variance, while the answer alleges that the part promised by defendant was only the east half of such quarter section. As the contract did not specify the particular land which plaintiff was to receive, and as an issue was joined in respect to the tract which he asserts was to have been conveyed to him, and that which the defendant claims was promised, oral evidence was necessary to substantiate the truth of the matter, and in such cases the writings cannot be read together so as to constitute a contract between them. 12 Enc. Ev. 16; 2 Page, Contr. § 688; Longfellow v. Huffman, 57 Or. 338, 112 Pac. 8. We conclude therefore, that no written contract was effectuated by the parties.

It is maintained by plaintiff that the services which he agreed to perform were to have been compensated by a conveyance of land, and such being the case the value of the premises is the measure of the damages which he sustained in consequence of the defendant's conduct. Some of the cases relied upon to support the legal principle asserted will be examined. In Jack v. McKee, 9 Pa. 235, the declaration alleged that a parol agreement was entered into whereby defendant's testator, in consideration that plaintiff would continue to live at and take care of his house until he died, would give her a certain piece of land; that pursuant thereto she performed the service,*but the testator did not keep his part of the agreement, and devised the premises to others. In a suit to recover the value of the services on a breach of the contract, it was held that the agreement, though not evidenced by a writing, was not within the statute of frauds, and that the damages sustained were the value of the land, and not a quantum meruit for the services rendered. The legislative assembly of Pennsylvania never adopted § 4 of the statute of 29 Car. II, chap. 3, which provides that "no action shall be brought

. . . upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, . . . unless . . . some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some person thereunto by him lawfully authorized" (Browne, Stat. Fr. 5th ed. p. 648); or enacted any other clause in lieu thereof. Bell v. Andrews, 4 Dall. 152, 1 L. ed. 779; McDowell v. Oyer, 21 Pa. 417, 425. In Hertzog v. Hertzog, 34 Pa. 418, 419, Mr. Justice Woodward, referring to the failure to accept such provision, remarks: "The omission from our statute of frauds and perjuries, of the 4th section of the British statute, after which ours was modeled, left us free to sue on parol contracts for the sale of lands." In that case the doctrine announced in Jack v. McKee, supra, was expressly overruled, and it was held that in an action for the breach of an oral contract to convey land, in consideration of money paid or services rendered, the damages were to be measured by the amount of money expended, or the worth of the labor performed, and not by the value of the land. In Hertzog v. Hertzog, 34 Pa. 418, 435, a dissenting opinion rendered in the case of Malaun v. Ammon, 1 Grant, Cas. 123, 145, is incorporated, wherein Mr. Justice Woodward, alluding to errors which might be committed by a court of last resort, and relied upon as a controlling precedent, observes: "For myself, I take occasion to say that when, through accident, press of business, or misconception, a decision is pronounced which subverts a fundamental rule of property, and by consequence renders every man's estate insecure,—which, under color of compensating personal services, strips families of their patrimonial acres, which, in short, subjects land titles to the changes and chances of parol evidence,—the maxim of stare decisis bids us to go back to the old, straight, safe paths, and not to blunder again and again, because we have blundered once."

In Lipscomb v. Adams, 193 Mo. 530, 112 Am. St. Rep. 500, 91 S. W. 1046, it appeared that a written contract had been executed, acknowledged, and recorded as required by law concerning agreements affecting real property, whereby plaintiffs, who were attorneys, stipulated to prosecute all suits necessary to recover for their client certain lands, in consideration of which service, if successful, she was to execute to them deeds for one half of the real property secured by decree, or if a compromise were effected, they were to receive a moiety either of the money or premises obtained in settlement. Pursuant to the agreement, plaintiffs began for their client proper suits, pending which she, in consideration of $600, compromised the controversy, executed to the parties who asserted titles to the lands deeds of all her interest therein except as to 13 acres, and thereupon dismissed the suit without the consent of her attorneys. They thereafter brought suits against the persons to whom she had executed deeds, to recover one half of the land that was claimed, under the contract with their client, which suits were compromised by the attorneys, who paid to one of the parties a sum of money for a quitclaim deed of his interest, and executed to another party a deed to a portion of the land in consideration of a conveyance to them of the remainder. The attorneys thereafter instituted a suit against Adams who, by mesne conveyances, held the legal title to the 13 acres, which were not included in the compromise, to recover a moiety of the land, and it was held that they were entitled thereto. It was further determined that a contract whereby attorneys, if successful in litigation for the recovery of land, were to receive one half thereof, the moiety being worth $1,500 or $2,000, was not so unreasonable as to be unenforceable in equity, though the amount of labor actually performed by the attorneys was small because of a compromise of the suit by the client without their consent. In that case the contract having been duly executed and recorded, the parties who purchased any of the real property described in agreement took the title to the premises with notice of the attorney's claim to an interest in the land, and as the memorandum was in writing, expressing the consideration, and subscribed by the party to be charged, the contract was not within the statute of frauds.

In Weil v. Fineran, 78 Ark. 87, 93 S. W. 568, which was an action by an attorney against his client, the complaint averred in the first count the plaintiff's employment to perform services for the defendant, and that she refused to permit him to do so, whereby he was damaged; and also alleged in another count that defendant was indebted to him for services rendered and money spent at her request, of the reasonable value of a stated sum, and it was held that plaintiff was not entitled to recover on quantum meruit as he had not elected to treat the contract as rescinded. In that case it appears from an instruction that the defendant had agreed to pay $100 for plaintiff's services, and also promised to reimburse him for all sums of money expended on her account, and further to give him 20 per cent of her interest in a certain estate in case he could establish her right thereto and recover the same for her, and also, by a power of attorney, she appointed him her agent to procure such interest. It is impossible to state from an examination of the facts disclosed whether or not the estate to which the client's claim was to have been established consisted of personal or real property, but if it be conceded that it comprised only the latter class, the power of attorney, which must have been in writing and duly subscribed, undoubtedly afforded a memorandum sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Though the judgment was reversed in consequence of an erroneous instruction having been given, it was intimated that, while the plaintiff was suing for a breach of the contract and asking for the resulting damages, the action was maintainable.

In Wright v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 141 Mo. App. 518, 126 S. W. 517, which was a suit to enforce an attorney's lien for a fee based on a written agreement entered into by the attorney and his client, whereby the latter was to pay the lawyer 50 per cent of any sum that might be secured in consequence of personal injuries which he had sustained, the contract stipulated that the client should not compromise or settle the claim without the written consent of the attorney. The defendant, having notice of the lien, demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because the clause not to compromise the claim for damages rendered the contract unenforceable. The demurrer was sustained and the action dismissed, but upon appeal the judgment was reversed, the court holding that the contract was not void as contrary to public policy, and that the validity of the provision could only be called in question in case the attorney undertook to enforce it against his client. In that case the agreement did not relate to real property, and, as the contract was in writing and signed by the client, the statute of frauds was not involved.

In Davis v. Webber, 66 Ark. 190, 45 L.R.A. 196, 74 Am. St. Rep. 81, 89, 40 S. W. 822, which was a suit to recover a stated sum for services performed by an attorney for his client, in securing a judgment and to declare and enforce a lien upon certain property, it was held that, though the written contract, subscribed by the parties, was void because of a stipulation that the client should not settle or compromise the controversy without the attorney's consent, compensation might be granted the attorney for his services under the rule of quantum meruit, and the contract might be examined to ascertain what value the parties themselves considered the services reasonably worth. In that case the agreement, being in writing, was not within the statute of frauds. It is fair to assume that the suit was for the recovery of the reasonable value of the services performed by the attorney, for Mr. Justice Wood, in referring thereto, says: "Now, Webber, under the quantum meruit, should receive pay only for the services actually rendered."

In Ham v. Goodrich, 37 N. H. 185, an agreement to convey land in consideration of services to be rendered was held to be within the statute of frauds, yet, upon a quantum meruit to recover the reasonable worth of the services performed, it was ruled that the value of the land was not the fixed measure of the damages, though such value was competent evidence to be considered in determining the question of damages. In that case one of the counts in the declaration in assumpsit was as follows: "That on the 1st day of January, 1824, the deceased, in consideration that the plaintiff agreed to live, with his family, with the deceased, take care of him, and serve him till his death, promised to pay him so much money," etc.; and alleged that he deserved to have $5,000. It will thus be seen that a quantum meruit was relied upon as a basis for the recovery.

Attention has been called to the case of Ingersoll v. Coram, 211 U. S. 335, 53 L. ed. 208, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92, which in effect overrules the decision in Harris v. Root, 28 Mont. 159, 72 Pac. 429, as sustaining plaintiff's theory. In the principal case referred to, the contract stipulating for the payment of a fee in case of a successful termination of the controversy did not provide that a performance of the service by the attorney should have been compensated by a conveyance of real property, and hence the agreement was not violative of the statute of frauds.

2. An examination of the averments of the complaint in the case at bar will show that the cause of action undertaken to be stated is founded on the contract to recover the damages resulting from a breach of the agreement. It will be remembered, however, that the pleading referred to states that $4,500, the damage sustained, is the reasonable compensation for the services performed. While this clause is expressed in the form of an averment of fact, it would seem to be nothing more than a conclusion of law that was not predicated on any allegation of the complaint.

3. The rule seems to be well settled that where, under a contract void by the statute of frauds, services have been performed in consideration of a conveyance of land, and the execution of a deed to the premises is refused, the agreement can be abandoned by the party rendering the service, who may recover the value of the labor on a quantum

meruit. 3 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. p. 2054; Browne, Stat. Fr. 5th ed. 125; Mills v. Joiner, 20 Fla. 479; Clark v. Davidson, 53 Wis. 317, 10 N. W. 384; Tucker v. Grover, 60 Wis. 240, 19 N. W. 62.

4. The plaintiff, having failed to pursue this remedy, instituted an action for damages, which presupposes the enforcement of the contract, and, such being the case, the conclusion of law complained of is deducible from the facts as found, and no error was committed as alleged. It follows that the judgment is affirmed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

TRUSTEES OF PEMBROKE ACADEMY v.

EPSOM SCHOOL DISTRICT et al.

(75 N. H. 408, 75 Atl. 100.)

Trust—will—precatory words.

1. A trust is created by a bequest of money to trustees of a school, the income of which testator states "I wish" to be expended in a certain manner.

Note.—Creation of trust by precatory words in a will.

- I. American cases, 646.
- II. English cases, 673.
- III. Recommending the employment of an agent or attorney, 685.

I. American cases.

Wherever the objects of the supposed recommendatory trust are not certain or definite, or wherever the property to which it is to be attached is not certain or definite, or wherever a clear discretion or choice to act or not to act is given, or wherever the prior dispositions import absolute or uncontrollable ownership, a trust is not created.

Ask.

A letter written to testator's wife after a devise in fee to her: "All I ask when you go, you will not leave all to yours; but that you will share some of it with Ellen Thruston,"—was held not to create a precatory trust, because, first, the letter was not testamentary in character, and, second, if the words had been in the will, they would not have established a precatory trust. Thruston v. Prather, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1137, 27 S. W. 354.

Assume.

The will said: "I assume, first, that if my dear wife shall survive me (which does not seem probable), my said sons will take pleasure in providing for all her wants; second, that my eldest son, John B. Treat, will understand and appreciate my reasons 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Trust—cy pres—education.

2. In case, after a devise of a fund to an academy in trust to pay the tuition of worthy poor boys of a certain town, the academy is by law made a free high school for such town, the fund may be applied in establishing scholarships for such boys, rather than in relieving the tax payers of the town of the burden of maintaining such school, or in aiding the academy in paying its general expenses.

TRANSFER by the Superior Court for Merrimack County without ruling of a bill asking for directions as to the disposition of a charitable trust fund. Case discharged.

The plaintiffs acquired the fund in 1892 under the following provision of the will of Ephriam Locke, deceased: "I give and bequeath to the trustees of Pembroke Academy, the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars in money, the annual income of which sum I wish to be expended in paying the tuition, at said academy, of such poor boys in said town of Epsom, of good moral character, as may be recommended from time to time to the trustees of said academy by for giving whatever property I may have at my decease to his younger brothers; and, third, that they on their part will not fail to do for him and his family all that in the circumstances the truest fraternal regard may require them to do." It was held that it was left to the discretion of the two younger sons to do what in their judgment was fair. Rose v. Porter, 141 Mass. 309, 5 N. E. 641.

Believing.

The use of the word "believing" has been generally held not to create a precatory trust. But where it is clearly shown that the testator's intention was to have his directions carried out, a trust is created.

Where the language was: "During her life, believing that she will make use of it to the best advantage for the benefit of our children, as well as her own comfort," it was held that no trust for the children was created, and the word "believing" was not intended to be precatory. McCreary v. Burns, 17 S. C. 45.

"All the rest and residue of my property, real, personal, and mixed, I give, bequeath, and devise to my dear wife, . . . believing that she will manage it judiciously, and perfectly satisfied that she will make a fair distribution of it among our children at her death,"—was held not to be precatory, as the final distribution was left absolutely to the wife. Cheston v. Cheston, 89 Md. 465, 43 Atl. 768.

The will said: "All the remainder of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, I give to my beloved wife, Hattie H. Page, believing that she will do justice between her rela-a majority of the board of selectmen of said town of Epsom, as worthy and deserving this privilege."

The legacy was accepted and expended in accordance with the wish of the testator, until N. H. Laws 1901, chap. 96, whereby school districts maintaining no high school or school of corresponding grade are required, within certain limits, to pay the tuition of all children from such district attending approved high schools or academies elsewhere, was enacted. Pembroke Academy is an approved school within the statute. Epsom district has no high school. Since this legislation various Epsom children have attended Pembroke Academy, among which are several poor children recommended as within the terms of the bequest. The academy has charged the entire tuition of Epsom students to the defendant district. Defendant claims that the income of the Locke fund should be applied to that account, while plaintiffs contend that the administration of the fund is in no way affected by Laws 1901, chap. 96, and that it cannot be applied to the benefit of the whole body of Epsom taxpayers.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Fred. C. Demond, with Messrs. Streeter & Hollis, for plaintiffs:

The testator did not intend to have his bounty so applied as to relieve the taxpayers in any measure of the burden of the support of the public schools.

Clement v. Hyde, 50 Vt. 716, 28 Am. Rep. 522.

tives and mine at her death." It was held that there was so much uncertainty that an attempt to enforce a trust would be a mere guess, and would virtually result in the court making a will. Hill v. Page, — Tenn. —, 36 S. W. 735. In this case it was said that to create a trust and make precatory words operative in a will, it should be clear, first, that the estate vested in the first taker is not absolute, nor disposition thereof unrestricted; second, that the subject of the bequest or devise is certain, the trust certain and definite; and, third, the objects of the bounty certain and clear; and, further, that the language used, as gathered from the whole context, is intended to be imperative and controlling, and not a mere matter of discretion.

"In their own right, trusting nevertheless and believing that under a proper sense of their obligations to their own consciences and their accountability to God, they will, as near as they possibly can, in conformity with what I have herein indicated, pay over and contribute the same to charitable objects and purposes,"—was held to create no trust enforceable in equity. Frierson v. General Assembly, 7 Heisk. 683.

But "believing" was construed as imperative, and not discretionary, in "believing that she will make an equitable distribution of the property, at her death, among our children, as she knows better than any other person what part each one of them has already received." Anderson v. McCullough, 3 Head, 614. This was on the ground that the intention of the testator, that the widow at her death should distribute the property equitably amongst the children, was clearly manifested.

Confidence.

This word creates a trust in some cases, where it is used in connection with words indicating that a distribution is required. In determining that precatory words in a will create a trust, the courts give great weight to the fact that the person or object to which the precatory words apply is clearly pointed out, and the quantum of the estate to be given to such person or object is also clearly defined. But no trust is created 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

where the will so indicates, or where the devise has full power of disposition, or full power to consume, or absolute title.

The provision: "Having entire confidence in the discretion of the trustee, he is to dispose of the fund for the benefit and comfort of the brothers and sister, as he may from time to time judge the testatrix would have done if she could have foreseen the circumstances,"—clearly indicated an intention that the direction should be mandatory, with some discretion as to the division. Portsmouth v. Shackford, 46 N. H. 423. The court said: "The current of American authority and the later English cases is against converting the discretion of the donee into an absolute trust, and in favor of giving effect more fully than formerly, to the intention of the testator, giving to his words their natural and ordinary sense."

And "having full confidence in my sons aforesaid, and in their dispositions to deal justly and liberally, I leave it to them to make proper and suitable provision for their sisters,"—was held to vest the legal title to the estate in the sons, and to charge the estate in their hands with the maintenance or suitable provision for his daughters. Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580.

And a devise to brothers who were appointed executors, "with full confidence that they will settle my estate according to this my will, and that they will dispose of the residue and remainder that may remain in their hands, among our brothers and sisters and their children as they shall judge shall be most in need of the same. This to be done according to their best discretion,"—was held to be imperative, and not discretionary, and to create a trust in favor of the brothers and sisters and their children. Bull v. Bull, 8 Conn. 47, 20 Am. Dec. 86, distinguished in Gilbert v. Chapin, 19 Conn. 342.

"With full power to her, to use, expend or appropriate any part or all of the same for her own use only, and as to the portion that may remain thereof at her death, I give, devise, and bequeath the same to her brothers, share and share alike,—the child or children of a deceased brother to take

And I make this provision for her with tender and affectionate solicitude for her comfort and well-being through life, and with full confidence in her ability and conscientious sense of duty, but mindful of the experience of the past, I solemnly enjoin her to hold this as a trust, and at once with the aid of competent counsel, by her will properly executed, so to arrange her affairs that my wishes herein indicated may be carried out," —was held to declare a trust for others as to what might remain at her death unexpended. McClerman v. McClerman, 73 Md. 283, 20 Atl. 908.

After the gift of the life estate, "in the full confidence that upon my decease he will, as he has heretofore done, continue to give and afford my children [enumerating them] such protection, comfort, and support as they or either of them may stand in need of," —was held to create a trust, as the objects of the supposed trust were certain, and the property was clearly pointed out, and the relations were such as to indicate a strong motive in making them a partaker of his bounty. Warner v. Bates, 98 Mass. 274. The court said: "If the recommendatory or precatory clause is so expressed as to warrant the inference that it was designed to be peremptory on the donee, the just and reasonable interpretation is that a trust is created, which is obligatory, and can be enforced in equity as against the trustee by those in whose behalf the beneficial use of the gift was intended." This case was distinguished in Field v. New York, 38 Hun, 590, and limited in Poor v. Bradbury, 196 Mass. 207, 81 N. E. 882.

"In the utmost confidence in by beloved wife, I leave to her all my worldly goods to sell or keep for distribution amongst our dear children, as she may think proper. My whole estate, real and person, are left in fee simple to her, only requesting her to make an equal distribution amongst our heirs; and desiring her to do for some of my faithful servants, whatever she may 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

think will most conduce to their welfare, without regard to the interest of my heirs," —was held to be an express declaration of a trust in favor of the children of the marriage, by which they were entitled to distribution of the estate amongst them, —a distribution, however, not immediate or unqualified, but subject to a power and discretion on the part of the wife, to enable her, at her own election, to enjoy the whole subject during her life for her own benefit. Harrison v. Harrison, 2 Gratt. 1, 44 Am. Dec. 365. In this case it was said that it was well settled that, in order to effectuate the testator's intention, words of request, recommendation, or hope might be treated as imperative, and should be so treated where the objects of the precatory language were certain, and the subjects contemplated were also certain, unless a clear discretion or choice to act or not to act be given, or the prior dispositions of the property import absolute or uncontrollable beneficial ownership.

By the language, "having full confidence in my said wife, and hereby request that at her death she will divide equally, share and share alike, in equal portions, as tenants in common, between my sons and daughters," a clear intention was held to be manifested, to create a trust in favor of the children named in the will, and the language used by the testator was held to be intended by him to govern and control the conduct of his wife in the disposition of his estate. Knox v. Knox, 59 Wis. 172, 48 Am. Rep. 487, 18 N. W. 155. The court said: "While, on the one hand, we are inclined not to go to the extent of the older cases in England and in this country, in establishing trusts upon the strength of precatory words used by a testator in his will, on the other, we are not disposed to repudiate the whole doctrine of such trusts. We are disposed to apply the doctrine only in cases where it is clear that, on the whole, it was the intention of the testator to create such trust by the use of such words, and where the words used show with reasonable certainty that the testator intended to control the legatee or devisee in the use and control of the property devised or bequeathed."

The provision: "I have entire confidence that they will make such disposition of such residue as, under the circumstances, were I alive and to be consulted, they know would meet my approval,"—was held not to imply that they were to take the land or its proceeds as individuals. The testator evidently supposed that the secret trust would be carried out. It was held that while this trust was unauthorized, it would not be construed as a gift to them as individuals, and as such they could not convey the land. Forster v. Winfield, 142 N. Y. 327, 37 N. E. 111.

The will provided: "To the Roman Catholic Parish Priest of Zweibruecken, with verbal instructions I have this day given my said executor as to the disposition I desire and direct to be made of my estate, in trust and confidence that the said Roman Catholic Parish Priest of Zweibruecken shall and will faithfully carry out and perform my said wishes and instructions as given to my said executor as to the disposition I desire to be made of my estate." It was held that the object of the gift was shown to be in trust, and could be enforced in equity. If the legatee accepted the bequest, it could be only in aid of the trust. As there was a direct bequest to the parish priest, if the words "in trust and confidence" be construed precatory, and not mandatory, then no trust was created. In either event, it was held that the legatee was entitled to the bequest, and not the next of kin. Franken's Estate, 15 W. N. C. 455.

After bequeathing property to John H. Reel, "to apply to charity according to his best discretion," the will continued: "I hope, that Mr. Reel aforementioned will consent to act as my executor, and desire to save him all trouble and annoyance in that regard, and have every confidence, good faith and discretion, and have explained to him to what charities I desire him to appropriate the monies herein bequeathed to him, it is my will that my said executor

Peaslec, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs' first position is that the words of the bequest are merely precatory, and therefore there is no enforceable obligation to carry out the wish expressed by the testator concerning the application of the income of the fund. "The words 'desire,' 'request,' 'recommend,' 'hope,' 'not doubting,' that the executor will conduct in a specified manner, when they come from a testator who has the power to command, are to be construed as commands, clothed merely in the language of civility; and they impose on the executor a duty which courts have in repeated instances enforced." Erickson v. Willard, 1 N. H. 217, 229. "Precatory words in a will, equally with direct fiduciary expressions, will constitute be held to no accountability whatever for the nonperformance or ilperformance of the trust herein confided to him; he will use his best discretion in the matter, and the receipt of the acting Archbishop of St. Louis of the Roman Catholic Church in Missouri or Kansas shall be a full discharge to him pro tanto for any monies applied by him to charities according to my request." This was held to be a trust, but the purposes were not defined so that a court could carry them out, and the written wishes of the testator showed that these were trusts prohibited by the state Constitution. Schmucker v. Reel, 61 Mo. 592. The court said: "The prevailing doctrine is that no particular form of expression is requisite in order to create a binding and valid trust; and that words of recommendation, request, entreaty, wish, or expectation will impose a binding duty upon the devisee by way of trust, provided the testator has pointed out with sufficient clearness and certainty both the subject-matter and the object of the trust."

But the courts recognize the difference between the intent of a testator to create a legal direction on his devisee, and the intent solely to create a moral obligation, and the latter does not create a trust. While a secret trust to apply the devised property to an illegal purpose will render the devisee a trustee for the heirs at law or next of kin, the trust must be established in such manner that, if legal, it would have been binding upon the trustee.

Where the will provided: "This bequest and devise I make absolute in order that there may be no legal or technical difficulty or embarrassment in effecting the end I desire, and having entire confidence that those four gentlemen will, although under no legal obligation so to do, observe my wishes; and my wish is (although this is not to be taken as a legal direction) that my residuary estate so bequeathed and devised, and any proceeds thereof, shall under the name of 'The Richard L. Dugdale Fund,' be applied as those four gentlemen, or such a trust. "Technical language is not necessary to constitute a trust. It is enough if such intention is apparent." 1 Perry, Tr. 3d ed. § 114, note." Foster v. Willson, 68 N. H. 241, 242, 73 Am. St. Rep. 581, 38 Atl. 1003. These authorities seem applicable here. The intent of the testator was to direct the disposition of the income of the fund. It was a command "clothed merely in the language of civility."

What disposition shall be made of the income under the changed circumstances? The plaintiffs suggest that they should apply it to their general purposes, wherein the intended beneficiaries may have a share, as was done in Adams Female Academy v. Adams, 65 N. H. 225, 6 L.R.A. 785, 18 Atl. 777, 23 Atl. 430. The Epsom school district claims that the income should be applied according to the strict letter of the bequest, thereby relieving its taxpayers, while but slightly, if at all, aiding those the testator had in mind. No brief has been filed in behalf of the "poor boys of Epsom." But their interest is here paramount, and the fund is to be so administered as to aid them, rather than the trustees designated in the will, or those who pay taxes in Epsom. It seems that this can easily be done by applying the income to scholarships for boys designated in the manner pointed out in the will. Free tuition will not always enable a poor and deserving boy to attend an academy. He may need further assistance. Furnishing this will comply exactly with the wish of the testator.

It does not appear that this plan has been considered by the parties. They may apply to the superior court for further findings, if such course is deemed essential to the final disposition of the case. As the matter is now presented, only the general outline of what is to be done can be determined.

persons as they may associate with them, or a majority of them may deem wise to,"—it was held that the devisees took the property as their own, and there was no trust. Bowker v. Wells, 2 How. Pr. N. S. 150.

And in Re Havens, 6 Dem. 456, "in the confident belief that they will apply my estate and property so vesting in them in accordance with my wishes, but it is intended to be unconditional and free from any legal trust or obligation qualifying their absolute title,"—was held not an illegal disposition, but a confidence and reliance by the testator on the devisees to whom he had bequeathed the estate absolutely.

A provision: "I make this disposition of my estate as I have heretofore expressed to my said nephew my desires concerning the division and disposition of my estate and I have full confidence that he will respect my wishes and will carry them out so far as possible. I request him to make testamentary disposition of such portion of my estate as may call for the same in his judgment,"—was held no trust. George v. George, 186 Mass. 75, 71 N. E. 85. The court said: "On the other hand, the thing dealt with in the paragraph relied on is 'disposition' as well as 'division,' and the testatrix seems to have used the word 'disposition' to express a testamentary disposition, and not a division during the life of the nephew. It is also to be remarked that the 'full confidence' expressed by the testatrix was not that the nephew would 'respect' and 'carry out' her wishes, but that he would 'respect' and 'carry them out so far as possible.'"

After an absolute gift, a clause, "having full confidence that she will leave the surplus to be divided at her decease, justly amongst my children," was held to create no trust. Re Pennock, 20 Pa. 268, 59 Am. Dec. 718. This was on the ground that 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

words expressive of desire, recommendation, or confidence would not be prima facie sufficient to convert a devise or bequest into a trust, and the old Roman and English rule was not a part of the common law of Pennsylvania. It was said that such words might amount to a declaration of trust, when it appeared from other parts of the will that the testator intended not to commit the estate to the devisee or legatee, or the ultimate disposal of it to his kindness, justice, or discretion. In this case it was said that the rule in regard to precatory trusts was fading away even in England, and this could be seen in the doctrine of extreme certainty required as to the subject and object of the recommendation, and in the fact that it was degraded into the class of implied or constructive, and not express, trusts, and would not be regarded in England as creating a trust, unless on the whole the words ought to be construed as imperative, and any words or expressions would be eagerly seized hold of as indications of a contrary intent, and when it appeared that the kindness or justice or discretion of the devisee was relied on, no trust would arise. And if it could be implied from the words that a discretion was left to withdraw any part of the subject from the objection of the wish, or to apply it to the use of the devisee, no trust was created. This case was followed in Paisley's Appeal, 70 Pa. 153.

The provision: "In willing all my estate, real and personal, in favor of my wife Catharine I do it with the fullest Confidence (that should she survive me), she will Carry my intentions, as to the ultimate distribution of it into effect, . . . so far as in her opinion, my Children and Grand Children, respectively, may prove worthy of her attention,"—was held not to be a precatory trust, and, the testator having made an unqualified devise, no precatory words to his devisee could defeat the estate previously devised. Bowly v. Thunder, 105 Pa. 173.

The clause, after an absolute bequest and devise, "feeling entire confidence that she will use it judiciously for the benefit of herself and our children," was held not to create a trust, as the mode of use, or extent of enjoyment, by the children, was not indicated. Lesesne v. Witte, 5 S. C. 450. The court said: "Though the language used may convey the wish or desire of the testator as to the use of the property devised, if it does not impose an obligation which can be enforced in a court of equity, it cannot be held to control or qualify the absolute interest which is conferred by the previous disposition. Where an absolute right is given, words which are to annex a limitation to its free and uncontrollable exercise must not only be mandatory, but, in themselves, show the manner in which they are to operate, so that the purpose of the testator may clearly appear."

And the provision, "feeling entire confidence that she will use it judiciously for the benefit of herself and our children," was held not to construct a trust, as the rule in regard to the effect of devises by words of recommendation would not be extended. Ibid. The court said that the rule should "be narrowed to the limits prescribed by the authority of decided cases, where there is no mode of ascertaining, as is the one before us, to what extent the trust is to operate."

The clause, "to be hers and to be disposed of as she may think best; I have full confidence in my said wife, and have abiding faith that she will deal justly with our children and the descendants of them,"—was held not precatory. *Rector v. APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Duval County dismissing a bill filed to establish a trust under the will of Augusta Levi, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stripling & Noble for appellant.

Messrs. George M. Robbins and Stewart & Bly for appellees.

Hocker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant filed a bill in the circuit court of Duval county on August 12, 1907, against Augustus V. S. Smith, to which a demurrer for want of equity was opposed, and the demurrer sustained. Subsequently two amended bills were filed by leave of court, in the last of which Pearl Thorn Floyd Rowan and her husband, Thomas G. Rowan, were made parties defendant. A demurrer to the first of these amended bills but as imperative to control her as trustee, it seems to us the whole purpose as indicated by the language used in reference to her, to make independent provision for her, is defeated."

And a devise and bequest "to my beloved wife, Jane G. Hunt, having the fullest confidence in her capacity, judgment, discretion, and affection, to properly bring up, educate, and provide for our children, and to manage and dispose of my said property in the best manner for their interests and her own,"—was held to be an absolute devise, and not to create a trust. Hunt v. Hunt, 11 Nev. 442. The court said: "If the event has failed to justify his confidence in her capacity, judgment, and affection for his children, it can only be said that his will is to be interpreted, not by the event, but in the light of the confidence which he reposed in her at the time it was made. If she has wasted and mismanaged an estate for which she is morally, if not legally, accountable to her children, it is a misfortune for which they cannot be compensated by taking from a bona fide purchaser property which she had full power to sell, and he an undoubted right to purchase."

The provision: "I am confident she will manage with good discretion and fidelity what is committed to her, and that when she shall no longer need the property it will be equally divided among all our children, or their representatives,"—was held to impose no obligation on the wife to divide the property, and therefore one of the features of the precatory trust was wanting. Aldrich v. Aldrich, 172 Mass. 101, 51 N. E. 449.

A provision, "in the confidence that he will use it in the prosecution of his work against the encroachments of the Roman Catholic Church upon our common school system," was held to be an absolute gift. Poor v. Bradbury, 196 Mass. 207, 81 N. E.

was filed for want of equity, which was sustained. To the other amended bill was filed a demurrer for want of equity on October 5, 1908, and on December 9, 1908, a decree was entered dismissing the bill for failure to set down the demurrer for argument. An appeal was taken from this order.

The matter before us involves the construction of the will of Augusta Levi, mother of appellant, Alvina Lewiza Floyd, and grandmother of appellees, A. V. S. Smith and Pearl Thorn Floyd Rowan. The items of the will which are to be construed are as follows:

"Second. I give, devise, and bequeath to my grandson, Augustus V. S. Smith, all the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature whatever and wherever situated, and which I may hereafter and from time to time in any way acquire, or to which I may be rightfully entitled, to have and to hold to him and to his heirs and assigns, to his and their own proper use, benefit, and behoof forever.

"Third. It is my intention to make no provision in this my last will and testament for my daughter, Alvina Lewiza Floyd, widow of G. Wash Floyd, or my granddaughter, Pearl Thorn Floyd, daughter of said Alvina Lewiza Floyd, as in my judgment they will be more amply provided for by my said grandson, Augustus V. S. Smith, the son of my said daughter, Alvina Lewiza Floyd, by her first husband, than they could 882. The court said: "The words, 'in the confidence that he will use it for the prosecution of his work,' speak the reason for the disposition, and do not establish a trust. In effect she says: I give the other half of the residuum of my estate to my friend, for the reason that I have absolute confidence that he will use it in the prosecution of his work."

Desire.

This work has been held to amount to a declaration of trust, when it appeared from the parts of the will that the testator intended not to commit the estate to the devisee or legatee, or the ultimate disposal to his kindness, justice, or discretion.

A provision: "It is my will and desire, that, until distribution of my estate shall be made according to item No. 9, my executors provide for the sustenance and support of my wife, A. C. Porter, and my two daughters [naming them], or such of them as shall survive me,"—was held to be a trust confided in the executors, and a court of equity would compel them to perform their duty; but the widow and children could not contract debts so that creditors could force the executors to pay them. Reid v. Porter, 54 Mo. 265.

And a trust was held to be created by a provision after a life estate: "It is my desire that the property of which I may die possessed, after the payment of the legacy of eleven hundred dollars to my son, John Chapman, shall be kept together, my younger children receive an education equal with what my three eldest sons have received, and made equal with them;" as, construing the whole will, this was meant to be peremptory. Major v. Herndon, 78 Ky. 123.

The will provided: "It is my desire that my children be all supported, and that the girls under sixteen, and the boys under eighteen, be as well educated out of the annual profits of my estate as they will allow up to the time of division, the profits to be first applied to their support." It was held that the support and education was a condition annexed to the previous gift, and the appropriation of the profits showed 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the testator had a confidence that the wife would so apply them. It was held that the whole will showed that the disposition in favor of the wife was made in confidence that it would result to the children. Lucas v. Lockhart, 10 Smedes & M. 466, 48 Am. Dec. 766.

And where $800 was given to a trustee for the testator's sister, and the will continued: "I desire that in case my sister Sarah aforesaid should at any time need assistance or come to want, that my executor should expend such part of said eight hundred dollars as will make her comfortable and keep her so during her lifetime,"—it was held that the words, "I desire" do not limit the use of the trust previously declared, but rather enlarge the powers of the trustee. Coburn v. Anderson, 131 Mass. 513.

A provision: "I desire that the said Joseph Willard should at his discretion appropriate a part of the income of my estate aforesaid not exceeding fifty dollars a year to the support of the widow Margaret Erickson my sister's daughter during her natural life, and it is my express direction that my executor place the aforesaid Margaret in some pious and Christian family in the country at a distance from this town where she may be removed from temptation,"—was held to be a trust, as the object was certain, and the subject was certain. Erickson v. Willard, 1 N. H. 217.

The will provided: "In case my wife survives me, I desire that she have entire control of my estate, and divide and pay to our children only when and as she may desire." It was held that this was a precatory trust. Ide v. Clark, 5 Ohio C. C. 239, 3 Ohio C. D. 120. This was on the ground that where, from the entire scope of the will and its terms, it appeared that the testator intended to charge the estate in the hands of his immediate devisee with a trust in favor of others, the court would give effect to that intention, whether the terms be in form dispositive, peremptory, or precatory only.

A provision: "I desire that all my just debts and those of Herron Brothers be paid as soon as conveniently can be after my be by me in this my last will and testament."

The will was probated in Volusia county, Florida, on the 22d of May, 1902, and Augustus V. S. Smith was named and qualified as executor. The bill alleges, in substance, that the property involved is of the value of about $30,000; that the oratrix has no estate or income, and for many years prior to her mother's death, she was dependent upon the latter to a large extent for maintenance and support; that oratrix is a widow, with no one upon whom she has any legal right to call for support except her son, the appellee A. V. S. Smith; and that since her mother's death she has been in very straitened circumstances, and, although she has made repeated demands upon her said son for aid and assistance, he has persistently refused to make any provision for her, either out of the ample estate of her late mother, or out of his own funds, and has left oratrix to earn a living by sewing or such other employment as she has been able to obtain.

The bill alleges that by the third paragraph of her mother's will the defendant, A. V. S. Smith is constituted a trustee of the whole estate of her deceased mother, for the benefit of oratrix and her daughter Pearl, a moiety to each, and that she is entitled to an accounting, etc.; to have him removed as such trustee; and a moiety of the property conveyed and turned over to her, or a new trustee should be appointed by the court. The bill prays for the ap-dissolution," was held mandatory. Both the persons of the legatees and the amount to be paid to each were capable of legal ascertainment. Burt v. Herron, 66 Pa. 400.

The will provided: "I desire all my other estate, real, personal or mixed, shall, as soon after my decease as practicable, be sold, and the proceeds arising therefrom be invested in first bonds and mortgages." It was held that the words "I desire" were equivalent to "I will," while the added words left no discretion except as to time. Philadelphia's Appeal, 112 Pa. 470, 4 Atl. 4.

The will gave property "for his support, and if he should be spared to have family, I desire the above estate to go to use of his children." It was held that the giving of the farm "for his support" indicated that a life estate was intended, and the further "desire" was held not merely precatory, but as mandatory as if the words, "I will" or "I order and direct," had been used. Oyster v. Knull, 137 Pa. 448, 21 Am. St. Rep. 890, 20 Atl. 624.

The word "desire" in the clause, "should my husband not expend the whole of my estate, then it is my desire at his death to give so much of it as remains to," was held to be mandatory, and not precatory. Dickinson's Estate, 209 Pa. 59, 58 Atl. 120.

The will said: "It is further my desire that my executor will purchase, if practicable, my son, out of the funds of my estate, previous to a division of the same." It was held that the executor was bound to purchase him, and should take a bill of sale to himself. This was held no violation of the statute against manumission of slaves. Fable v. Brown, 2 Hill, Eq. 378.

The will provided: "I desire the residue of my estate, real and personal, to be sold by my executors . . . at such times as they may deem best," and that the proceeds be divided. It was held that this language manifested the intention of the testator, and amounted to an imperative direction that the sale be made. Carr v. Branch, 85 Va. 597, 8 S. E. 476.

Testator stated: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Agnes C. Cresap, in trust and for her support and maintenance during her life, all my estate, both real and personal, with full power and privilege to sell and convey any, all, or so much of my real estate in such a manner as she may see fit, in as full and complete manner as I myself can do, to sell and dispose of my personal estate, or so much as she may see fit, for her own support, according to her condition in life, and for the benefit of my estate, so far as she may see proper. At the death of my dear wife, Agnes C. Cresap, I desire the residue of my estate, both real and personal, to be distributed as follows." It was held that it was clear that there was a trust applied both to the real and personal estate. Cresap v. Cresap, 34 W. Va. 310, 12 S. E. 527. This was because the trust limited her support to her condition in life.

The will provided: "At the settlement of my executor's account in probate court I desire the said probate judge to appoint my said executory, Edward F. Hansen, trustee, to assume control of all my estate, both real and personal, to prosecute and execute the business of said estate, especially and generally for the best interests of said estate." This request was held to be a precatory trust. Wolbert v. Beard, 128 Wis. 391, 107 N. W. 663. The court said: "When words of recommendation, request, or the like, contained in a will, must necessarily be followed in order to carry out the clear purpose of the testator, they are to be regarded as words of command or direction."

Desire is mandatory when applied to charities.

From a provision: "After the decease of my mother, Mary Elder, I desire that my interest in the said above-mentioned farm, together with all interest accruing therefrom shall be appropriated to Foreign Missionary Work," it was held that the manifest purpose was, in the first instance, to give the devisee a life estate, and that it was just as clear that after her decease the testator intended that the estate should be devoted to foreign missionary work. Pres-pointment of a master to take an account, that A. V. S. Smith be compelled to convey to oratrix one half of the real and personal estate, that he be compelled to execute the terms and directions of said last will and testament of Augusta Levi, and to make suitable provision from said estate of Augusta Levi in such amount and in such manner as to the court shall seem meet and proper in the premises, and for general relief. We do not think it essential to set forth other allegations of the bill.

It is evident the circuit judge considered that by the terms of the will the appellant was given no interest in the estate of her mother which a court of equity could enforce. It is admitted that by the second paragraph of the will, all the estate, real, personal, and mixed, of the testator, is devised and bequeathed to Augustus V. S. Smith and his heirs and assigns in fee simple; but it is contended that the third paragraph fixes upon the said estate a trust in favor of appellant.

It is said in Lines v. Darden, 5 Fla. 51, that, "in the construction of a will, the intention of a testator, as therein expressed, shall prevail over all other considerations, if consistent with the principles of law. To this first and great rule in the exposition of wills, all others must bend. Courts allow of no rule of construction of mere words, to control the intention, but the whole instrument is to be considered, and, if possible, effect given to every part of it. The relative situation of the parties, the byterian Bd. of Foreign Missions v. Culp. 151 Pa. 467, 25 Atl. 117. This was on the ground that where words of recommendation, request, and the like are used in direct reference to the estate, they are prima facie testamentary and imperative, and not precatory.

The will provided: "I desire that my entire estate with the accumulations shall be used in establishing and conducting a School for Apprentices and Young Mechanics on plans to be hereafter described by me; or in case of my death before perfecting said plans, the school above named is to be conducted on plans which I have from time to time described to most of the Board of Trustees herein named and who shall approve of final practical plans in keeping therewith." It was held that the trust failed for indefiniteness, and that reference could not be had to another writing to ascertain the testator's plans. Smith v. Smith, 54 N. J. Eq. 1, 32 Atl. 1069. The court said: "Suppose a purpose to create a charity appears,—not generally, but of a limited and special character,—and the will fails to disclose the limitation, can this court, in defiance of the plain requirement of the statute that the will shall be in writing, add to it verbal expressions of the testator which will supply and define the limitation? And is the case made stronger by the testator's direction that the reference shall be had to these expressions?"

A clause, "I desire the same to be then distributed among and applied to such objects and purposes of benevolence or charity . . . as the trustees for the time being shall deem worthy thereof,"—was held to create a valid trust, and the words "I desire" to mean a command in a polite form. Weber v. Bryant, 161 Mass. 400, 37 N. E. 203.

In Maught v. Getzendanner, 65 Md. 527, 57 Am. Rep. 352, 5 Atl. 471, the clause in question was "desire him to use and appropriate the same for such religious and charitable purposes and objects, and in such sums and in such manner as will in his judgment, best promote the cause of Christ." It 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was held that the trust was void, because too vague and indefinite to be carried into effect.

Where testator provided: "It is my will and desire that my beloved husband shall have all my property. . . . It is my will and desire that at his death, should he have any of said property still remaining in his possession not disposed of or used by him, that the same shall be given by him to," it was held that, the words "will" and "desire" being mandatory in one part of the will, they should be held so in the other, in the absence of anything in the will showing that the testatrix did not so use them. It was held that there was a trust for the beneficiaries, except as their right was limited by the disposition in the lifetime of the legatee. McMurry v. Stanley, 69 Tex. 227, 6 S. W. 412.

And the word "desire," in "I desire that at such time as may be agreeable and mutually consent to by my wife and my son, Charles, the homestead be sold and one purchased in lieu thereof by them," was held not to be used in a precatory sense, where it was not used in such sense in other parts of the will. Stewart v. Stewart, 61 N. J. Eq. 25, 47 Atl. 633. The court said: "There is nothing in the context to indicate that 'desire' was used in paragraph 3 in a different sense from that clearly indicated by its use in paragraph 4 and paragraph 7. In every case the word is applied to the same subject-matter, that is, the disposition of parts of testator's estate. It follows, in my judgment, that 'desire' in paragraph 3 bears the sense of 'I direct,' as it evidently does in paragraphs 4 and 7."

A provision: "Desire that my two said brothers shall . . . have the care, custody, and control of my said children, and provide for, educate, and maintain them until they arrive at the age of twenty-one years, and longer if necessary, that they make to them the same advancements as they make to their own children, no request, direction, or bequest made herein shall be so construed as to create a charge or encumbrance upon any of the property bequeathed to my brothers,"—was held to ties and affection subsisting between them, besides the motives which would naturally influence the mind of the testator, are proper to be considered in expounding the import of doubtful words." It is further held that "to constitute a trust, three circumstances must concur: Sufficient words to raise it, a definite subject, and a certain and ascertained object. No commendatory terms of a will expressing a 'wish,' 'will,' or desire, etc., are sufficient, unless there be certainty as to the parties who are to take and what they are to take. Whenever the subject to be administered as trust property, and the objects for whose benefit it is to be administered, are to be found in a will not expressly creating a trust, the indefinite nature and quantum of the subject, as well as the indefinite character of the objects, are always used by courts as evidence that the mind of the testator was not to create a trust. The words 'will' and 'desire' are not necessarily mandatory. They would be sufficient to raise a trust, if not coupled with the words inconsistent with such construction." In the opinion the history of the doctrine pertaining to recommendatory or precatory trusts is examined, and it is said: "The current of decisions of late years has been against converting the legatee into a trustee, and the English courts have manifested a strong disposition to retrace their steps and restrict the doctrine of recommendatory trusts, by giving to the words of a will their ordinary sense, unless it is clear they were give a discretion, and to give the devisee an estate absolute, and not to create a trust for the children. Burnes v. Burnes, 70 C. C. A. 369, 137 Fed. 781, affirmed in 199 U. S. 605, 50 L. ed. 330, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 746.

And a provision: "I will and bequeath to my wife, Hanchi Strauss, all my property, real, personal, and mixed, of which I may die seised and possessed, with the right to sell and convey the two lots on Pullen street and one lot on Scull street for the purpose of supporting the family, and I desire that my said wife do not marry again, but live single with the children of my family and take care of them,"—was held to impose no trust upon the life estate given the wife. So, the phrase, "and take care of them," was held not to refer to property, but to personal care and attention. Bloom v. Strauss, 73 Ark. 56, 84 S. W. 511. The court said: "It is a common matter for husbands to devise property to wives in the expectation that it will be used for the benefit of their children, but the mere fact that this is the reason that underlies a devise or bequest does not create a trust in favor of the children."

The clause, "desire that one half of the property bequeathed to her shall be devised by her to my relatives," was held not to be mandatory, on the ground that, while the desire of the testator for the disposition of his estate will be construed as a command when directed to his executor, it will not, when directed to his legatee, be construed as a limitation upon the estate or interest which he has given to him in absolute terms. Re Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 Pac. 964, 64 Pac. 1071.

In Doe ex dem. Reese v. Campbell, 5 Blackf. 539, the clause in question was "my desire is for my son Morgan [the plaintiff's lessor] to have the land situate in Wayne county [the property in dispute] when he comes of age, if it remains in my wife's hands till that time." It was held that by the widow's conveyance the claim of the son was lost.

And the provision: "It is my desire that my wife, with . . . the interest she will receive on the moneys invested in registered 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

government bonds, will provide and keep a good and comfortable home for my two sons and herself, and that she will use every endeavor to give them a good education,"—was held rather as enlarging than restraining the power of disposition, and not to create trust. Van Gorder v. Smith, 99 Ind. 404.

And the provision after an absolute devise: "It is my desire that the business be so conducted that all of our children, or their heirs, shall finally share equally in the distribution of our property. I would advise that the said Nancy Adamson shall at some suitable time call to her counsel two or three good discreet men to assist her in making a proper and equitable division of the real estate, as well as other property that she may think proper, among all the children aforesaid, restraining, however, if she choose so to do, the title and possession of said property to herself until after her death,"—was held not to create a precatory trust, as it was followed by the clause that "nothing in the above shall be construed to affect a perfect and indefeasible title to her." Lumpkin v. Rodgers, 155 Ind. 285, 58 N. E. 72.

And the provision, after an absolute bequest: "It is my desire that at the death of my said wife, whatever property may be left shall thus be disposed of, and request of my said wife that she will and provide that the property so received from me shall be devised, after her death, as follows,"—was held not to affect the absolute character of the bequest. Rona v. Meier, 47 Iowa, 607, 29 Am. Rep. 493. This was on the ground that if the first taker has the power, by the terms of the will, to dispose of the property, he must be considered the absolute owner, and any limitation over is void for repugnancy.

And after an absolute devise, testator continued: "All the real and personal property herein bequeathed to my wife, Irene Bills, remaining at her decease, I desire to be divided into five equal shares, to." It was held that the devisee was invested with the fee simple in the land, and the absolute property in the subject of the bequest. Bills designed to be used as peremptory, . . . in which case, though precatory in form, they become imperative in fact. There can be no doubt but that words of recommendation will create a trust, provided all the requisites are to be found in the will concurring for that purpose. They are held in many cases to import an imperative devise, and will so operate, if there is nothing in the will inconsistent with such a construction. The true question in every case is whether the intention of the testator is manifest and mandatory in favor of the object of the bounty, or is merely suggestive and advisory to the first taker. If the testator in this case designed to determine the specific amount which his daughter should loan to her children, why should he not have said so in his will? Why leave a matter of such importance to speculation and inference, and that, too, of the most doubtful character?"

In this case a testator by one clause of his will gave and bequeathed to his beloved and only daughter all his estate during her natural life, and at her death directs the property to be equally divided between the children of the tenant for life; and by another clause expresses his "will" and "desire" to be that, should either of his grandsons arrive at the age of twenty-one, or any of his granddaughters marry previous to the time of final distribution, then that such grandson, or such granddaughter, shall receive a portion of the estate as a loan, to have the management and receive the bene-

v. Bills, 80 Iowa, 269, 8 L.R.A. 696, 20 Am. St. Rep. 418, 45 N. W. 748. In this case it was said that "cases cited by defendant's counsel are not in conflict with the doctrines we have stated, in that the instruments interpreted therein, by their express language, did not vest the devisee with the fee of the land, nor the legatee with the absolute property in the subject of the bequest, a contrary purpose clearly appearing in the wills."

The provision: "'Greatest desire' to be that his executor would see that his two brothers were well taken care of as long as they might live, 'that they may lack nothing that will render them comfortable and happy in this life,'"—was held not a precatory trust, as the property was indefinite, and the prior disposition showed that the testator intended the devisee to take it free of any burden. Hazelwood v. Webster, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 164 (abstract).

After giving all his property to his wife, testator continued: "At the death of my wife, I desire that . . . the balance of what she will leave on the day of her decease shall be divided equally between my natural heirs and her own." It was held that no charge was imposed upon his wife to preserve anything. Dufour v. Deresheid, 110 La. 344, 34 So. 469.

And a will which provided: "I give and bequeath to my wife the further sum of ten thousand dollars which I desire her to use for the benefit of her brothers and sisters, Eugene, Louise, Mathilde and Louis H. Malarcher, according to her best judgment and discretion, which is to be paid after the discharge of the debts; and, provided further, the same shall not exceed the full amount coming to the heirs and children aforesaid of Robert S. Yancey,"—was held not a trust, but simply addressed to the conscience of the devisee. Jacob v. Macon, 20 La. Ann. 162.

And a clause, after a bequest to Mrs. Mason absolutely, "I desire the said Maria Rachel Mason and her daughter, Edith Hyter Mason to have the exclusive benefit of the above bequeathed estate free from any control of Robert V. Mason,"—was held not to curtail the devise to Mrs. Mason, and not intended to give the daughter any interest in the land. Balliett v. Veal, 140 Mo. 187, 41 S. W. 736.

A provision: "My desire is that the monument be erected at the junction of Olney and Fruit Hill avenues," was held precatory, not imperative, and evidently intended only as a personal recommendation of a site, and as such not binding on the town. Ogden's Petition, 25 R. I. 373, 55 Atl. 933.

And a provision: "I desire that my wife shall advance to such child or children such an amount, either in property or money, as she deems prudent," was held to raise no trust, but rather to indicate that no legal duty was intended to be imposed, and that the testator left that matter entirely to his wife's discretion. Rowland v. Rowland, 29 S. C. 54, 6 S. E. 902. In this case the court said the rule was that precatory trusts or recommendatory words implied discretion, and should be so construed, unless a different sense is irresistibly forced upon them by the context.

A will provided: "I desire Fifteen Thousand ($15,000) to be given to our foster son, Edward Woods Hunt, at any time convenient to my executrix. . . . Should the revenues from my estate not be sufficient for my wife's support, she, as executrix, has full privileges to use such part of the principal as she may require, without any contests or objections from any other heir or heirs." It was held to be permissive, and to authorize the wife at her convenience to give the $15,000, but that it was not mandatory. Hunt v. Hunt, 18 Wash. 14, 50 Pac. 578. In this case it was said: "A precatory trust arises out of words of 'entreaty, wish, expectation, request, or recommendation, frequently employed in wills,' and a trust has been created by such words as 'hope,' 'wish,' 'request,' etc., if they be not so modified by the context as to amount to no more than mere suggestions to be acted upon or not, according to the caprice of the interested devisee, or negated by other expressions indicating a contrary intention, and the subject and object be sufficiently certain."

fit of the same, until the final distribution shall take place, when the property thus loaned shall return to the estate to be equally divided. It is held that the will did not create a trust for the benefit of the grandchildren, but merely vested a power in the daughter (the tenant for life) to be exercised at her discretion.

In Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 300, 32 L. ed. 138, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1164, the words of a will were: "I give and bequeath to my said wife, Ellen M. Colton, all of the estate, real and personal, of which I shall die seised or possessed or entitled to. I recommend to her the care and protection of my mother and sister, and request her to make such gift and provision for them as in her judgment will be best." These words were construed as giving the mother and sister of the testator a beneficial interest in the estate given to the wife, to the extent of a permanent provision for them during their respective lives, suitable and sufficient for their care and protection, having regard to their condition and necessities, and the amount and value of the fund from which it must come. It is held it was the duty of the court to ascertain, determine, and declare what provision would be suitable and best under the circumstances, and all particulars and details for securing and paying it. It is also held that "when property is given by will absolutely and without restriction, a trust is not to be lightly imposed upon mere words of recommendation and confidence; but if

In Re Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 Pac. 964, 64 Pac. 1071, it was held that, according to the ordinary use of the English language, the word "desire" does not import a trust or charge.

A will provided: "Should either of my grandsons arrive at the age of twenty-one years or any of my granddaughters marry previous to the time of final distribution, viz., before the death of my daughter, Sarah Ann Lines, then, in that case, my will and desire is, that such grandson so arriving at the age of twenty-one years, or such granddaughter so marrying, as aforesaid, shall receive a portion of the estate as a loan, to have the management, and receive the benefit of the same, until the final distribution shall take place, and then to return the same to be equally divided with the rest of my estate." It was held that the life estate given to the widow in a prior clause was not subject to a trust under the clause quoted in favor of the grandchildren, but a discretionary power was vested in the legatee, which would not be controlled by the court. Lines v. Darden, 5 Fla. 74. In this case it was said: "There can be no doubt but that words of recommendation will create a trust, provided all the requisites are to be found in the will concurring for that purpose. They are held in many cases to import an imperative devise, and will so operate, if there is nothing in the will inconsistent with such a construction. The true question, in every case, is whether the intention of the testator is manifest and mandatory in favor of the object of the bounty, or is merely suggestive and advisory, to the first taker?"

Under a provision: "But out of this inheritance he is desired by his mother to pay as soon after as possible that it comes into his ownership Five hundred dollars ($500) to her grandniece," it was held that the word "desire" showed an intention to make this a gift. Re Copeland, 38 Misc. 402, 77 N. Y. Supp. 931. The court said: "There is no doubt therefore but that the testator firmly believed when she made this will that she was making an effectual pro- 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) vision by which the person toward whom she was kindly disposed would receive the contemplated gift, and this case is also free from any of the questions as to whether any trust is created, which arise in the cases quoted by the executor in his brief."

Desire and hope.

Where property is given absolutely and without restriction, a trust will not be imposed upon mere recommendation and confidence. Hess v. Singler, 114 Mass. 56. In this case the court held that to construe, "desire and hope that he will so provide, by will or otherwise, that in case he shall die leaving no lawful issue living, the property which he will take under this will shall go in equal shares" to certain nephews and others, as creating a trust, would be inconsistent with the intention of the testator to give the son an absolute title.

Desire and trust.

Whether the precatory words in a will shall be accorded such force as to deprive the donee of the absolute right of disposal, and thereby qualify the beneficial interest in the gift, must be determined in connection with what may be gathered from the rest of the will as an intention which would be reconcilable with the idea of a trust imposed upon the legal estate. Where to impose such a trust would be to nullify previous expressions in the will, and to create a repugnancy between its different parts, then the rules of construction forbid the attempt. When the object or the property is not certain or definite, or where a clear discretion and choice to act is given, and whenever prior dispositions impart uncontrollable ownership, it is held that the courts will not create a trust from precatory words.

After an absolute gift, the following words appeared: "Request and desire that my wife Eliza Anderson should, by last will and testament, devise and bequeath all of the said property at her death remaining in her possession, to." It was held that the power of disposition implied in the absolute gift of the property to the devisee was not limited by subsequent words which rethe objects of the supposed trust are definite, and the property clearly pointed out, if the relation between the testator and the supposed beneficiary are such as to indicate a motive on the part of the one to provide for the other, and if the precatory clause expressing a wish, entreaty, or recommendation that the donee shall apply the property to the benefit of the supposed cestui que trust warrants the inference that it is peremptory, then it may be held that an obligatory trust is created, which may be enforced in a court of equity." It is further held that "no technical language is necessary for the creation of a trust in a will, and no general rule can be formulated for determining whether a devise or bequest carries with it the whole beneficial interest, or whether it is to be construed as creating a trust." These cases seem to set forth the modern doctrine with reference to those trusts to which it applies. The cases on this subject are very numerous, and numbers of them have been examined; but we do not think it is necessary to encumber this opinion with a specific examination of them. The real question is: What was the intention of the testator, —did he (or she) intend that the words expressing the wish, desire, recommendation, or confidence, or the like, should govern the conduct of the party to whom they may be addressed, or whether they are an indication of that which he thinks would be a reasonable exercise of the discretion of the party, leaving it, however, to the ferred only to such property as might remain in her possession at the time of her death. Williams v. Worthington, 49 Md. 572, 33 Am. Rep. 86. The court said: "We have found no well-considered case in which a trust of this kind has been supported, where the gift to the first devisee was absolute in its terms, followed by precatory words indicating the disposition to be made of what might be left, or what might remain, of the property, at the death of the first devisee."

The will provided: "It is my further desire and request that my wife do make the said Lucretia M. Wood and my nephews and nieces, the children of my brothers Caleb S. Clay and George Clay, joint heirs after her death in the said estate which by this will I have bequeathed to my said wife." It was held that where there was an absolute gift of real or personal property, in order to qualify it or cut it down, the latter part of the will should show an equally clear intention to do so, by the use of words definite in their meaning, and by expressions which must be regarded as imperative. It was held in this case that the desire and request were only a suggestion, and were only morally binding upon the widow. Clay v. Wood, 153 N. Y. 134, 47 N. E. 274, affirming 91 Hun, 407, 38 N. Y. Supp. 317, distinguished in Collister v. Fassitt, 163 N. Y. 281, 79 Am. St. Rep. 586, 57 N. E. 490.

A provision: "It is my desire and request that Frank L. Smith, mentioned in the preceding clause in my will, shall watch over and care for my friend, Lena Wilde, who at one time lived in my family, and see that at no time is she allowed to suffer or want for the necessaries of life," was held not to constitute a trust. This was on the ground that if the testatrix intended to subject this devise to the trust, she would have used other more obligatory words. Wilde v. Smith, 2 Dem. 93. The court said: "They are simply a wish or recommendation, appealing to the discretion of the residuary legatee, and cannot therefore impose any legal obligation upon him in favor of the petitioner." 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The will provided: "If at her death she should have unconsumed any of said property, I desire and request that she give to Mrs. John B. Clark the sum of $200. But this provision in favor of Mrs. Clark is in no way to interfere with the enjoyment of said property by my wife. It is to be hers to dispose of as she sees proper." It was held that his did not impose any trust upon the property in the hands of his wife, as such construction would be contrary to her unlimited power of enjoyment, consumption, and disposition. Clark v. Hill, 98 Tenn. 300, 39 S. W. 339.

Desire and intention.

The provision: "It is my desire and intention that Adeline Sibert, the mother of said children, shall use and occupy said land until the youngest of said children shall become twenty-one years of age, to support and educate said children," was held to create a trust in favor of the children. Sibert v. Cox, 100 Ind. 392. This was held to entitle the mother to the rents and profits of the land, as against the guardian of the children.

Direct.

A provision: "I direct my wife, Amelia A. Scranton, out of the property hereinafter given and bequeathed to her by this will, to use so much thereof for the support and benefit of my niece, Georgie S. Collister, as my said wife shall from time to time in her discretion think best so to do," was held to create a trust, and the positive direction of the testator to point out the fund and create a charge thereon. The amount for support and benefit was to be taken out from time to time. The sum necessary was alone left to the discretion of the wife, and it was held that the residuary legatee was charged with a reasonable amount for the support of Georgie S. Collister. Collister v. Fassitt, 163 N. Y. 281, 79 Am. St. Rep. 586, 57 N. E. 490, affirming 23 App. Div. 466, 48 N. Y. Supp. 792, distinguished in Post v. Moore, 181 N. Y. 15, 106 Am. St. Rep. 495, 73 N. E. 482, 2 Ann. Cas. 591.

Not doubting.

The provision: "for her use and com-party to exercise his own discretion? It does not seem to have been found possible to formulate any definite statement of principles which will apply to every case. See 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1163 et seq.; Post v. Moore, 181 N. Y. 15, 73 N. E. 482, 106 Am. St. Rep. 495, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 591, and note; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. chaps. 1014 et seq; Gardner, Wills, pp. 536-538. Also see Robinson v. Randolph, 21 Fla. 629, text 644, 58 Am. Rep. 692.

Applying these general principles to the third paragraph of the will of Mrs. Augusta Levi, can we say that she intended thereby to create a trust in the estate which she had given in the previous paragraph to her grandson, in favor of her daughter? In the first line we are confronted with her expressed intention,—an expressed intention to make no provision in her will for her daughter or granddaughter, as in her judgment they will be more amply provided for by her grandson than they could be in her will. It is true that the allegations of the bill assert conditions which, if true, it seems to us, should have appealed strongly to her motherly feelings to make some provision for her daughter, but she did not do it, and gives her reasons for not doing so. She seems to have trusted entirely to the son to provide for his mother. The will contains no precatory words,—it expresses no wish, desire, recommendation, entreaty, or the like, in regard to the use to be made of her estate. The testator simply expresses her judgment that her daughter and grand-fort, and to be disposed of as she pleases, at or before her decease, when no doubt she will make such distribution of the same as she may then think most proper,"—was held to pass an estate in fee simple. Kinter v. Jenks, 43 Pa. 445.

Enjoin.

This word is held not to create a trust, where the legatee has discretion, but to create one where the property is given for that purpose.

Under the provision: "The other two thirds I leave in her power, and bequeath to her for support during her lifetime, and leaving it as an injunction on her to divide it on the children at her death, as she deems best, and as they deserve," it was held that the widow took at least an estate for life with the power to convey the fee and to receive the proceeds, and that no trust was created by the will in favor of the children. Gibbins v. Shepard, 125 Mass. 541.

And under the provision: "I enjoin upon her to make such provision for said grandchild out of my residuary estate now in her hands, in such manner, at such times, and in such amounts as she may judge to be expedient and conducive to the welfare of said grandchild, and her own sense of justice and Christian duty shall dictate," it was held that the residuary estate was absolutely vested in the devisee; that the testator reposed confidences with which the court would not interfere. Lawrence v. Cooke, 104 N. Y. 632, 11 N. E. 144, reversing 32 Hun, 126, distinguished in Collier v. Fassitt, 163 N. Y. 281, 79 Am. St. Rep. 586, 57 N. E. 490.

But in Whittingham v. Schofield, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2444, 67 S. W. 846, the clause: "The object of this bequest is not only to make a provision for the said Martha, but enable her to assist in the support of her father and mother, William O. and Maggie Whittingham, as long as they shall live, and this duty I strictly enjoin upon her,"—was held to create a precatory trust, and 57 L.R.A. (N.S.) the father and mother to be entitled to a support from the income.

Enjoin and direct.

By a clause after giving a fee: "Should my wife during her lifetime not consume or use all my property, real and personal, for her proper support, then I do hereby enjoin and direct her to make and publish her last will and testament, that after her decease all the rest and residue not consumed, used, or sold by her shall be divided," etc.,—the testator was held to give a fee simple absolute to his widow, with the express power to consume or convey, desiring his wife to devise the unconsumed residue, putting his request in strong words ordinarily importing command, but so used as to indicate only an intent not to reduce the estate, but to control one of its incidents. It was held that where that was the intent, no words, however strong, ordinarily importing command, amount to more than a request. Good v. Fichthorn, 144 Pa. 287, 27 Am. St. Rep. 630, 22 Atl. 1032.

Expect and desire.

Where testator provided: "And I expect and desire that my said wife will not dispose of any of said estate by will in such a way that the whole that might remain at her death shall go out of my own family and blood relation," it was held that the estate was not qualified by the precatory words of the concluding paragraph. Re Gardner, 140 N. Y. 122, 35 N. E. 439. The court said: "Similar terms have sometimes been construed to create a trust, or rather a power in trust, but never, so far as we have been able to discover, where, as in this case, the words of the will in the first instance clearly indicate a disposition in the testator to give the entire interest, use, and benefit to the donee." This case was distinguished in Collier v. Fassitt, supra.

Faith.

Testator provided: "I make this bequest in the full faith that my husband will properly provide for the two children of my deceased brother, Simeon, whom we have un-daughter will be more amply provided for than they could be by her in her will. It is not the function of the courts to make or reconstruct wills according to their notions of what testators should do. Words should be given their usual meaning, unless some other meaning is intended.

The will in the instant case was not contested so far as the record shows. It was probated in 1902. Five years after its probate we are asked to construe it, and, though we are not insensible to the ethical and sentimental considerations presented by the record, we are constrained to hold that no such trust was created by the will in favor of the appellant as a court of equity can enforce.

The decree appealed from is affirmed.

All concur, except Taylor, J., absent on account of illness.

Petition for rehearing in this case denied.

dertaken to raise and educate." It was held that the deceased intended that her husband should provide for the children out of the property devised to him. Noe v Kern, 93 Mo. 367, 3 Am. St. Rep. 544, 6 S. W. 239. This was on the ground that in construing a will, the intention of the testator was to be ascertained if possible, and that, in looking for the intention, the surrounding circumstances might be taken in consideration if possible.

Hope and trust.

A will provided: "And I admonish and charge my said grandchildren that this gift is made in the hope and upon the trust that they will provide for their parents during their lives." It was held that these words amounted to nothing more than an expression of a wish and hope, and that they did not create a charge or fix a trust upon the property devised to the children absolutely in fee simple. Arnold v. Arnold, 41 S. C. 291, 19 S. E. 670.

A will provided: "Give, devise, and bequeath the same to my brother Samuel Carusi, to be held, used, and enjoyed by him, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns forever, with the hope and trust, however, that he will not diminish the same to a greater extent than may be necessary for his comfortable support and maintenance, and that at his death, the same, or so much thereof as he, the said Samuel Carusi, shall not have disposed of by devise or sale, shall descend to my three beloved nieces." This was held to give the devisee an estate in fee simple, with an absolute power and disposition, and the limitation to the nieces was void. Howard v. Carusi, 109 U. S. 726, 27 L. ed. 1090, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 575.

A hope that the testator's indebtedness might not sweep away the estate, and leave the wife without support during her life, without means to help his children from time to time as they may need it, and without something which she may at the end give to his children, and a confidence that she may so help his children from time to time, and finally, "what is left give to all the children alike,"—were held not to create a trust in favor of the children. Orth v. Orth, 145 Ind. 184, 32 L.R.A. 298, 57 Am. St. Rep. 185, 42 N. E. 277, 44 N. E. 17. These recommendatory words were in a letter to the wife, informing her that she was the sole beneficiary of the will.

Knowing.

The will provided: "The remainder of everything that I possess I leave as a sacred trust to my daughter, Mary C. Wooldridge, knowing that she will faithfully carry out my wishes regarding it," the sacred trust referred to was contained in a separate paper signed by the testator. This was held to leave no doubt as to the identity of the beneficiaries, or of their interest in the estate devised. Hughes v. Bent, 118 Ky. 609, 81 S. W. 931.

May.

A will provided: "I will and bequeath to my daughter, Mary McIntyre, the one half of the land that I possess above the road, that is the north end. She will not have power to sell, but may leave the same to her children." It was held that the word "may" was precatory only, and not obligatory, and if so it could not defeat the otherwise operative effect of the devise. McIntyre v. McIntyre, 123 Pa. 329, 10 Am. St. Rep. 529, 16 Atl. 783.

Recommend.

This is usually held to be suggestive only, and not mandatory.

A provision: "Will and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Catharine M. Ellis, my whole estate . . . recommending to her, at the same time, to make some small allowance, at her convenience, to each of my brothers and sisters; say to each, one thousand dollars," was held not to create a trust as the words were not imperative. It was held that the rule is to give such recommendatory words their natural, ordinary, and familiar sense. Ellis v. Ellis, 15 Ala. 296, 50 Am. Dec. 132. Speaking of the early English rule, the court said: "We only refuse to follow a rule of construction which many of them acknowledge to have been founded in error, and from which they would gladly have receded if they could. That they, upon this point, have erred but confirms the declaration in the Book, that 'great men are not always wise.'"

And the clause: "Recommend to my said nephew to leave his portion thereof, after his own death, and the death of his wife, in trust for the said Charles Whitcomb Tuttle, and to his children or descendants, if any be alive at the time of the death of his said son, and if there be none so alive, to Harvard College,"—was held not to create a trust in favor of Harvard College. Re Whitcomb, 86 Cal. 265, 24 Pac. 1028. This construction was on the ground that the testator meant to leave the devisees free to act upon his advice or not.

And by the use, after a devise to the wife in fee, of the words, "recommending to her to give the same to my children, at such time and in such manner as he shall think best," it was held that there was no trust, as it was uncertain who the parties were who should take, and what they were to take, and there was a discretion given to the devisee. It was further held that the wife took an absolute fee, and there were no subsequent words which restricted this. Gilbert v. Chapin, 19 Conn. 342. The court said: The early adjudications, a trust was raised where not only the property devised, but the persons who were to take, by the commendatory terms of the will, were left quite doubtful; thereby in effect leaving it to the devisee in trust, or to the court, in enforcing the trust, to dispose of the estate instead of giving effect to the testator's will, made and executed by himself, as the statute of wills required.

And "I recommend her not to dispose of them, or convert them without the distinct advice of my friend, Mr. Bruce,"—was held not to use the word "recommend" in the sense of a command. Re Whitcomb, supra.

And the advisory paragraphs, after a devise to the Tulane University: "It is contemplated," "I recommend," "In furtherance of the purpose of the bequest,"—were held not to be in the nature of a precatory trust. Hutchinson's Succession, 112 La. 656, 36 So. 639.

The will provided: "In case of the death of either of my sisters, the property herein bequeathed to them is to go to the survivor or survivors, and at the death of all the persons herein named as taking on the death of my child, it is recommended the amount of property coming to them shall go to the lineal descendants of John Moffat." It was held that the recommendation did not affect the title of the devisees or legatees. Field v. New York, 38 Hun, 590, affirmed in 105 N. Y. 623.

A will recommended testator's wife to increase a gift to a church, also to increase a gift to Perolin. The testator then interlined the will between these gifts,—“at her Pleasure if she My Wife feel dispose to do so but it is not obligatory Also.” This was held not imperative, but discretionary with the widow. Eberhardt v. Perolin, 49 N. J. Eq. 570, 25 Atl. 510.

But in Webster v. Morris, 66 Wis. 366, 57 Am. Rep. 278, 28 N. W. 353, where the provision was: "If in their judgment there should be a sufficient amount of said surplus, I would recommend that the same be used to establish a school . . . for the education of young persons in the domestic and useful arts; but in case there is not enough of my estate to meet the above legacies, that the deficit may be borne pro rata between,"—it was held that the word "recommend" in connection with this will would be construed as meaning a command or direction to use such surplus to establish the school.

Rely.

A provision "I rely on her [testator's wife] to make all needful provisions for the future wants of my brother, Sylvester," was held to create an implied trust. Blanchard v. Chapman, 22 Ill. App. 341. The court said: "The testator wants the trust executed in behalf of his brother, and he relies upon her as the trusty instrument to carry out his will. The will does not provide that the future wants of his brother may be supplied or not at her option, but she is relied upon to do the acts desired."

A will provided: "The sum of one hundred thousand dollars, relying upon them to dispose of the same for the benefit of such charitable and benevolent and educational purposes as they shall judge will most promote the comfort and improve the condition of the poor; or in case any of my descendants should become poor and needy, then to apply, in whole or in part, to such descendants." It was held at special term that, "in the present case it is apparent the testator did not intend to bequeath the $100,000 to the seven persons named, for their own use, but to make them the medium through which the $100,000 should be distributed to others." Willetts v. Willetts, 20 Abb. N. C. 471. On appeal to general term, this was reversed (35 Hun, 401), Davis, P. J., holding that "relying" was only an utterance of confidence; that it did not command or impose a duty. On appeal, the court of appeals (103 N. Y. 650) reversed the general term, and the judgment of the trial court was affirmed.

Request.

A request will be held mandatory and the same as a devise, if made use of in a direct devise; but the rule is different, where, having made a disposition, testator expresses a desire that the donee should make a certain use of his bounty.

The word "family" in the clause, "I request my seven sons above named, to take care of their brother John Tolson and his family," was held not sufficiently definite, to create a trust, although one was created as to John Tolson v. Tolson, 10 Gill & J. 159.

A trust was not created by a clause, "and give to her all not before specified in this and request her to give as I may direct or sell from what remains." Wyman v. Woodbury, 86 Hun, 277, 33 N. Y. Supp. 217.

And a devise and bequest "unto my said executors for their use and benefit, with a request to them, that a portion of said residue be used for Masses for the repose of my soul, and the balance given to some deserving charity,"—was held a gift to the executors personally, and the request not to impair their ownership. Re O'Reagan, 62 Misc. 592, 117 N. Y. Supp. 96.

A "request that she, my said wife, shall assist any of my brothers or sisters if they should be in need, and at her decease she divide her property among them as she may think best," was held not to create a precatory trust, as whether this clause referred to all his brothers and sisters, or only those who might be in need, was not definitely stated, and the only way she could make division would be by some instrument or by a will. It was held that she had the discretion. McDuffie v. Montgomery, 128 Fed. 105. The court said: "She was at liberty to divide the same as 'she may think best.' If this means anything, it means that she had the option to give to some more, and to others less, or nothing at all. It makes no provision for the death of any of the brothers and sisters during her life. There is to my mind an utter lack of the necessary conditions upon which to raise a precatory trust. The language used, in my judgment, created an absolute estate in the wife."

And "Request my wife if she should not require the whole of my estate as a support, that she will will at her death the remainder to the children of my brother,"—was held not to be a precatory trust. Bryan v. Milby, 6 Del. Ch. 208, 13 L.R.A. 563, 24 Atl. 333. This was on the ground of uncertainty.

And "I request that if, at the time of her decease, any of the personal property shall remain undisposed of, it be given to the children of my son,"—was held to give the widow the whole interest in the property. Fullenwider v. Watson, 113 Ind. 18, 14 N. E. 571.

And "I only make this request of her, and only as a request, for I feel that her own kind heart and good judgment will prompt her to do so without, viz.: That in the event she should marry again she will see that the interests of our children in said property are protected,"—was held not to create a trust. Sale v. Thornberry, 86 Ky. 266, 5 S. W. 468. This was on the ground that the mere request by the testator, that his wife should look to the interests of the children in the estate upon a certain contingency, would not defeat the plain purpose of the testator to vest in his wife the fee simple title to his land.

And "I request, but without intending to create any trust therefor, that she allow and pay Ann Tasco, a mulatto, who has been for some time in our service, the sum of fifteen dollars per month, at the end of each month, so long as said Ann may live, to be used and applied toward her maintenance and support,"—was held not to establish a precatory trust. Enders v. Tasco, 89 Ky. 17, 11 S. W. 818. This was on the ground that it would be a difficult task for a testator so to express himself as not to create a trust, in expressing a mere wish to the object of his bounty, but leaving it entirely optional with the object of the bounty as to carrying out the wish, if this clause established a trust.

"I make it as a request of my children that if any of them should die without issue, that in so far as they may have received any estate from me, that at their death they 'will' the same to my surviving children or the issue of those that may be dead. I think this is but a reasonable request, and I have confidence that it will be complied with by my children,"—was held not to be imperative, as it did not refer to any special property and the devisee took a fee simple. Igo v. Irvine, 139 Ky. 634, 70 S. W. 836.

And a devise of a slave, "hereby requesting him, said Stephen, however, as soon as he can with convenience, to have the said slave taken to some State or country, where slavery and involuntary servitude is not known, there to be and remain free and emancipated forever,"—was held to be a bequest to the legatee to hold in his own right, and would not be treated as a compulsory trust in Louisiana. Young v. Egan, 10 La. Ann. 415. In Louisiana the emancipation of the slave by will was forbidden by law.

And after a bequest, an added clause: "And it is my request that John A. Whipple may provide for her a chaise, or other suitable conveyance, and attend her whenever and wherever she may wish to go, for a suitable compensation, if she shall desire it,"—was held to be so vague and indefinite that it could not be construed as entitling the widow to the legacy. Whipple v. Adams, 1 Met. 444. The court said: "Was a horse as well as a chaise to be kept solely for her use; or did he expect that Whipple would accommodate her with the use of his own horse and chaise, as occasions might require? It is also uncertain how Whipple was to be compensated for his services, whether by the widow out of the property given to her, or from the rest and residue of the testator's estate."

A provision: "Whatever may be left of my estate, if any, she may by will or otherwise give to those of my heirs that she may think best, she knowing my mind upon that subject. I am willing to leave the matter entirely with her, feeling satisfied that she will do as I have requested her to in the matter," was held not to be a trust, and the devisee not required by any obligation to dispose of the property to any particular person. Davis v. Mailey, 134 Mass. 588.

And a bequest to Susan B. Anthony, followed by a provision: "I request said Susan and Lucy to use said fund thus given to further what is called the Woman's Rights Cause. But neither of them is under any legal responsibility to any one or any court to do so,"—was held to be an absolute gift, and no trust to be imposed on the property. Bacon v. Ransom, 139 Mass. 117, 29 N. E. 473.

And a provision: "It being my request that my dear husband assign by will what of this property I now leave him he has not expended to such of my relatives as he in his judgment may think may need it. It is also my request that what property my dear husband may leave to our beloved son, Harry M. S. Holmes, may be left to him in trust,"—was held not to constitute a trust, but a recommendation, and not to

The will provided: "It is my request that she shall, either before her death by gift, or in such other manner as she shall deem proper or after her death by will, transfer, grant and give to the foregoing legatees the sums and amounts hereinbefore set forth out of whatever may remain of the proceeds of my property, real and personal, over and above what she may have used, or desire to use, during her lifetime, for her own maintenance, or for other purposes to which she may desire to apply it." Previous to this will, a present interest had been conveyed by deed, and it was held that the testator had no legal authority to direct by will what disposition should be made of the real estate. Hillsdale College v. Wood, 145 Mich. 257, 108 N. W. 675. The court said: "The essence of the doctrine of precatory trusts is that the words creating them, while in form the expression of a request, wish, or recommendation on the part of the testator, are, in fact, intended by him as a positive direction or command, obligatory upon the person to whom they are addressed."

And a bequest and devise to the wife of all the property, the proceeds of which are to be employed for her support and that of her children, followed by a provision: "And it is my further request that no sale or mortgage be made of any of my real estate during the minority of any of my children. After which time my wife will be at liberty to make such disposition of the property here bequeathed as she may deem proper for the use and benefit of my children,"—was held to impose no trust; and after the youngest child became of age, she had the right to dispose of it in any way she might deem proper. Courtenay v. Courtenay, 90 Miss. 181, 43 So. 68.

The provision was "to the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the city of New York, with the request that the same be expended, if such expenditure is sanctioned by law, in the erection of a drinking fountain in the city of New York, to my memory." It was held not to limit the absolute gift of the residue, or to create a precatory trust. Re Crane, 12 App. Div. 271, 42 N. Y. Supp. 904, affirmed in 159 N. Y. 557, 54 N. E. 1089. This was because, to create a trust of the latter description, the precatory expression should concern individuals other than the trustee.

Testator stated: "Doubts having arisen as to the validity of the bequests made for charitable purposes in my said will, I hereby modify said will dated February 18, 1889, by making my friend Townsend Wandell my residuary legatee and devisee, and hereby request him to carry into effect my wishes with respect thereto, but this is not to be construed into an absolute direction on my part, but merely my desire." It was held that the bequest was absolute to the legatee, and not upon any trust. Re Keleman, 126 N. Y. 73, 26 N. E. 968. The court said: "It is true that the expression of a wish or a desire may sometimes serve to found a trust or effect a charge, but such expressions are by no means conclusive. We must still examine the will to discover the testamentary intention."

The provision was, "Should my son, John Faulcon, die without lawful issue, then and in that case it is my request (inasmuch as it was his father's wish) that the above given legacy be by him conveyed by will in writing to his brother J. N. Faulcon, or to one or more of my grandchildren." It was held that John Faulcon had an estate in fee simple, absolute under the will. Batchelor v. Macon, 69 N. C. 545. This was on the ground that whenever a donor by will gives an estate to one and his heirs forever, direct words should be used in order to cut down the estate to a life estate or what is in effect the same thing, and that no expression of hope or request can be allowed to have that effect.

A provision: "And I request my executors in dividing and apportioning the said residue to require of my said daughters, that their respective daughters shall receive of my estate, as far as practicable, severally, about double the amount that my said daughters' sons receive severally,"—was held not to give anything to the daughters or the sons of the donees mentioned; and there was nothing to indicate that the donees had not the ultimate disposal of the estate, and there was nothing to qualify the language previously used, in which a fee was given to the donees. Bellas's Estate, 176 Pa. 122, 34 Atl. 1003.

Property was given to a devisee "to dispose of as she may please, requesting her that she will so dispose of her property at her death as to make my youngest son, Samuel Stillman Speairs, an equal legatee with the balance of my children." It was held that no precatory trust was created. Speairs v. Ligon, 59 Tex. 233.

A codicil, "Do request my executors, H. J. Chandler and L. A. Alderson, to give the entire proceeds of my estate, when said estate shall fall into their hands, according to my will, to the propagation of the Gospel in foreign lands,"—was held void for uncertainty, and it was refused probate and was held not to revoke a prior will. Carpenter v. Miller, 3 W. Va. 174, 100 Am. Dec. 744. The court said: "According to the will then, they would take the residuum in absolute and uncontrollable ownership, and the objects of the recommendatory trust mentioned in the codicil being uncertain and indefinite, a court of equity cannot, according to the authorities, construe the words of the codicil to create a constructive trust, which would fail for uncertainty, merely for the purpose of working a revocation of the will to defeat the residuary devisees." In this case it was said: "The rule then is that wherever the words are imperative, though inoperative by reason of some incapacity in the devisee, they operate a revocation of a former will, and whenever the words are precatory, or expressing hope, desire, or request, if the object of the hope, desire, or request be certain and definite, the words are considered imperative, and are held by the courts to create a trust for the purpose indicated, and operate a revocation of a former will. But whenever the prior dispositions of the property are complete, and the words are precatory, or expressing hope, desire, or request, and the object of the hope, desire, or request be uncertain and indefinite, the words will not be held to create a trust, or be construed to revoke a former will."

A clause in a bequest to devisee: "Only requesting her, at the close of her life, to make such disposition of the same among my children and grandchildren, as shall seem to her good,"—was held to be a mere recommendation, and not to create a legal obligation. Foose v. Whitmore, 82 N. Y. 405, 37 Am. Rep. 572. The court said: "Indeed, the peculiar and qualified language used, 'only requesting,' etc., seems also to indicate that the omission to provide for them was deliberate and intentional, and that they may have been so referred to under an impression of the testator, or the writer of the will, that unless in some manner they appeared to be in the mind of the testator at the time of its execution, the will would, as against them, be invalid." This case was distinguished in Collister v. Fassitt, 163 N. Y. 281, 79 Am. St. Rep. 586, 57 N. E. 490, affirming 23 App. Div. 466, 48 N. Y. Supp. 792.

And precatory words in a devise were held not to constitute a trust, where the words were not peremptory, in Young v. Egan, 10 La. Ann. 415. This was a request to free a slave made in Alabama. It was held that the devisee could hold him as a slave in Louisiana.

And, in order to construct a valid trust, it was held that three things must concur,—sufficient words to raise it, a certain subject, and a definite object. It was further held that there was no certainty as to subject-matter in, "requesting her to make at her death such equitable distribution of what remains among my children, giving first, before such disposition of the property that may at her death remain, etc." Coulson v. Alpaugh, 163 Ill. 298, 45 N. E. 216.

But in New Jersey, a clause, "with the request that, upon his death, he leaves the same, in equal portions, to," was held to create a trust. Eddy v. Hartshorne, 34 N. J. Eq. 419. It was said: "The rule of the English chancery is that when, by will, property is given absolutely to a person, and the same person is, by the giver, 'recommended,' 'entreated,' 'requested,' or 'wished' to dispose of that property in favor of another, the recommendation, request, or wish is held to be imperative, and to create a trust, if the subject and objects are certain. That rule is recognized and established here."

By the Supreme Court of the United States, a provision: "I give and bequeath to my said wife, Ellen M. Colton, all of the estate, real and personal, of which I shall die seized or possessed or entitled to. I recommend to her the care and protection of my mother and sister, and request her to make such gift and provision for them as in her judgment will be best. I also request my dear wife to make such provision for my daughter Helen, wife of Crittenden Thornton, and Carrie, as she may in her love for them choose to exercise."—was held to create a precatory trust, because it did not give the devisee the absolute right to use or dispose of the estate. This was construed mandatory on account of the subsequent clause requesting her to make such gift and provision for them as in her judgment will be best. Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 300, 32 L. ed. 138, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1164, reversing 10 Sawy. 325, 21 Fed. 594. The court said: "And in such a case as the present, it would be but natural for the testator to suppose that a request which, in its terms, implied no alternative, addressed to his widow and principal legatee, would be understood and obeyed as strictly as though it were couched in the language of direction and command." In this case, it was held that the Civil Code of Cal. §§ 1317, 1328, providing that the testator's intention is to be ascertained by the words of the will, taking into view the circumstances, and that all parts of the will are to be construed in relation to each other, and the words are to receive an interpretation which will give to every expression some effect, was merely declaratory of pre-existing law.

A provision: "Then I request him to expend for her benefit, in such manner, at such time, in such time, or to settle upon her in such way, at such time, and on such terms as he, in his judgment, may think her interest requires, the sum of $10,000; . . . he being fully advised of my wishes concerning the said Lillie, and also concerning the said sum of $10,000, which I request him to use for her benefit on the conditions aforesaid,"—was held to create a trust. Bohon v. Barrett, 79 Ky. 378. The court said: "The discretion was not intended to be arbitrary. Those terms do not relate to his power to make or not to make the expenditure according to his own caprice. In such a case as the present, where the utmost freedom is conferred in the exercise of the discretion, it is clear a court of equity would interfere and control the discretion where it is abused, abandoned, or refused to be exercised." This case was distinguished in Enders v. Tasco, 89 Ky. 17, 11 S. W. 818, and Sale v. Thornberry, 86 Ky. 266, 5 S. W. 468.

Property was given to testator's wife, "with a special request that at her death she give the said lands to be equally divided between her near relatives and mine." It was held that the wish expressed was clear, the time indicated was her death, the mode of disposition was described, the class of beneficiaries was defined, and the object clearly pointed out. Handley v. Wrightson, 60 Md. 198. In this case the court said: "Nor is the doctrine of the creation of trusts by words of recommendation, desire, hope, and the like, without distinct recognition in the decisions of this court. In the cases of Tolson v. Tolson, 10 Gill. & J. 159; Chase v. Plummer, 17 Md. 165, and Williams v. Worthington, 49 Md. 572, 33 Am. Rep. 286, whilst the court, in the first of these cases, does not explicitly dwell in its opinion upon this rule of construction, and in the last two cases decides that under their particular circumstances no trusts were created, the decision in Tolson v. Tolson, as that case was presented and argued, and the tenor and citations of the opinions in the cases of Chase v. Plummer and Williams v. Worthington, which were decided upon grounds not in conflict with the principles of the rule itself, clearly indicate the binding force in the judgment of this tribunal, of the doctrine of precatory trusts in all such cases to which it is properly applicable."

Testator provided: "I request the said Susan McCallum at her death to give the same to her two daughters, . . . the receipt of the said Susan McCallum for the said amount shall be a sufficient discharge to my executors therefor." It was held that a trust was created. McCurdy v. McCallum, 186 Mass. 464, 72 N. E. 75. The court said: "This is not a case where there is uncertainty as to the objects of the trust, or as to the amount of it, or where there are any words, as, for instance, 'if she thinks best,' or 'at her discretion,' expressly giving her a clear discretion or choice, or where there are words like 'absolutely,' directly expressing that the bequest is absolute. On the contrary the objects of the bounty, namely, the two granddaughters, are clearly specified, the amount of the trust fund is clearly stated, it is not mingled with any other property, and the relations of the testatrix to the objects of the trust are such as to indicate a strong motive for the bounty and for this method of providing it."

Under a devise, "with one request, that he give my father, J. A. Sample, $200 a year as long as he lives," it was held that the devisee could be garnished. Red v. Powers, 69 Miss. 242, 13 So. 586.

Request and direction.

A provision: "To avoid all contentions and disputes, it is my request and direction that said Annie E. Hall shall, immediately upon my decease, by will, devise and direct that such portion of said estate as shall be left at her decease be divided between the survivors of my brothers and sisters, according to my intention as expressed in this will. I wish it distinctly understood that I place no restriction upon my said wife in regard to her use of my said estate,"—was held to leave to the surviving brothers and sisters all that was left of the estate after the decease of testator's widow. Hall v. Otis, 71 Me. 326.

Request and wish.

A provision: "It is my request and wish that in the event that my wife survives me, that she will, during her life, make such provisions by will or otherwise, so that at her death my son, William C. Mitchell, may share equally of the estate and property herein willed to her with my other children,"—was held not to charge the devisee and bequests with a trust in favor of testator's son. Mitchell v. Mitchell, 143 Ind. 113, 42 N. E. 465. This was on the ground that a devise in fee clearly and distinctly made cannot be taken away, cut down, or modified by subsequent words not clearly and distinctly manifesting the testator's intention to limit such devise.

And a provision that I "request my dear wife Jane in whose affection and generosity I have full confidence to pay to her or her caretaker such sum or sums of money as may be requisite for her every comfort; . . . and it is my wish and expectation that when my wife Jane shall make her will disposing of the property left by me that she will generously remember the children of my deceased brother William and such others as she may choose,"—was held, in regard to a nephew, to give the devisee a greater discretion than the provision for the support of mother and sister. It was held that the testator's expression was one of hope and confidence, rather than of command. Russell v. United States Trust Co. 69 C. C. A. 410, 136 Fed. 758, affirming 127 Fed. 445. This was on the ground that "wish and expectation" are not so forcible as "request."

Require.

A provision: "Requiring him to pay to my little niece, Bessie Curd Field, $500 when she arrives at the age of twenty-one or when she gets married,"—was held to create a trust. Curd v. Field, 103 Ky. 293, 45 S. W. 92.

Suggest.

A provision: "I suggest if the spire or steeple of the said church property be unfinished at the time of my death, that the funds received, or such part thereof as may be necessary, be used for the purpose of completing the same,"—was held not a precatory trust. Williams v. Baptist Church, 92 Md. 497, 54 L.R.A. 427, 48 Atl. 930. The court said: "There is nothing in the word 'suggest,' either in its meaning as ordinarily employed, or as affected by the context of the will, that can be regarded as expressive of confidence or belief or desire or hope or will, or as the equivalent of a word of entreaty or recommendation. 'Suggest' is, in fact, therefore, not a precatory word at all, in the ordinary sense, and there is nothing in this will to justify us in attributing to it any other than its ordinary meaning. If this interpretation of this word be correct, there was no duty upon the committee to perform the acts suggested."

Trust.

In some cases the use of the word "trust" was held mandatory, but not where the testator cautioned against such construction.

Where testator provided: "I may have given to one more than I intended," and then added, "I trust to the sense of justice of my said sons, that if I have given more to one than to the other, that they will do right, and authorize my wife, as trustee, to assist them in arriving at justice,"—it was held that these terms imported a trust. Hadley v. Hadley, 100 Tenn. 446, 45 S. W. 342. This was on the ground that where it is a difficult matter to determine whether words of recommendation or entreaty are imperative or not, there is always a tendency to construe them as obligatory, in furtherance of a result which accords with a plain moral duty on the part of a devisee or legatee, and with what it may be supposed the testator would do if he could control his action.

But where the provision was: "I do this in full trust and confidence that she will provide for the distribution of the same by her last will and testament among our children . . . but this expression of trust and confidence is not to be interpreted as limiting her right of ownership or power of distribution,"—it was held that the words of the will clearly showed that the testator intended that the words were merely advisory, and not obligatory. The widow's right of ownership was an absolute fee simple. The testator said his expression of trust and confidence was not to be construed as limiting this right. Tabor v. Tabor, 85 Wis. 313, 55 N. W. 702. This case was distinguished in Swarthout v. Swarthout, 111 Wis. 102, 86 N. W. 558.

Martha Dunlap made a will, constituting Daniel W. Powers executor and trustee, and providing: "Upon the trust and confidence reposed in the said Daniel W. Powers, that he will dispose of the said property among the charitable and benevolent institutions or corporations in the city of Rochester as he shall choose, and such sums and proportions as he shall deem proper." It was held that the gift was too indefinite, and could not be carried into effect, for the failure to designate a beneficiary or a class or kind of beneficiary to whom distribution was practicable. The trust attempted was held to be unenforceable. People v. Powers, 147 N. Y. 104, 35 L.R.A. 502, 41 N. E. 432.

After a devise apparently for life, the following words appeared: "Trusting and expecting that she will use and dispose of the whole thereof as she may desire, and that she will give the residue, if any remains at her death, by her will, to such persons and for such purposes as she may desire." It was held that the latter clause negatived the intention to limit the grant to a life estate, but the intention was to give an absolute power of disposal not of a life estate, but of the whole thereof by deed or will. Judevine v. Judevine (Powers v. Judevine) 61 Vt. 587, 7 L.R.A. 517, 18 Atl. 778.

This is held not to impose a trust where the wish is vague. But where it is definite as to amount and object, it is held to impose a trust.

So, where testator said: "I want to give my wife an executrix's power to give out of my estate before division, as much as $15,000 of bequests to my kinfolks, say, to Melville Williams, $5,000 or $10,000, in her discretion, and the balance to someone else who may be needy,"—it was held that a trust was imposed in favor of Mr. Williams to the extent of $5,000 of the bequest, and that a discretion was vested in the executrix to increase it in his favor to $10,000, if she saw proper. Ensley v. Ensley, 105 Tenn. 107, 58 S. W. 288.

But where testatrix said: "I want her to give any presents to my sister, Euphemia Cunningham Webster, that she may need, and that my estate can afford. I want Hettie as far as possible, to look after my sister Euphemia's interests, and to protect her as far as lies in her power,"—it was held that a trust was not created as the wish of benefaction to her sister was too vaguely worded as to the subject-matter to be carried into execution. Webster v. Wathen, 97 Ky. 318, 30 S. W. 663.

Will.

Testator provided: "I will that the balance of my lands not willed shall be sold and the money given to my wife for charitable purposes. I will that the balance of my bonds not willed shall be collected and the money given to my wife for charitable purposes." It was held that no trust was thereby created, and the gifts mentioned were void for uncertainty, and, taking the whole will together, it was clearly the intention of the testator to provide his wife with the fund which would enable her, solely at her discretion, to dispense charities in such a manner as she might choose. Baker v. Baker, 53 W. Va. 165, 44 S. E. 174.

Will and desire.

Where the will said: "It is further my will and desire that my beloved wife, Statura, shall pay two hundred dollars, commencing 1st of January, 1861, to my nephew, John Lyell, for the purpose of educating him," it was held that "will and desire" and "shall pay" were mandatory; and it would have been difficult so to use language more expressive of positive intent. Anderson v. Hammond, 2 Lea, 282, 31 Am. Rep. 612.

In the following clause: "My will and desire is that the property given to them shall not, in any instance, be liable for the debts of their husbands, but shall descend from my daughters aforesaid to their children," "will and desire" were held not to be used as merely precatory words, indicating a desire or recommendation, but to create a remainder in the children of the devisee. Collins v. Williams, 98 Tenn. 529, 41 S. W. 1056.

A will provided: "I give, devise and bequeath unto my friend, Mary S. M. Hardwicke, my negro woman, Phillis, together with her future issue and increase, trusting that the said Mary S. M. Hardwicke will fully comply with my wishes, respecting the said negro woman, Phillis, and her children which may hereafter be born; and it is further my will and desire, that the said Phillis should be allowed to keep with her, and have the services of her child, Martha, during the lifetime of the said Phillis." It was held that the legal interest in Martha was given to the residuary legatees, and the recommendation that she might be allowed to attend and serve Phillis was addressed to their benevolence and good faith, and could not affect the title of the residuary legatee. Skrine v. Walker, 3 Rich. Eq. 262.

Will and intention.

The following language, after a devise of a life estate: "And it is my will and intention that the said Seth Wells may dispose of the furniture, plate, pictures and all other articles now in my house, absolutely, as he may deem expedient, in accordance with my wishes as otherwise communicated by me to him,"—was held not to create a trust, but to give the devisee the absolute property in the articles. Wells v. Doane, 3 Gray, 201.

Wish.

Precatory words in a will, following a bequest or devise in general terms, expressing a desire or wish as to the ultimate use or disposition of property devised or bequeathed, or some portion thereof, by the person taking the title in the first instance, are construed as creating a trust in such first taker for the benefit of the other person or persons named, if that, under all the circumstances, appears clearly to have been the intent of the testator, and such intention can be read from the language used by him, by the aid of those liberal rules which obtain for the purpose of giving effect to testamentary words.

And where the will provided: "After the children arrive at age I leave it discretionary with Susan my loving wife what donation to make them out of the property, and in case of her decease or marriage to be left with the executors whom I shall hereafter name, but in every respect I wish them made as near equal as can be,"—it was held that it was the intention to give the property to the wife in trust for herself and children while she lived and remained a widow, that the property was to be used for their mutual benefit, "in such manner as she might think proper," except as specified by the testator, and that the wife could not dispose of the property by will. Ward v. Peloubet, 10 N. J. Eq. 304.

Where the language was, "of the $1,000 devised to my daughter Amelia, in case she should die not leaving any child or children living, then the $1,000 I wish to have go to my daughter Emily's children,"—"wish" was held to be used in the same sense as if he had said "I will" or "I devise." Bliven v. Seymour, 88 N. Y. 469.

The will provided: "If she find it always convenient to pay my sister Caroline Buck the sum of three hundred dollars a year, and also to give my brother, Edwin W. during his life the interest on ten thousand dollars (or seven hundred dollars per year), I wish it to be done." It was held that the testator meant to charge upon the gift to the wife the annuities to his sister and brother provided only that their payment should occasion her no inconvenience. Phillips v. Phillips, 112 N. Y. 197, 8 Am. St. Rep. 737, 19 N. E. 411. The court said: "The use of the word 'always' implies a conviction in the testator's thought, which would quite naturally exist, that in view of the large estate he had given his wife, and her own ample fortune, it would usually and ordinarily, when the time of payment came, prove to be easy and convenient for her to spare the money for that purpose, but that such a state of facts might not always and upon every occasion exist; that in her management of the property there might come misfortune, reducing or destroying income, or some exceptional increase of expenses due to an under-estimate of incurred expenditure; and if that happened at any one or more of the times of payment, he desired that not she, but his sister and brother, should bear the consequent inconvenience." This case was distinguished in Collister v. Fassitt, 163 N. Y. 281, 79 Am. St. Rep. 586, 57 N. E. 490.

A will provided: "It is my wish that said persons apply the said rest, residue and remainder of my estate and property to the creation of some charitable or educational institution in the city of New York. I desire to place no restriction upon them with regard to the character of such charitable or educational institution, excepting that I desire the same to me nonsectarian." It was held that the testator left the selection of the institution to the discretion of the trustees, and it would be assumed that at the proper time they would discharge their duty under the trust without interference on the part of the court. Rothschild v. Schiff, 188 N. Y. 327, 80 N. E. 1030, modified in 103 App. Div. 235, 92 N. Y. Supp. 1076.

And the provision: "My wish is, that at her death, she will give the one half of all I give her," was held to have certainty as to the subject-matter, certainty as to the object of the bounty, and certainty as to the intention of the testator, and this created a trust which a court of equity would enforce. Cook v. Ellington, 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 371.

And under a devise and bequest, "to my beloved wife Elizabeth, all my real and personal estate, she at no time to give or bequeath any portion of said estate out of my family, as at her decease I wish my estate which remains to go to my nephews and nieces which may be living at that time," it was held that the widow took only a life estate. Fox's Appeal, 99 Pa. 382. This was on the ground that the words were not precatory, merely expressing the wish that his wife should give or bequeath the estate or what remains to his nephews and nieces, but that the words "I wish" were as mandatory as the words "I will."

Testator said: "It is my wish that my son David shall take especial charge of, maintain and support my brother, Edward Busby, during his, the said Edward's life. . . . It is my wish that my homestead, and five hundred and fifty-nine acres of land, with the improvements thereunto attached, as mentioned in item first, shall be set apart to my son David." It was held that there were no discretionary expressions in these clauses, but that they established a trust upon the homestead. Busby v. Lynn, 37 Tex. 151, subsequent trial, 46 Tex. 600.

Under a will providing: "I give, devise and bequeath unto my wife, Cora F. Swarthout, all and singular my property and estate real and personal. It is my wish that such property and estate above devised, or so much thereof as my said wife may be possessed of at her decease, shall go to or be by her given to our child or children, if any there be then living,"—it was held that it would be construed as giving the property to the widow for life, and making her a trustee for the children in remainder. Swarthout v. Swarthout, 111 Wis. 102, 86 N. W. 558. This was because there were no words guarding against the precatory expression being construed as a command, and the expression was to a wife in the "language of civility," and two children were born after the will was executed.

And where a will gave a testator's son $200 to be paid him at the death of his wife, "which said two hundred dollars it is my wish my son Stephen shall add to the advancement he may make his son Sampson S. Reed, when Sampson comes of age," it was held to create a trust in favor of the grandson, although he might have received other advancements. Reed v. Reed, 30 Ind. 313.

The provision: "As to my property and wealth, I first wish all my just debts and funeral expenses punctually paid, and the balance of my estate, wholly, I leave to my beloved wife, Nancy Carlisle, and to be disposed of by her and divided among my children at her discretion,"—was held to give the widow a life estate, and so far as she acted under the will, her acts were conclusive. But as to property she did not dispose of, the children became entitled to it, under the will of their father. Collins v. Carlisle, 7 B. Mon. 14.

Directing that "I wish that the indebtedness of Thos. J. Stewart & Co. shall be deducted from the shares and property so given and devised to the said wives of my sons Charles, Edward and Rowland, and that the property so as above given to said three wives of my three sons be for the education of their children and the support of their families respectively—and I enjoin upon them so to use and expend it,"—was held to create a trust to the extent of the education of the children and the support of the families. Clifford v. Stewart, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

95 Me. 38, 49 Atl. 52. It was said that it was not indefinite as to the children, for they were of a class whose membership was definite and known.

But where the devisee had discretion without any restrictions, no trust was held to exist, so where the title was absolute in the devisee, and where a trust would be inconsistent with the other parts of the will.

A will provided: "If for any reason any legacy or legacies left by my will or by any codicil, either pecuniary or residuary, shall lapse or fail, or for any cause not take effect in whole or in part, I give and bequeath the amount which shall lapse, fail or not take effect, absolutely to the persons named as my executors. In the use of the same I am satisfied that they will follow what they believe to be my wishes. I impose upon them, however, no conditions, leaving the same to them personally and absolutely, and without limitation or restriction." It was held that here was no trust created by the devise to the three persons named as executors. Adson v. Bartow, 15 Misc. 179, 37 N. Y. Supp. 99. The court said: "They had the full right to receive the residuum as their own; they had the full power to follow the dictates of their conscience in devesting themselves of that property, and placing it where they knew the testatrix wished it to go."

A provision: "So long as she shall remain my widow, and my children shall be under age, to be used and applied by her to the maintenance, support and education of my children who may be under age, but without being called upon to give any account of the manner in which she may have applied it; as it is my wish that she shall have the absolute control of its use and disposition so long as she shall remain my widow,"—was held to create no subtrust, but was purely the expression of confidence as to the use and disposition of the income to be paid to her. Biddle's Appeal, 80 Pa. 258.

And a provision: "I have full faith and confidence in my beloved wife, Mary, that she will do what is best and proper with my effects, and that she would do with my property the same as I would wish to have done, that she will take care of the proceeds,"—was held not to create a precatory trust, as there was given an absolute power of disposal. Giles v. Anslow, 128 Ill. 196, 21 N. E. 225. In the first clause of the will the absolute estate in the property was devised to the wife.

And a provision: "Knowing that in case any of my immediate relatives, or her sister, Julia Frances Owen, who has always been a kind sister and devoted friend should, by misfortune or otherwise, need or require any aid or assistance, that she would cheerfully and generously share with them; and therefore feel no hesitation in leaving with my wife the power to carry out the wishes as expressed herein. . . . It is my wish that such property as my wife may have remaining undisposed of at her death, that she should previously will and devise the same to her sister, and to my surviving brothers and sisters, in equal proportions, leaving it entirely with her to make such use and disposition of her property by will as her kind heart and good judgment shall dictate, merely expressing my desires and wishes in the premises; and if change of fortune, or other causes, shall, in her judgment, make it unwise to carry out any or all of the foregoing wishes or requests, she is absolved from carrying out the same,"—was held not to be imperative, and it was held that the property to which it was claimed a trust attached was not certain or definite, but depended upon the wife's generosity. It was further held that the desire that she should will the property was subject to the discretion of the wife. It was further held that the property was given to her absolutely. Toms v. Owen (C. C.) 52 Fed. 417.

And a provision: "I wish it, or whatever may be left at their death, to be divided equally among all those who are now my legal heirs,"—was held not to bind the legatee to preserve and return; but the legatee became absolute owner. Hudson's Succession, 19 La. Ann. 79. The court said: "To constitute a prohibited substitution, the donee must be charged to preserve and return the thing donated, to a third person. Civil Code, art. 1507. The motive of the law is that property should not be tied up and taken out of commerce, which would be the case if the donor had the right and power to direct to whom should go the donation after the death of the original donee, for the donor might do so ad infinitum."

And after an estate was devised by will, it provided: "At her decease what remains I wish to be equally divided between Jacob J. Brown and Nellie Washburn, children of my wife's sister." It was held that however strong the language of recommendation or request might be, a trust would not be implied, if such construction of the words was repugnant to, or inconsistent with, other parts of the will. Taylor v. Brown, 88 Me. 56, 33 Atl. 664.

The will said: "I do intrust my dear child to his care and guardianship, knowing his tenderness and sound judgment will insure the well-being of my child, so far as lies in his father's power; and it is my wish that my dear husband shall so arrange his affairs that, at his death, whatever may remain of the said rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, shall go to my son, if he be then living, or if he be not living, to his issue." It was held that the wish expressed was merely words of solicitation, and not meant to control the husband's discretion in the disposition of the property. Nunn v. O'Brien, 83 Md. 198, 34 Atl. 244.

And the clause: "I express the wish that my children shall continue to live together as they now do, and use the income of my property for their support until the expiration of said ten years from my death,"—was held not to create a precatory trust. Clark v. Clark, 99 Md. 356, 58 Atl. 24. The court said: "In the case now before us the words employed in making the gift of the residue of her estate to her children clearly point to an absolute enjoyment of that residue by the donees themselves, and therefore the subsequent precatory words used by the testatrix should be construed as merely expressive of her wishes as to the manner in which the children should enjoy the legal estate in the property, and not as intended to create a trust."

Under a devise of property to the wife on condition "that on the marriage of my daughter Catherine to William Gray, Jr., I gave her by deed through him, two acres of land, considered as good as any I had, and that I wish at the death of my wife Catherine that she should make an equal division of her estate to such children as shall survive her, or their representatives, and out of the portion that shall come to Catherine to deduct the value of two acres, at as high a valuation as any there is, and to let the amount be absorbed in the whole amount to be divided, and to place all the parts in trust for them, as many as there shall be; this of course is not to interfere with that part of her estate already in trust,"—it was held that the children were given no legal or equitable estate, and that the first clause of the will gave the wife an estate in fee, and that the succeeding clause was only recommendatory, and not imperative. Sears v. Cunningham, 122 Mass. 538.

And the following clause: "Wishing to contribute my mite towards suppressing the Rebellion and restoring the Union, I give and devise the rest and residue of my estate, after paying the donation and providing for the payment of the annuities aforesaid, to the United States of America,"—was held merely to express the motive of the testator, and in no way defined or limited the purposes to which the property should be applied by the devisee. Dickson v. United States, 125 Mass. 311, 28 Am. Rep. 230.

The will provided: "I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Margaret, all my estate, real and personal, wheresoever situate, for her use and enjoyment during the term of her natural life, and after her death it is my wish, unless she shall have earlier divided the same or disposed of it by will, that the same shall be equally divided among my children, part and part alike. Provided, however, that it is my wish that any essential advance made by me to any one or more of my children in my lifetime should be first deducted from the share of the child having such advance. It is my wish that my wife should sell and dispose in her lifetime of just so much of the real estate that I may die seized of as may be necessary to pay debts and to raise the necessary means on which she and my children, who may choose to make a home with her, may economically and plainly live and no more, though that is a matter of discretion with her and my children, who, I hope, will seriously and carefully advise." It was held to give absolute title to the devisee, and not to create a trust. Hoxsey v. Hoxsey, 37 N. J. Eq. 21. The court said: "Though he adds that the gift is for her use and enjoyment during her life, and that it is his wish that after her death, unless she should have divided or disposed of the property by will, it shall be equally divided among his children. That is not intended as a limitation of her estate to a life interest, with a gift in remainder to the children."

A will provided: "It being my wish that said trustees will be guided, in the distribution of such income, by the officers of the Ladies' Sewing Society connected with said church, preferring benevolent to ordinary church expenses, hoping such use will compensate for the burden of this trust." It was held a bequest to the corporation, and the wish of the testatrix would be treated as merely precatory, as the testatrix previously had indicated her intention that the church should have the property absolutely for its uses and purposes. First Presby. Church v. McKallor, 35 App. Div. 98, 54 N. Y. Supp. 740.

Construing a provision: "To use it for the benefit of himself and my other hereinbefore named children," which included the respondent, "in such proportions and at such times and in such manner as he . . . shall in his judgment and discretion deem proper, right and advisable, . . . in . . . full confidence in the ability, integrity and sense of justice and fairness of my said son, and in his love for me and regard for my wishes,"—it was held that these precatory words did not impose any legal duty or trust upon the son. Re Steiner, 134 App. Div. 162, 118 N. Y. Supp. 833.

The court said: "The language of the will in Re Conner, 6 App. Div. 594, 39 N. Y. Supp. 900, is different. There the direction was to 'distribute and apportion' among wife and children, and only the manner and time were left to the judgment of the executors, and not the proportion that should be given to each."

The will provided: "My wish is, that after the sale of my real estate by my wife, Margaret aforesaid, without charging my said real estate, that she will, if she has a sufficient sum of money to do so, to give to my daughter Mary's children as follows." "My further request is that at the death of my wife Margaret aforesaid, that she will so divide what she may have among our daughters, Martha and Eliza's children, share and share alike." It was held that no subsequent language in the will converted into a trust the property which had previously been devised to her absolutely in fee. Hopkins v. Glunt, 111 Pa. 287, 2 Atl. 183. The court said: "Expressions of a desire or a wish of the testator as to a specific disposition of his property, standing by themselves alone, may constitute a valid devise or bequest thereof. The rule is different when such expressions are used after an absolute disposition of the property has been made. After an unqualified 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

devise by the testator of his property, no precatory words to his devisee can defeat the estate previously granted." This case was distinguished in Bellas's Estate, 176 Pa. 122, 34 Atl. 1003.

After a devise and bequest to friends "in fee simple, absolutely and forever," testator continued: "It is my wish that my said friends shall hold the property thus devised to them free from all trust whatever. Nevertheless, I have devised and bequeathed the same to them, in the confident expectation and hope that they will permit my children by Sally Bryson, to wit." By a previous clause the testator had given to these four children one fourth of his whole estate. South Carolina act of 1795 declared void any gift or provision beyond one fourth of a man's estate in favor of a woman with whom he lives in adultery, or of his illegitimate child or children, he having a wife or lawful children of his own living. It was held that this gift was rendered void by the act only to the extent of the excess. Bouknight v. Brown, 16 S. C. 167.

A will provided: "And it is my wish that the said Mary shall at such times as she shall deem it advisable, and after using all the property she may wish for her own comfort and support, provide for the distribution of all my property to our children in a manner that shall be just and equal between them, having regard to such as may have received property from my property, and other circumstances which should have an influence in the distribution of the property which I shall have at my decease." It was held that the trust was rather a recommendation than a direct trust. Van Amee v. Jackson, 35 Vt. 173. In this case it was said there is no doubt that precatory words used by a testator in his will, or words expressing hope, desire, or request, may amount to an imperative direction, creating a trust or beneficial interest in favor of the object of the trust; but in giving a construction to precatory words in a devise, a court of equity will look at the circumstances existing at the date of the will, and, if necessary, will construe words importing a trust as mere expressions of recommendation or confidence.

Testator provided: "I wish you to take the negroes to Penn's, where they will be free." It was held that the assent of the administrator with the will annexed was necessary in a suit for freedom, in order to maintain this action. Reid v. Blackstone, 14 Gratt. 363. The court said: "The devise of the testator's whole estate, including negroes, is to his nephew, John Reid; and whether it be to him in his own right, or as trustee in whole or in part, he alone can maintain an action at law for the estate, or any part of it. He is entitled to receive the whole estate, or so much of it as may remain after the payment of debts and expenses of administration."

A provision: "If my executors find there will be sufficient funds, I would wish a public dispensary, as in New York, on a similar plan, for indigent persons, both sick and lame, to be attended by a physician elected to the establishment, at their own homes, and also daily at the dispensary,"—was held to be void as uncertain in amount, and on other grounds. Beekman v. Bonsor, 23 N. Y. 298, 80 Am. Dec. 269.

Wish and desire.

Where the will provided: "Shall remain and continue to live together as one family, of which my mother shall be the head; and that my said mother and my said four sisters shall continue to occupy the house now occupied by them, and make it a home for herself and my said sisters. But this clause of my will is not to be considered or treated as a direction or instruction; but, simply as a suggestion of my wish and desire,"—it was held that the concluding clause forbade the implication of any trust. Wood v. Seward, 4 Redf. 271. The court said: "Precatory words will not create a trust, where, either by a consideration of all of the provisions of the will, or by the express words of the testator, it appears that the recommendation was not intended to be obligatory."

Testator said: "It is my wish and desire, in case my sister Mimy die without issue, that she shall will and devise all my negroes to be free, or manumit them in any other way she may think proper; this request I hope she will comply with in time, so as to carry my wish into effect." It was held that the legatee had a discretion, and as she did not manumit the slaves, the court would not set them free. Chase v. Plummer, 17 Md. 165.

Where a previous clause gave the property absolutely and without restrictions, a provision that I "wish my beloved wife and daughters to receive an income from all my real and personal estate during their natural lives after they have got their portions. . . . It is my desire that my property of whatever kind should, after the decease of my wife and daughters, descend to the children of my daughters respectively if they are married,"—was held not to create a trust, as it should appear that the words used were intended to be imperative, and a trust would not be imposed upon mere words of recommendation and confidence. Barrett v. Marsh, 126 Mass. 213.

The will provided: "It is my wish and desire that if my wife has received from my daughter and her family the affection and respect, to which she is entitled, that she then will appoint said share of said trust estate to my daughter and her children, in such way, and manner, and in such proportions, as to her may seem best." It was held that the words, "wish and desire," did not constitute a trust, but were merely an expression of hope on the part of the testator. Holmes v. Dalley, 192 Mass. 451, 78 N. E. 513.

A provision: "It is my wish and desire that my said wife shall pay the sum of three hundred dollars a year to my sister-in-law," was held only the expression of a wish, and the whole matter rested in the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

discretion of the wife. The will gave the property absolutely to the wife. Post v. Moore, 181 N. Y. 15, 106 Am. St. Rep. 495, 73 N. E. 482, 2 Ann. Cas. 591.

And a provision that "it is my wish and desire that my said wife Elizabeth Hamilton will leave at the time of her death the property thus left to her by me, or any part that may be then remaining in her hand, for the benefit of young men that are unable to educate themselves,"—was held not to limit a fee previously given. Second Reformed Presby. Church v. Distrow, 52 Pa. 219. It was held that the precatory words in which he expressed his desires did not create a trust, but strengthened the conclusion that an absolute interest was vested in the wife.

A provision that "it is my wish and desire that my said daughter shall consult fully and freely with her brothers in relation to the investment and management of the ten thousand dollars in money bequeathed by me to her; and further that she shall not consume any part of the principal thereof, but preserve the same undiminished, and that at her death the said principal sum shall go to the persons entitled under this my will to the real estate herein devised to her for life,"—was held to be a mere expression of a wish, and did not cut down, by positive direction, the absolute interest which the testator had already granted. Heck's Estate, 170 Pa. 232, 32 Atl. 413.

But the presumption that "wish and desire" are precatory merely in wills, and not mandatory, is held not to arise when the words are used to express the intention and will of the testator; in such cases they are held to be mandatory.

So where a will gave a friend the entire estate, "having the utmost confidence in my long tried friend, William Fraley, that he will entirely carry out my wishes and desires, as they may be expressed by me, either verbally or in writing; and well knowing that my friend will, by this will, be able much more effectually to dispose of my estate, as I wish it done,"—it was held that a trust was created, and the legatee held only as trustee for the next of kin. Ingram v. Fraley, 29 Ga. 553. The testator having failed to declare the trust, the legatee did not take beneficially.

And a provision: "It is my wish and desire, that my grandson William Armstrong Cocke be brought up and educated at the cost and expense of my estate,"—was held to create an express trust, and to declare a charge upon the testator's estate. Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580. The court said: "The terms 'wish' and 'desire' must be construed as imposing a direct obligation upon the executors to make such expenditure, and to charge the estate with the expense."

Testator provided that I "wish and desire that my wife continue to provide for the care, comfort and education of Thomas Joseph Murphy, now aged nearly five years, who has been raised as a member of my family since his infancy, and to make suitable provision for him in case of her death, providing that he continue to be a dutiful child." It was held that the fact that the whole estate was bequeathed absolutely, and immediately before the precatory words were used, did not prevent the trust from attaching. Murphy v. Carlin, 113 Mo. 112, 35 Am. St. Rep. 699, 20 S. W. 786. This construction was from a consideration of the will, which had left $1,000 to another adopted child, and the testator certainly did not intend to leave this one dependent on the good will of his wife.

Under the laws of Georgia, a testator could not manumit his slaves by will. A testator made a will giving all his property to his nephew, and stating: "My house servant Adeline and her child Tolbert have been good, trusty, and faithful servants to me, it is my wish and desire that the said Adeline shall not be separated from her child Tolbert. . . . I wish him to treat them just as he may at all times think I would treat them if I were in life; this confidence I repose in him with the full assurance that it is not misplaced, and that it will not be abused." This slave Adeline was his mistress and her child was his, and the evidence showed that he wanted to manumit these slaves, and it was held that there was a secret trust in the provision for them of $20,000, and that as to this legacy there was no will; but that this did not affect the rest of the will. Cobb v. Battle, 34 Ga. 458.

Testator said: "But it is my wish and desire that he shall furnish a home, maintenance and care to and for my said father during life, should he need and require it." It was held that the devise was made in trust to furnish such maintenance as should be needed. Foster v. Willson, 68 N. H. 241, 73 Am. St. Rep. 581, 38 Atl. 1003. This was apparent from the intention of the testator as shown by the whole will, and because the subject-matter and object were clearly defined.

After a devise absolutely of all the testator's property, he said: "It is also my desire and wish, after my wife's death, that my house and lot, number 2,007 Fitzwater street, shall go to my daughter Mary." It was held that the testator intended to give to his wife a life estate only. Taylor v. Martin, 6 Sadler (Pa.) 125, 20 W. N. C. 27, 8 Atl. 920.

A will provided: "It is my earnest wish and desire that my executors, hereinafter named, shall take the custody and guardianship of all my minor children, and to them, under God, I commit them, requesting that, if their lives are spared they shall be well and thoroughly educated." It was held that it was the intention of the testator to provide for the support and education of his minor children. Alexander v. Thompson, 38 Tex. 533.

Wish, desire, and bequest.

A will provided: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Nancy, for her sole use and benefit, and for the rearing, nurture and education of my minor children. . . . And it is my wish, desire and bequest, that at her death all that remains of my said real and personal property, and its rents, issues, and increase, shall fall to and be owned by my said heirs David Russell, Archibald, and Susan, to be divided between them, and if possible by them share and share alike." It was held that only a life estate was given to the widow. Williams v. McKinney, 34 Kan. 514, 9 Pac. 265, distinguished in McNutt v. McComb, 61 Kan. 25, 58 Pac. 965. Wish, desire, and intention.

In the will the testatrix declared that in the event of her death the following was her "wish, desire, and intention." It was held that the use of the word "wish" in this connection had the same force as though the word "direct" had been used. Meehan v. Brennan, 16 App. Div. 395, 45 N. Y. Supp. 57.

Wish and request.

Testator provided: "It is my wish and request that my said wife shall, before the time of her death, make and execute her last will and testament, and therein give and bequeath the property herein given and bequeathed to her to my children therein-before named, share and share alike." It was held that the intention of the testator was that the wife should take the property absolutely. Street v. Gordon, 41 App. Div. 439, 58 N. Y. Supp. 860. This conclusion was had because of the emphasis on the request that she should make her will giving the property to the children equally.

Wish and will.

After making an absolute devise, testator continued: "It is my wish and will that the income from my said residuary estate shall be used to complete the present buildings and grounds and for the erection of such other buildings or building as will accommodate not less than two hundred additional inmates, and after that the income from my foregoing donation shall be devoted mainly to the care of the indigent insane in the most advisable manner at very low charges or absolutely free, as the trustees of said corporation in the exercise of their best judgment as to the rate to be charged may deem best and wisest to promote the object of this donation." This was held not to raise an imperative trust. Pratt v. Sheppard & E. P. Hospital, 88 Md. 610, 42 Atl. 51. The court said: "Had Mr. Pratt intended to give this residuum in trust, he could have used precisely the words he employed in the third clause, where he designed to found a trust. . . . There is not only no suggestion of a trust in the donating words, but the very scheme of the gift, and the particular method prescribed for the conveyance and transfer of the property by the executors to the beneficiary, forbid the inference that these deeds or transfers were to contain provisions fettering the estate with any trust whatever."

But in McRee v. Means, 34 Ala. 349, a devise to the husband, "his heirs and assigns forever, to his use, behoof, and benefit, in fee simple. But should my said husband die without issue of his body, it is my wish and will, he shall give all of said property to Robert P. Means,"—was held to create a trust, as the use of the word "will" was held to be the antithesis of words of recommendation and request, and the use of the word "wish," was held to import an obligatory direction by the testatrix. Would like.

A provision: "I would like these sums to be given to any society that assist poor needlewomen (seamstresses) whose toil is so poorly requited. If no such organization exists the money to be divided for the benefit of incapacitated sailors and their families,"—was held to be a trust for charitable uses, the object of it being the assistance of poor needlewomen, and this could be accomplished through the medium of any incorporated society having that kind of work. Manley v. Fiske, 139 App. Div. 665, 124 N. Y. Supp. 149, modified in 66 Misc. 388, 123 N. Y. Supp. 129.

The will provided: "I would rather prefer not to have a division made of my estate until the youngest child of Henrietta arrives at the age of twenty-one years." It was held that these words in the form of a wish were imperative, and did not mean that the distribution was to take effect at the death of the testator. McCartney v. Osburn, 118 Ill. 403, 9 N. E. 210.

II. English cases.

The rule was that courts would seize upon any precatory words in order to fasten a trust upon the property devised. This was carried to such an extreme that the courts really made the will for the testator. This doctrine has been repudiated, and the courts there now lean the other way. They will sustain a precatory trust, but it must be clear. It may be very safe in general, to say that when there is uncertainty as to the subject-matter, or as to the objects in whose favor the request or hope or recommendation is expressed, precatory words cannot have been intended to be absolutely binding. But the converse of the proposition is by no means equally true. The subject-matter of the bequest, and the objects of the testator's bounty, may be perfectly ascertained, and yet the context may show that words of hope or request or recommendation were not intended to interfere with the absolute discretion of the legatee. It is well said that no two wills are alike. In determining the intention of the testator, the whole will is examined, and it is generally now held that where an absolute estate is given to the legatee, it will not be cut down by precatory words unless such a construction is clearly required by the whole will, and the subject and object of the trust are well defined and certain.

"I hope none of my children will accuse me of partiality in having left the largest share of my property to my two eldest daughters, my sole motive for which was to enable them to keep house so long as they remain single; but in case of their marrying, I have divided it amongst all my children. If they die single, of course they will leave what they have amongst their brothers and sisters, or their children,"—was held not to create a trust. Lechmere v. Lavie, 2 Myl. & K. 197. This was on the ground that the words were too vague to be construed equivalent to a testamentary disposition, and amounted to no more than an expression that the daughters would be prompted by natural affection to leave their property to their nearest relations, as to which the daughters had exercised their discretion. Advice.

The use of this word was held to create a trust, and the devisee took only a life estate, where testator appointed "Thomas sole executor of this my will, and, after my death, do advise him to settle it upon himself, and his issue male." Parker v. Bolton, 5 L. J. Ch. N. S. 98.

Assurance and confidence.

These words were held not to create a precatory trust, except in a case where such phrase was directed towards a defined disposition of the property. No trust exists where action is discretionary.

Testator made a certain disposition of his property, "being well assured she would, at her decease, dispose of the lands amongst all or such of his children as she, in her discretion, should think most proper, and as they by their conduct, should deserve." It was held that under the word "such" the devisee had full power to devise the whole to a daughter. Macey v. Shurmer, 1 Atk. 389.

The property was devised "absolutely and forever, in the full assurance and confident hope that she would bring up his children in the fear of God, and educate and provide for them, the same as it would have been his intention." It was held that the trusts were too obscure to be effective, and that the widow took absolutely. Macnab v. Whitbread, 17 Beav. 299.

The property was "to go to my dear wife, being well assured that she will husband the means that may be left to her by me with every prudence and care, for the sake of herself and any children that I may leave by her." It was held that these words amounted to no more than advice, and did not constitute a trust. Scott v. Key, 11 Jur. N. S. 819.

But a devise "to and for her own sole use and benefit forever, feeling assured and having every confidence that she will hereafter dispose of the same fairly, justly and equitably amongst my two daughters and their children,"—was held to be a precatory trust. The widow was entitled to the property for her life, and on her death the property would go to her daughter and their children, as she should appoint. Gully v. Cregoe, 24 Beav. 185.

This word creates a trust where there is suggested apportionment, but not where the apportionment is to be made by will, as this indicates a fee in the legatee.

The will said certain property "I leave to my sister, and I beg she will apportion between the above-named Susan Corbet, Anne, Mary, and Theresa Corbet; and as my nephew John Corbet has a less secure position in life than his brothers, to him such portion or portions as she shall see fit. I would also wish that she should have power to give some small amounts for charity, especially to Daniel Laffin's family, etc. These are my desires on these matters, should death overtake me on the journey." It was held that there was a trust, and the testator's sister took the property as trustee for the individuals and purposes named. Corbet v. Corbet, 7 Ir. Eq. Rep. 456. This was on the ground that the subject-matter was certain, that the objects were clearly ascertained, except as to the charity for Laffin's family.

But where the will provided: "I beg and request that at her death she will give and bequeath the same in such shares as she shall think proper unto such members of her own family as she shall think most deserving of the same," it was held that as to this property there was no trust, but that the wife took absolutely. Green v. Marsden, 1 Drew. 646. This was on the ground that the precatory clause imported that the widow was to devise, which she could not do if she had not a fee in the whole.

This word creates a trust as applied to a directed disposition.

A devise "in the full belief that she would so dispose thereof by deed, will, or otherwise, that at her decease the whole might be equally divided between his children, share and share alike," was held to create a precatory trust in favor of the children. Fordham v. Speight, 23 Week. Rep. 782.

Confidence.

The latest and highest authority in England has held that "in full confidence" imposes no trust. This settles in a measure the fluctuating decisions. The modern tendency in that country now is not to work out a trust, if the testator has not done so. The current of modern authority goes to show that such words are to be construed in accordance with the intention of the testator not to create a trust, where he simply expressed his confidence that his wife would do that which, according to her own judgment, unfettered and uncontrolled, would be for the benefit of her children.

A will provided: "I seriously and warmly entreat my said wife at her decease to settle and assure. . . . In full confidence, and with the firmest persuasion, that in her future disposition and distribution thereof, she will distinguish the heirs of my late father, by devising and bequeathing the whole of my said estate, together and entire, to such of my said father's heirs as she may think best deserves her preference." It was held that by the latter clause no trust was raised for the heirs for the testator's father. Heneage v. Andover, 10 Price, 230. Richards, L. C. B., said: "I shall only observe for a moment that the words 'I seriously and warmly entreat,' etc., in the clause respecting Miss Pigott, though very amply sufficient to raise a trust in a proper place, are used by this testator where, if my construction is right, they were not to imply a trust; and this consideration may be applied to other words of the like import, unless the accompanying words in the clause where they occur prove the intention to create a trust."

Where the clause in dispute was, "to be disposed of by him, as to him may appear just, having every confidence he will act fairly and in accordance with my wishes," it was held that there was no precatory trust. Creagh v. Murphy, 7 Ir. Eq. Rep. 182.

And a devise "to and for her own use and benefit, absolutely, having full confidence in her sufficient and judicious provision for my dear children," was held not to be a precatory trust, as the subject-matter should be certain, and the objects to take clearly defined. Fox v. Fox, 27 Beav. 301.

Under a gift to one of "the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely, in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself, and that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit; and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament, I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be equally divided among the surviving said nieces,"—it was held that the widow took the property absolutely, and that no trust was created in favor of the nieces. Re Hambury [1904] 1 Ch. 415. Kekewich, J., said: "When you 'confide' in persons, you trust them, not trusting them in the technical sense of making them trustees, but leaving to them the power to do what you wish them to do, and being sure that they will fulfil those wishes. The idea of trust in the legal sense is entirely out of the question."

Under a devise "to my dear wife, Hannah Roe, absolutely, with full power for her to dispose of the same as she may think fit for the benefit of my family, having full confidence that she will do so." It was held that the wife took absolutely, as the words were merely an expression of the testator's wishes and belief, as distinguished from a direction amounting to an obligation. Re Hutchinson, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 540, followed in Re Adams, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 199, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 768, 48 L. T. N. S. 958, 32 Week. Rep. 120.

Where the devise was "unto my said dear wife (and which she must acknowledge not to be inconsiderable) unfettered and unlimited, in full confidence, and with the firmest persuasion that, in her future disposition and distribution thereof, she will distinguish the heirs of my late father, by devising and bequeathing the whole of my said estate, together and entire, to such of my said father's heirs as she may think best deserves her preference,"—it was held that no trust was created. Meredith v. Heneage, 1 Sim. 542. This was on the ground that the testator boasted that he had given a benefit unfettered and unlimited. The Lord Chief Baron said: "In this case the words 'unfettered and unlimited,' which are used by the testator to show his opinion of the extent to which he had devised, are certainly as strong to manifest an intention to convey the absolute dominion to the party, as if words had been used more directly authorizing her to spend it, or to deal with it as she pleased."

Where the devise was "to my dearly beloved wife, Mary Anne Raynor, the whole of my property, both real and personal . . . feeling confident that she will act justly to our children in dividing the same when no longer required by her," it was held that the widow took an absolute title, and that there was no precatory trust. Mussoorie Bank v. Raynor, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 321. Sir Arthur Hobhouse said: "No case has been cited, and probably no case could be cited, in which the doctrine of precatory trusts has been held to prevail when the property said to be given over is only given when no longer required by the first taker. Now these rules are clear with respect to the doctrine of precatory trusts, that the words of gift used by the testator must be such that the court finds them to be imperative on the first taker of the property, and that the subject of the gift over must be well defined and certain. If there is uncertainty as to the amount or nature of the property that is given over, two difficulties at once arise. There is not only difficulty in the execution of the trust because the court does not know upon what property to lay its hands, but the uncertainty in the subject of the gift has a reflex action upon the previous words, and throws doubt upon the intention of the testator, and seems to show that he could not possibly have intended his words of confidence, hope, or whatever they may be,—his appeal to the conscience of the first taker,—to be imperative."

A provision: "As I have full confidence in him, that if he should die without lawful issue he will, after providing for his widow during her life, leave the bulk of my said residuary estate unto the said,"—was held not to create a precatory trust, as the subject of the confidence was not sufficiently certain. Palmer v. Simmonds, 2 Drew. 221. The use of the word "bulk" was held indefinite, and not to show a definite, clear, certain part of the estate, or the whole of it. This case was distinguished in Shovelton v. Shovelton, 32 Beav. 143.

So under a devise "to my dearly beloved wife, Lydia Greene, well knowing her sense of justice and love to her family, and feeling perfect confidence that she will manage same to the best advantage for the benefit of her children," it was held there was no precatory trust for the benefit of the children. Greene v. Greene, 3 Ir. Eq. Rep. 90.

A clause in the first codicil of the will provided: "In confidence that they will distribute and dispose of the same as I may, by memorandum or otherwise, direct or request," and in the second codicil: "I am sure that my executors will do according to what they consider right and what is customary. . . . These wishes written by myself, and only concern the interest of my executors, will I feel sure, be quite sufficient for them to fulfill all herein named but will perhaps be more correct if I sign my name in the presence of two witnesses." It was held that, assuming that the first codicil would have no effect on the will, the second codicil explained that, in using the words "in confidence," the testatrix meant a confidence which she felt in the legatees, irrespective of the power of any tribunal to compel the fulfillment of her wishes, and it was held that the entire residue was bequeathed to the executors for their own benefit. Shepherd v. Nottidge, 2 Johns. & H. 766.

A will gave property "to the absolute use of my dear wife Harriett Smith her heirs executors administrators and assigns in full confidence that she will do what is right as to the disposal thereof between my children either in her lifetime or by her will after her decease." It was held that the widow was entitled to an estate for life, and the children had no present interest, and the court would not make a declaration of their future rights. Smith v. Gibson, 20 Week. Rep. 88.

In Wright v. Atkins, Turn. & R. 143, property was devised to a Mrs. Atkins in fee, in confidence that she would leave it by will to the testator's "family." Sir William Grant (17 Ves. Jr. 255) and Lord Eldon (19 Ves. Jr. 299) held that "family" meant heir at law, and that Mrs. Atkins took only an estate for life. It followed from this that she was not entitled to commit waste. The House of Lords reversed this decision (see note in 17 Ves. Jr. 263) and held that Mrs. Atkins took an estate in fee, and could not be restrained from committing waste. The injunction which had been granted pending the appeal (1 Ves. & B. 313) was, of course, dissolved. The case came again before Lord Eldon upon an application to restrain Mrs. Atkins from applying the proceeds of the sale of any timber she might cut to her own use. Turn. & R. 143. Lord Eldon there stated that on reconsideration he had no doubt that the House of Lords was right in deciding that Mrs. Atkins took an estate in fee, and not for life (Turn. & R. 154); but he nevertheless directed that the proceeds of any timber cut by her should be preserved until it could be decided to whom they would belong on Mrs. Atkyns's death. She again appealed from this decision to the House of Lords; and the House of Lords reversed it, and held her entitled to those proceeds for her own benefit. This case was followed in Re Williams [1897] 2 Ch. 12, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 485, 76 L. T. N. S. 600, 45 Week. Rep. 519.

A gift "to the absolute use of my wife Harriet Smith, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, in full confidence that she will do what is right as to the disposal thereof between my children, either in her lifetime, or by will after her decease," was held to give the widow an absolute interest in the property, and there was no trust in favor of the children. Re Adams, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 199, following Lambe v. Eames, L. R. 6 Ch. 597, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 447, 25 L. T. N. S. 175, 19 Week. Rep. 659, 25 Eng. Rul. Cas. 471.

The will provided: "And I bequeath the said proceeds to the said John Browne and Lankester Webb, their executors, administrators, and assigns, in the full confidence that they will carry out my wishes in respect thereof." It was held that parol evidence of a conversation in which the testator told a witness that he had given his wishes to the legatee was inadmissible. There was no suggestion that the testator's wishes were communicated to the legatees. Re Downing, 60 L. T. N. S. 140.

But some cases, especially in the lower courts, have held the opposite view. They are not now regarded of much weight.

The will in Curnick v. Tucker, L. R. 17 Eq. 320, gave property "for her sole use and benefit, in the full confidence that she will so dispose of it amongst all our children, both during her lifetime and at her decease, doing equal justice to each and all of them." It was held that there was a gift to the widow for life, with a trust imposed on the property in favor of the children, with the power of disposition between or amongst them as she might think best. This case was disapproved in Re Adams, L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 199, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 758, 48 L. T. N. S. 958, 32 Week. Rep. 120.

And the clause, "confiding in her, my said daughter, that she will not (by the said instrument) alienate or transfer my said estate from my nearest family,"—was held to impose a trust on Mary Evan in favor of the testator's heir at law, where she died without issue, as this was construed to be the meaning of the words "my nearest family." Griffiths v. Evan, 11 L. J. Ch. N. S. 219.

A will gave property to testator's wife "for her sole use and benefit, in the full confidence that she will so bestow it on her decease to my children in a just, true, and equitable spirit, and in such manner and way as she feels would meet with my full approval." It was held that the widow took the property only for life, with the power of bestowing or appointing it amongst the children, and all that was necessary to be decided now was what interest the children had. Le Marchant v. Le Mar- 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

chant, L. R. 18 Eq. 414, distinguished in Parnall v. Parnall, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 96, 26 Week. Rep. 851, 25 Moak, Eng. Rep. 801, and disregarded in Re Adams, supra.

The clause, "to and for her own absolute use and benefit, in the fullest confidence that she will dispose of the same for the benefit of her children," was held to create a precatory trust in Shovelton v. Shovelton, 32 Beav. 143, distinguished in Greene v. Greene, 3 Ir. Eq. Rep. 90, 629, 17 Week. Rep. 487.

Re Hutchinson, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 540, 39 L. T. N. S. 86, 26 Week. Rep. 904, followed Lambe v. Eames, L. R. 6 Ch. 597, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 447, 25 L. T. N. S. 175, 19 Week. Rep. 659, 25 Eng. Rul. Cas. 471, in preference to Shovelton v. Shovelton, 32 Beav. 143, 1 New Reports, 228; Curnick v. Tucker, L. R. 17 Eq. 320; Le Marchant v. Le Marchant, L. R. 18 Eq. 414, 22 Week. Rep. 839; and Pigg v. Clarke, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 672, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 849, 24 Week. Rep. 1014.

After devising property to his wife, testator continued: "Entertaining as I do the most entire and implicit confidence that my said dear wife will during her life appropriate the same . . . and that she will bequeath so much and such part of my said estate and property hereby devised to her, as may be by her judicious management preserved for our family, unto and equally between and amongst all and every our dear child and children." It was held that the widow did not take the property absolutely. Smith v. Smith, 2 Jur. N. S. 967. This was on the ground that there was certainty of the gift and object, and that the words did not give a discretion to the widow to defeat it, but pointed out an increase of the fund for the benefit of those who were to take subject to her management. The only question decided was that the widow did not take the property absolutely.

With respect to a devise, "in full confidence that she, my said wife, will in every respect appropriate and apply the same unto and for the benefit of all my children," it was held that the widow took a life estate, with the power of appointment among all the children. Ware v. Mallard, 16 Jur. 492.

Property was devised with the statement: "Having a perfect confidence she will act up to those views which I have communicated to her in the ultimate disposal of my property after her decease." After the death of the testator, a bill was filed by two natural children, claiming that the widow had been previously instructed to give the whole of the property after her death to them. It was held that if this had been proved, it would have been a trust. Podmore v. Gunning, 7 Sim. 644.

Conjuncture. Where a will provided: "I nevertheless earnestly conjure her, under the advice of my executors, to proceed, forthwith, to make ample provisions, by deed or will, for our only child and granddaughter. . . . All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estates and affects, I give unto my said dear wife,"—it was held that no trust was created by the will. Winch v. Brutton, 14 Sim. 379. This was on the ground that the last clause showed that the intention of the testator was to give everything to his wife.

Concoction.

Where property was devised "under the firm conviction that she will dispose of and manage the same for the benefit of our children," it was held that the wife took the property as trustee for the benefit of the children. Barnes v. Grant, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 92, 2 Jur. N. S. 1127, distinguished, in Greene v. Greene, 3 Ir. Eq. Rep. 90, 629, 17 Week. Rep. 487.

Desire.

Where testator said: "It is my desire that she allows to my relative and companion, Anne Gregory, now residing with me, an annuity of £25 during her life, and that the said Anne Gregory shall if she desire it have the use of such portions of my household furniture, lien, etc., as may not be required by my daughter,"—it was held that there was no trust to pay the annuity, but only a request, and that was not binding in law. Re Diggles, L. R. 39 Ch. Div. 253. Bowen, L. J., said: "But just as uncertainty of the property and object are reasons for not construing the will as creating a trust, so also the fact that a trust would cause embarrassment and difficulty is a reason for coming to the same conclusion."

With respect to the portions of wills set out, the following rulings were made: "I desire that, out of the residue of my property, my said executor will pay, or cause to be paid, to the aforesaid Caroline Anne Horde, over and above her said legacy, the sum of £180 annually during the term of her natural life, to be by her distributed in charity according to her own discretion and judgment, either to private individuals or public institutions, in such sum or sums, way and manner, as she shall from time to time choose, without limitation or control from any person whomsoever." It was held that the distribution of the charitable bequest was left to the absolute discretion of the legatee. Horde v. Suffolk, 2 Myl. & K. 59.

"Desiring her to provide for my daughter Anne out of the same, as long as she my said wife shall live, and at her decease to dispose of what shall be left among my children in such manner, as she shall judge most proper." It was held that there was no absolute trust for the children. Pushman v. Filliter, 3 Ves. Jr. 7. Arden, M. R., said: "According to what the lord chancellor in Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. Jr. 333, says of Cunliffe v. Cunliffe, 2 Ambl. 686, if the mother could spend it, there is no trust; otherwise, if she could not; therefore Cunliffe v. Cunliffe is an authority for this decision."

"In trust for such of my nieces, Martha Paulton and Ursula Mellor Taylor as shall be living at my death, my desire being that they shall distribute such residue as they think will be most agreeable to my wishes." It was held the legatees took the residue for their own benefit. Stead v. Mellor, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 225.

"It is my absolute desire, that my sister Mrs. Bridget Cruwys, which I have made my only executrix, bequeaths at her own death to those of her own family what she has in her own power to dispose of, that was mine, provided they behave well to her with decency and affection." The legatee made a will declaring that she made no disposition of her sister's property. It was held a trust for the next of kin of the last testatrix. Cruwys v. Colman, 9 Ves. Jr. 319.

But "desire" has been held mandatory in some cases, as follows:

Although property was given to testator's wife, yet it was his desire that if his children conducted themselves to her approbation, she would leave such property equally amongst all his children. It was held that this amounted to a trust in favor of the testator's children, and the class of the children to take were those who were living at the death of the widow. Bonser v. Kinnear, 6 Jur. N. S. 882, 2 Giff. 195.

The will provided: "It is my desire that my sons and daughters shall meet at the last place of my residence to compound and agree together and with each other for the division of my said goods and chattels, lands and tenements, by me given and bequeathed to them." It was held that the words, "it is my wish," were equivalent to "I will." Moross v. McAllister, 26 U. C. Q. B. 368.

A testator desired in his will that his executor should give the plaintiff £200. It was held to be a good legacy. Brest v. Offley, 1 Ch. Rep. 246.

Testator gave certain property to his wife, "but did desire her at or before her death, to give such leases, house, furniture, goods and chattels, plate and jewels, unto and amongst such of his own relations, as she should think most deserving and approve of." She, by her will, gave her interest in the house to one, and the residue of her personal estate to others, but did not give the goods or jewels to her husband's relations. It was held that the "desire" was mandatory, and that the residue undisposed of would go to his next of kin. Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. 469, note.

A daughter by parol desired her mother to give £180, if she saw fit, to plaintiff, who brought suit for the same; the defendant admitted the request, but said she did not think fit. It was held to be a trust for plaintiff. Jones v. Nabbs, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 404, pl. 3.

In Mason v. Limbury, cited in Vernon v. Vernon, 1 Ambl. 4, the provision: "I give to my brother Robert Mason £2,000, which I desire him at his death to give to his son and his children, and to the children of his late daughter, as he should think fit,"—was held mandatory.

Under a clause, "If there is money left unemployed I desire it may be given in charity," it was held that the residue was properly given to charity. Legge v. Asgill, Turn. & R. 266, note.

Entreat.

The following provision: "Convinced of the high sense of honor, the probity and affection of my son-in-law, Edward Clarke, I entreat him, should he not be blessed with Children by my Daughter, and survive, that he will leave at his decease to my Children and Grandchildren the share of my Property I have bestowed on her,"—was held to create a trust. Prevost v. Clarke, 2 Madd. Ch. 458.

Hope.

In Civil v. Rich, 1 Ch. Cas. 309, the lord chancellor said: "He also remembered a case . . . in Lord Egerton's time where one possessed of leases for years devised them to his wife, and hoped she would leave them his son, and died. Her second husband granted the leases away; the son sued to be relieved, but was dismissed, for it was no trust for the son."

A devise "to my dearly beloved husband Admiral Watts, hoping that he will leave it after his death to my son, W. C. Watts, if he is worthy of it,"—was held not to create a trust, as the words of confidence were weaker than in most cases, while the expression giving control to the object of the gift was extremely strong. Eaton v. Watts, L. R. 4 Eq. 151. In this case the court said: "In some of the cases there is an uncertainty as to the property given; in others, as in Meredith v. Henegage, 10 Price, 306, uncertainty as to the person, which was the view Lord Eldon took of that case. The court ought to look not only at the particular passage, but at other expressions in the will explanatory of the degree of interest or power or control given to the person who is the object of the gift. None of the authorities appear to me to be inconsistent with Lord Alvanley's view in Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. Jr. 333, where he says the test is, 'Can the object defeat the gift?'"

Where the provision was "I give to my brother John Harland forever, hoping he will continue them in the family," it was held that there was no precatory trust, as the words did not clearly demonstrate an object. Harland v. Trigg, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 142.

Knowing.

Testator gave property "unto his son Charles Bardswell, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to and for his and their own use and benefit, well knowing he would discharge the trust the testator reposed in him, by remembering his (the testator's) sons and daughters." It was held that no trust was created for the sons and daughters. Bardswell v. Bardswell, 9 Sim. 319. This was on the ground that the testator had given the property to his son absolutely, and had given a recommendation merely, of his other children, to the kindness of his son.

But in Briggs v. Penny, 3 Macn. & G. 546, the clause, "unto the said Sarah Penny of Great James Street, Bedford Row, her executors, administrators and assigns, well knowing that she will make a good use and dispose of it in a manner in accordance with my views and wishes," was held to create a trust, and the legatee could not take beneficially. This case was distinguished in Coman v. Harrison, 17 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 290; Stead v. Mellor, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 226, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 880, 36 L. T. N. S. 498, 25 Week. Rep. 508; and Irvine v. Sullivan, L. R. 8 Eq. 673, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 635, 17 Week. Rep. 1083.

May.

The testator by parol said: "You may, if you please, give 180l. to my niece; but I leave it entirely to you." It was held that the niece was entitled to the money. Nab v. Nab, 10 Mod. 404. The excuse of the daughter was that the niece had behaved so that she had resolved to give her nothing.

Not doubting.

The phrase, "not doubting but that she will dispose of what shall be left at her death to our two grandchildren," was held not sufficiently certain to raise a precatory trust. Wynne v. Hawkins, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 179.

But in Massey v. Sherman, 1 Ambl. 520, "Not doubting but that my wife will dispose of the same to and amongst my children as she shall please,"—was held to raise a trust.

Recommend.

In case his son Ellis should happen to depart this life without a son or sons born of his body in his lifetime, or in due time after his death, then and in such case testator recommended it to him to give and devise the said sugar houses and joint stock in trade there to his brother. This was held not to be a trust but a mere recommendation. Cunliffe v. Cunliffe, 2 Ambl. 686. This decision has been considered overruled by Pierson v. Garnet, 2 Bro. Ch. 43. See Pushman v. Filliter, 3 Ves. Jr. 9. But see Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. Jr. 533. Cunliffe v. Cunliffe was distinguished in Kirkbank v. Hudson, 7 Price, 212.

Pierson v. Garnet, 2 Bro. Ch. 38, purported to distinguish the case on the ground that the opinion rested upon Bland v. Bland, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 349, and Pynsent v. Pynsent, saying: "This latter is not found, but upon the note we have of Bland v. Bland, we may say that case was not like Cunliffe v. Cunliffe. Certainty of the property, though one of the *sine qua non*s, was wanting."

A will provided: "I, however, beg to recommend to the consideration of my dear wife, in the event of her surviving me and making a will, the propriety of securing by her will a portion of what she may dispose of to female relations. . . . But it is my express will and determination that this precautionary clause or power lastly provided for is not to do away with, or in the least deprive my said wife from exercising the entire right and will over my said property, should she be enabled to carry it into effect in the way I have before left it to her, or in any other most agreeable to herself." It was held that these words were merely precatory, and did not create a trust. This was on the ground that the words "most agreeable to herself" plainly showed that the desires and wishes which the testator before expressed were merely precarious. Huskiasson v. Bridge, 4 De G. & S. 245.

A provision: "And after her decease, as to 2,000*l.*, part of the said principal money, I give the same to be disposed by her will in such way as she shall think proper; but I recommend her to dispose of one half thereof, to her own relations, and the other half among such of my relations as she shall think proper,"—was held not to create a trust. Johnson v. Rowlands, 17 L. J. Ch. N. S. 438. Bruce, V. C., said: "That the word 'recommend' in a particular instrument may amount to a command, and create a binding trust, is certain. It is equally certain that the word is susceptible of a different interpretation, consistent with the legal and equitable power of the person recommended, to depart from the recommendation."

In Prec. in Ch. 201, note, it was said: "Le Maitre v. Bannister in Can. MSS. 26 November, 1770. The testatrix gave her fortune to Captain Roach, and if he should die without issue, she recommended it to him to do justice to A. and her children, if he should think them worthy of it; but if any unforeseen accident should make the whole, or any part, acceptable or serviceable to him, he might dispose of it, if he should think fit. It was held to be no trust."

Under a provision: "I earnestly recommend as part of this my last solemn will and testament, as follows: that if my grandson Frederick Solly Flood shall, during his future life, adopt and follow such line of conduct as shall merit her full approbation; my wish is," etc.,—it was held that these precatory words did not create a trust. Lefroy v. Flood, 4 Ir. Ch. Rep. 1. This was on the ground that there should be a complete withdrawal of discretionary power from the legatee, or there would be no trust created. Besides, the words "earnestly recommend" were strong, but the next expression, "wish," was weaker, and when testator mentioned the subject of the wish, the first property to which he referred was not under his control, and this indicated the meaning of the word "wish."

A provision, I "recommend to my sister to settle and convey or join with her husband in settling and conveying all my estates and property, which she may derive from me after my own decease, to the use of her two daughters," was held to be discretionary, 57 L.R.A. (N.S.) and not imperative. Meggison v. Moore, 2 Ves. Jr. 632.

And where the bequest was to such of the children of A. as his wife should by will direct: "Hereby expressly recommending to my said wife, in case my said daughters should have any more children, to provide in her Will for such child or children as may be hereafter born of my said two daughters, or either of them, so as to make as nearly equal with my present grandchildren as may be,"—it was held that the disposition by will in favor of the children living at the death of the widow was established against the claim of those born afterwards. Paul v. Compton, 8 Ves. Jr. 380. This was without any decision upon the word "recommendation." The lord chancellor said: "The cases upon words of commendation have, I take it, now settled this rule: Whether the terms are those of recommendation, or precatory, or expressing hope, or that the testator has no doubt, if the objects with regard to whom such terms are used are certain, and the subjects of property to be given are also certain, the words are considered imperative, and create a trust. But the questions are very different, whether the words of a will create a trust or a power. If the words are imperative, they do not create a power; but they execute themselves by the force of the terms."

So, under the sections of the wills set out the following rulings were made: "I strongly recommend her to execute a settlement of the said estate, and thereby to vest the same in trustees, to be chosen and approved of by her, for the use and benefit of herself and her assigns for her life; with remainder to her husband and his assigns for his life; with remainder to all and every the children she may happen to have, if more than one, share and share alike." It was held that the words of recommendation did not amount to a trust. Ex parte Payne, 2 Younge & C. Exch. 636.

"I leave to my dear wife aforesaid, recommending to her and not doubting, as she has no relations of her own family, but that she will consider my near relations, should she survive me, as I should consider them myself in case I should survive her." It was held there was no trust for the next of kin; that the widow took absolutely. Sale v. Moore, 1 Sim. 534. The vice chancellor said: "Supposing that the words in this case would create a trust, those words are coupled with some degree of uncertainty. Who are the objects of the trust? Did the testator mean relations at his own death, or at his wife's death? Did he mean that she should have the liberty of executing the trust the day after his death? Various other considerations might be introduced to show that the objects are uncertain. There is no ground for taking from the widow what the testator has not taken from her, but vested in her absolutely."

"Might be finally appropriated as she pleased, with the sum of £4,000 in money, but which sum he recommended her to divide in certain proportions." It was held that no trust was created by these words. White v. Briggs, 15 Sim. 33.

"To be used for her own and the children's benefit, as she shall in her judgment and conscience think fit, being convinced that it will be disposed of conscientiously and properly by her, for the purposes mentioned; at the same time recommending her not to diminish the principal, but to vest it in government or freehold securities." It was held that the wife took a life estate to use as she saw fit for herself and children. The court would not control her discretion, as it was not a trust for the children. Hart v. Tribe, 18 Beav. 215.

A devise was to Mary, who, "if she pleased, by will or assignment in her lifetime, might give that her estate to the children born of her body; and if she died without issue, it should be in her power to leave the same to whom she thought most deserving of it, recommending her to have a due regard to the aiding and assisting the relations and kindred of the testatrix's mother." Mary died and left the estate to her husband. It was held in a suit by other heirs that the recommendation was not mandatory. Randal v. Hearle, 1 Anstr. 124.

"And I do particularly recommend, desire, and direct my said wife, at her decease, by will or otherwise, to divide and dispose of what money or property she may have saved from the yearly income hereinbefore given to her, amongst all my children, in equal shares,"—was held too indefinite to constitute a trust for the children. Cowman v. Harrison, 17 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 290.

But in Cholmondeley v. Cholmondeley, 14 Sim. 590, under a provision: "I earnestly recommend her to take such measures as she may deem best for making it sure that, whatever she may inherit under this my will may go, at her decease, to her children; or, if she should not have any, then to the children of my dear sister Eliza,"—it was held that the children, at the mother's death, were entitled to the property. Vice chancellor said: "That it was quite clear that the plaintiffs, on the death of their mother, became entitled to the testatrix's residuary estate, as joint tenants, absolutely."

"I recommend to my said daughter and her said husband, that they do forthwith settle and assure the said sum of £10,000, together also with such sum of money of his own as the said William Ford shall choose, for the benefit of my said daughter Sarah Matilda, and her children." It was held that a trust was created. Ford v. Fowler, 3 Beav. 146. The court said: "The word 'recommend' as here employed is imperative, according to the authority of several cases; the subject of the recommendation, the disposition of which the testator had power to command, was the certain definite sum of £10,000, and the objects of the recommendation were the children of the daughter."

"Recommending it to such daughter to dispose of the same after her own death, and the determination of the several trusts 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) aforesaid, unto and among the children of my said daughter Anne Malim and my nephew John Lowe of Ferry Bridge; desiring, that his reputed daughter Emilia, though born before marriage, may be considered as one of his children." It was held that there was a trust under this recommendation. Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. Jr. 333. Arden, M. R., said: "If I was deciding upon the weight of the words, I rather think 'recommend' is stronger than 'desire.'"

This case was distinguished in Trench v. Hamilton [1895] 2 Ch. 370, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 799, 12 Reports, 355, 72 L. T. N. S. 748, 43 Week. Rep. 577.

"Recommending to them that the boys receive a classical education to fit them for the learned professions, and the girls to fit them for the purpose of teaching in respectable private families." It was held that these children were entitled as beneficial legatees. Presant v. Goodwin, 1 Swabey & T. 544. Sir C. Cresswell said, "By the words, 'all my remaining property,' it is manifest that the testator intended to deal in some manner with the whole of his residuary estate; he directs it to be placed in proper securities and appropriated to the education of his sister's children; not that a sufficient portion, or so much as his executors should think necessary, should be so appropriated, but 'all his remaining property.'"

"And I recommend that at a convenient time my money shall be collected together, and laid out in the purchase of a freehold messuage and tenement or lands which are freehold, to be a perpetual endowment for the two schools,"—was held to come within the statute of 9 Geo. II. chap. 38, providing that no manors, lands, etc., nor money to be laid out in lands,—be given for charitable uses unless by deed indented and executed before two witnesses, twelve months before the death of the donor; and such money and residue was held to belong to the next of kin. Kirkbank v. Hudson, 7 Price, 212.

Rely.

A gift was made: "To my wife and her heirs all my real and personal estate relying on her doing what is right." It was held that the words were too vague to create a trust; that the testator meant that the wife should dispose of the property as she saw fit. Re Crockford, 17 Week. Rep. 1004.

Where the provision was "to have, hold, and enjoy in the fullest and amplest manner for the term of her natural life, with full power to dispose of all the aforesaid property both real and personal, as she may judge best and wisest, relying with implicit confidence on her discretion, and well satisfied in my mind that she will make such distribution or disposal of it as will perfectly accord with my wishes on that subject, with all of which she is thoroughly acquainted,"—it was held that there was no precatory trust established by these words. Reid v. Atkinson, 5 Ir. Eq. Rep. 373, s. c. 5 Ir. Eq. Rep. 162. This was on the ground that the subsequent clause could not be used to abridge the operation of the words preceding it. The objects of the alleged trust were not defined. This case was distinguished in Corbet v. Corbet, 7 Ir. Eq. Rep. 456.

But in Horwood v. West, 1 Sim. & Stu. 387, John Powell bequeathed to his wife, "relying on her, that if she should thereafter intermarry, she would secure to herself whatever she should possess herself of by virtue of his will, so that the same should not be subject to the debts, etc.," of her husband; and he "thereby recommended his wife that she should, by her will, give and bequeath what she should die possessed of under his will, in the manner following." It was held that the latter part of the bequest might seem to allude only to what might be undisposed of at her death, but that that intention was negatived by the direction upon her marriage, which might happen at any time, to settle the whole, and it was held to be a trust for the parties named.

Request.

It has been frequently held that this has imposed a trust where the subject-matter was certain and the object was defined. The clauses of the wills involving the question, and the rulings made, were as follows:

"It is my request to him, that after reserving for his own absolute use and benefit the sum of £2,000, and applying all the interest, rents, and dividends arising from the above settled property to his own sole use and benefit during the term of his natural life, he will make such disposition of the remainder by will, deed, or settlement, as he may deem most desirable to carry out my wishes often expressed to him by word." It was held that as to the remainder a trust was intended. Bernard v. Minshull, 1 Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 276. This was on the ground that the testatrix never intended her husband to have any benefit from the appointment. While the whole of the £13,000 was appointed in the first instance to the husband absolutely, the testatrix did not use the words "for his own use and benefit," which she did in the subsequent part.

"I make no provision expressly for my dear daughter [the plaintiff] knowing that it is my dear wife's happiness, as well as mine, to see her comfortably provided for; but in case of death happening to my said wife, in that case, I hereby request my friends Stables and Hunter to take care of and manage to the best advantage for my lovely daughter Harriot Nowlan." It was held to give the widow the whole estate for life, with the remainder absolute to the daughter. Nowlan v. Nelligan, 1 Bro. Ch. 489. It was claimed in this case that the words were precatory, and raised a trust for the benefit of the daughter.

"To my wife, requesting her to will the same to our children as she shall think best." It was held that the words were not precatory, but were directory, and a devise by the widow to one child was held insufficient.

cient, as it should be divided amongst all the children. Finlay v. Fellows, 14 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 66.

"I request him to have the same, when paid out of the produce of the sale of the estate charged therewith, vested in good real security by mortgage, or in the purchase of real estates, and settled to the use of himself for his life, with remainder to his child or children, as he may appoint." As the devisee during life had elected to take under the will, it was held that the precatory words constituted a valid trust for the grandchildren. Moriarty v. Martin, 3 Ir. Ch. Rep. 26. This was on the ground that if the testator shows a desire that a thing should be done, unless there are plain words or necessary implication that he does not mean to take away the discretion, but intends to leave it to be defeated, the party should be considered as acting under a trust.

"To my brothers John and James, to be divided equally; with a request to John, that should he die without lawful issue, the property which I bequeath him shall revert back to my nephews." It was held that the words of request were imperative. Re O'Bierne, 1 Jones & L. 352.

"It is my dying request to the said Peter Pierson, that, if he shall die without leaving issue, living at his death, that the said Peter Pierson to dispose of what fortune he shall receive under this my will, to and among the descendants of my late aunt Anne Coppinger." It was held that the clause was imperative and created a trust. Pierson v. Garnet, 2 Bro. Ch. 38.

"I request my wife Ellen to pay to Philip Randeland, by whom it is admitted he intended this plaintiff, 'at her death, or should she sell the farm on which I now live before her death, four hundred dollars.'" It was held that this created a precatory trust. Renahan v. Malone, 1 N. B. Eq. Rep. 506. This was on the ground that the sentence containing the gift of the property for her use was immediately followed by that in which she was requested to pay. "A form of expression short of a positive direction, as strong as one could well select."

A bequest of heirlooms was made, "to my nephew, John Shelley, to go and be held as heir looms by him, and by his eldest son on his decease, and to go and descend to the eldest son of such eldest son, and so on, to the eldest son of his descendants, as far as the rules of law or equity will permit. And I request my said nephew to do all in his power, by his will or otherwise, to give effect to this my wish as to these things so directed to go as heirlooms as aforesaid." It was held to be a trust, as the objects of the trusts were certain, being a series of eldest sons. Shelley v. Shelley, L. R. 6 Eq. 540.

And where a marriage jointure had been made, but was deficient by reason of the rents falling, and testator "requested and earnestly recommended it to his son to make up the same £500 per annum he would add thereto," it was held to be mandatory and to raise a trust. Vernon v. Vernon, 1 Amb. 4. This was because the object and the property were certain.

But in Bland v. Bland, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 349, the clause was: "And it is my earnest request to my son Sir John Bland, that on failure of issue of his body, he will some time in his lifetime, either by will or any other writing, settle the said premises or so much thereof as he shall stand seised of at the time of his decease, so and in such manner as that on failure of issue of his body the same may come to my daughter." It was held that the words of the testatrix were not imperative, as there was no request to settle any of the land, but a power to dispose of during life; and only so much as he should stand seised of at his death, she requests he should settle.

"It is my request, should my Mother survive me, that she will leave £500 a piece to each of my Sister Jemima's three Daughters, and £1,000 to Alicia Blakeney's eldest Daughter; £500 to Mrs. E. Harvey; and the remainder of my property to my Sister Alicia Blakeney, to dispose of amongst her Children as she may think proper." It was held that Alicia Blakeney took no interest under this will. Blakeney v. Blakeney, 6 Sim. 52.

"Requesting that she will at her death leave £200 to each of the Miss Nortons, and leave the remainder of her Property to my Nephews, George and William Eade, in such proportions as she thinks proper." It was held that the legacies to the Miss Nortons were secured, but the testator's wife held the residue in exclusion of the nephews. Eade v. Eade, 5 Madd. Ch. 118. The vice chancellor said: "I cannot say that by the remainder of her property at her death, he meant the remainder of his property." This case was distinguished in Cowman v. Harrison, 17 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 290.

"Unto my said son John requesting him that if he should not find an opportunity to dispose of my freehold estate at Whitchurch greatly to his advantage and for the benefit of his family that the said estate should belong after him to his eldest son." It was held that no trust was created and that the son took the estate for his own benefit. House v. House, 23 Week. Rep. 22. Satisfied.

Under a will giving property "to my beloved wife Mary Reeves, her heirs and assigns, forever, being fully satisfied that, if it please God to take me first, she will dispose of the same, by will or otherwise, in a fair and equitable manner, to our united relatives," it was held that this was not a precatory trust. Reeves v. Baker, 18 Beav. 372. The court said: "The subject of the trust may be said to be certain, because it is the property given to the wife; but the objects are uncertain, and the course or manner in which they are to take is left in the most perfect state of obscurity."

Trusting.

This word was generally held not to impose a trust. But where the devisee took only a limited estate, and the objects and subjects were clearly defined, it was held to impose a trust. The provisions of the wills and the rulings thereon are as follows:

"Trusting that she will, in fear of God and in love to the Children committed to her care, make such use of it as shall be for her own and their spiritual and temporal good, remembering always, according to circumstances, the Church of God and the Poor." It was held that the wife took absolutely, as she could at her pleasure diminish the capital. Curtis v. Rippon, 5 Madd. Ch. 434.

"I hereby give and bequeath the same to Emblyn D'Arcy Irvine, widow, absolutely, trusting that she will carry out my wishes with regard to the same, with which she is fully acquainted." The testator before making the will had told the legatee what he wanted done and she made a memorandum. It was held that the legatee took the property subject only to the testator's wishes, which he had previously communicated to her, and as to the balance of the property she took it absolutely. Irvine v. Sullivan, L. R. 8 Eq. 673. The court said: "The testator does not merely direct that 'the money shall be paid by my said trustees to Mrs. Irvine,' but he directs that it shall be paid by the trustees to her, 'trusting that she will carry out my wishes.' Then he introduces emphatically the words, 'and I hereby give and bequeath the same to her absolutely.'" This case was approved in Re Williams [1897] 2 Ch. 12, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 485, 76 L. T. N. S. 600, 45 Week. Rep. 519.

"I trust to the liberality of my successors to reward any others of my old servants and tenants, according to their deserts; and to their justice, in continuing the estates in the male succession, according to the will of the founder of the family, my above-named grandfather Richard Knight,"—was held not to raise a trust and created no obligation. Knight v. Boughton, 11 Clark & F. 513, affirming Knight v. Knight, 3 Beav. 148. In this case the testator himself had suffered a recovery, and thereby converted the entail into a fee simple; besides the clause was not confined to his immediate successors, but was without limit. It was not clear to what property it referred. It might be confined to the estate which the grandson took from his grandfather, but this was not defined. Knight v. Knight was distinguished in Shelley v. Shelley, L. R. 6 Eq. 540, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 357, 16 Week. Rep. 1036.

"For her own use and disposal, trusting that she will make such a disposition thereof as shall be just and proper among the children." It was held that this gave an absolute title to the widow. Nelles v. Elliot, 25 Grant, Ch. U. C. 329. This was on the ground that the language used gave the wife a discretion to exercise her judgment.

"And my reason for so doing is the constant abuse of trustees which I daily witness among men; at the same time trusting she will, from the love she bears to me and our dear children, so husband and take care of what property there may be for their good." It was held that no trust was created for the children. Pope v. Pope, 10 Sim. 1. Shadwell, V. C., said: "But it seems to me that the expression, 'what property there may be,' means such property as might happen to exist, having regard to the fact that the wife might sell or alien a part of it."

"Upon the fullest trust and confidence reposed in her that she shall dispose of the same to and for the joint benefit of herself and my children." It was held that there was no trust created for the children. Webb v. Wools, 2 Sim. N. S. 267, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 625. This was on the ground that, the expressions of trust and confidence being in the same sentence in which an absolute gift was made, they were stated only in a way of expressing his gift. This case was distinguished in Le Marchant v. Le Marchant, L. R. 18 Eq. 414, 22 Week. Rep. 839.

"Trusting and wholly confiding in his honor, that he will act in strict conformity with my wishes." It was held that the legatee took the personal property absolutely, subject only to the legacies specified, and others which he admitted the testatrix, had personally directed. Wood v. Cox, 2 Myl. & C. 684, reversing 1 Keen, 317. The court said: "Certainly she did not use these words in their absolute and unrestricted sense, as to the whole of her property, namely, as to that part which would be required to pay the legacies given to others, or in other words to execute her wishes."

A devise in tail was made "upon special trust and confidence in his said son that in case he should leave no issue of his own body lawfully begotten, he his said son would not do or suffer any act in law or otherwise to obstruct or prevent the following devises, trusts, and limitations of the said testator's estate and plantations from taking effect; but, on the contrary, that he the said Richard would do or cause to be done every act in his power to establish or confirm the same." The devisee suffered a recovery. It was held that there was no express trust, but an injunction against barring the estate tail, and that this could not be done. Dawkins v. Penrhyn, L. R. 4 App. Cas. 51.

But in Baker v. Mosley, 12 Jur. 740, "trusting that he would preserve the same, so that after his decease it might go to and be equally divided between his then present son and three daughters,"—was held to create a trust, as the intention of the testator was clear.

In Fordham v. Speight, 23 Week. Rep. 782, the Master of Rolls approved Baker v. Mosley, 12 Jur. 740; Ware v. Mallard, 16 Jur. 492, and Palmer v. Simmonds, 2 Week. Rep. 313, 2 Drew, 221.

"Trusting that she would thereout provide for and maintain his family and particularly his only son; and, at her decease, give and bequeath the same to her children by him, in such manner as she should appoint." It was held that the wife could appoint only by will, and that the children living at her death were alone entitled to share in the portion which was not appointed. Walsh v. Wallinger, 2 Russ. & M. 78.

And where a devise was made of the copyhold estate, and "gave and bequeathed to her all his effects whatsoever or wheresoever for her maintenance, upon full trust and confidence in her justice and equity, that at her decease she would make a proper distribution of what effects might be left in money, goods, or otherwise, to his children,"—it was held that the widow was entitled to the copyhold estate for life only, with a trust as to the capital for the heirs. Wilson v. Major, 11 Ves. Jr. 205. This was on the ground that the wife took only a life estate by the first words, and could not take an absolute interest by the subsequent words.

Where a testator devised to stated trustees, "but he trusted that, out of respect to his memory, they would exercise such power in doing such charitable acts as they knew he would most approve of," it was held that the subject and object were pointed, out, and the object was charitable uses, and the trust was held void under the statute mortmain, and the estate passed to the right heirs of the testator. Pilkington v. Boughey, 12 Sim. 114.

Will and desire.

Under a provision: "My will and desire is, that he will give the said three hundred pounds unto his daughter Susan," it was held that the words "I desire" or "I will" amounted to an express devise. Eeles v. England, 2 Vern. 467.

The will provided: "I give to my dear wife, Ann Cotterel, the sum of £500; and it is my will and desire that my said wife, Ann Cotterel, may dispose of the same among her relations, as she by will may think proper." It was held to be a trust for the relations of the legatee. Forbes v. Ball, 3 Meriv. 436.

But a devise of a perpetual advowson to the testator's mother-in-law, "willing and desiring her to sell and dispose of the said perpetual advowson and patronage, with the appurtenances, as soon as she conveniently and lawfully may sell and dispose thereof, to the fellows of Eton college in the county of Buckingham, and their successors,"—was held not to be a trust for the heirs. Hill v. London, 1 Atk. 618.

Wish.

The real question in cases where the word "wish" is used is whether the wish that was expressed by the testator was meant to govern the conduct of the party to whom it was addressed, or whether it was merely an indication of that which he thought would be a reasonable exercise of the discretion of the party, leaving it, however, to the party to exercise his own discretion. In the following cases it was held not a trust:

"It is my wish that whatever property my wife might possess at her death be equally divided between my children." Parnall v. Parnall, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 97.

"And I do hereby declare it to be my earnest wish, that my said sister shall reside at Gravesend with my dear wife, during her life." Graves v. Graves, 13 Ir. Ch. Rep. 182. (The lord chancellor said: "If these ladies cannot agree to live together on friendly terms, I cannot compel them.")

"It is my wish that you should enjoy everything in my power to give, using your judgment as to where to dispose of it amongst your children when you can no longer enjoy it yourself; but I should be unhappy if I thought it possible that any one, not of your family, should be the better for what, I feel confident, you will so well direct the disposal of." Williams v. Williams, 1 Sim. N. S. 358. (The vice chancellor said: "By the same codicil, the testator shows a clear intention that the wife might, in her discretion, give to remoter descendants; and this latter intention can be effectuated only by supposing that all his expressions narrowing the wife's absolute interest were intended merely as an expression of the testator's wishes, without meaning to make them obligatory.")

"And it is my wish and desire, after my decease, that my said wife shall make a will dividing the real and personal estate and effects hereby devised and bequeathed to her among my said children in such manner as she shall deem just and equitable." Bank of Montreal v. Bower, 18 Ont. Rep. 226, affirming 17 Ont. Rep. 548. (Boyd, C., said: "If the entire interest in the subject of the gift is given with super-added words expressing the nature of the gift, or the confident expectation that the subject will be applied for the benefit of particular persons, but without in terms cutting down the interest before given, it will not now be held, without more, that a trust has been thereby created.")

"And I wish them to bequeath the same equally between the families of." Re Hamilton [1895] 2 Ch. 370. (This was on consideration of the whole will, the court preferring to follow the rule in Re Adams, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 394, on this point. The judge said: "I have no hesitation in saying myself, that I think some of the older authorities went a great deal too far in holding that some particular words appearing in a will were sufficient to create a trust," rather than Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. Jr. 333, which held: "Wherever any person gives property, and points out the object, the property, and the way in which it shall go, that does create a trust, unless he shows clearly that his desire expressed is to be controlled by the party, and that he shall have an option to defeat it." It 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) was also said that the word "families" was a vague word.)

Where a letter expressing the testator's desires was admitted to probate, stating: "It is my wish that you should have some one nephew (son of Henry or George, should either of them marry, and have male offspring) educated as a physician, and that you bequeath to such nephew, being so educated, all or the greater part of the property, the interest of which I now bequeath to your dear aunt, and after her to yourself. It having been the toil of my days to accumulate this property, I wish it first to benefit your dearest beloved aunt, next yourself, and finally such nephew as you may select as your successor,"—it was held to be recommendatory only, and not mandatory. Re Pinckard, 4 Jur. N. S. 1041. The court said: "The expression in the letter, 'that you bequeath to such nephew, being so educated, all or the greater part of the property,' left the testator's nephew Richard in a position which enabled him to dispose of the remainder as he might think fit."

Where a person left by his will all his property to his executor, and also wrote him a letter denoting how he wished some of the money to be given, but left it to the executor, "as he might think best," and entirely to his judgment,—it was held there was no trust created. McCormick v. Grogan, L. R. 4 H. L. 82.

Where a testator left his property in secret trust, and said: "I will leave the property to the two Jacksons: they know my wishes, and I am satisfied they will carry out my intentions." It was held that the trust was void. Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 213.

"In case there is any money remaining I should wish it to be given in private charity." It was held that the private charity was too indefinite to enable the court to execute the trust, and that the executors could not take beneficially, and the next of kin were entitled to the same. Ommanney v. Butcher, Turn. & R. 260. The master of the rolls said: "Can the trust be discovered from the expression 'I desire it may be given in private charity'? Because a trust, to be carried into execution by the court, must be of such a nature that it can be under the control of the court (Morice v. Durham, 10 Ves. Jr. 539): if the trust cannot be ascertained, the court cannot see to the execution of it; it becomes too general and indefinite, and the consequence is that the fund must either go as an absolute gift to the individual selected to distribute it, or that individual must be a trustee for the next of kin; if the testator meant to create a trust, and the trust is not effectually created, or fails, the next of kin must take; and on the other hand, if the party selected to make the distribution is to take, it must be upon the ground that the testator did not intend to create a trust, but to leave it entirely to the discretion of the party to apply the fund or not."

But it was held imperative in the following cases:

Where a testator had power to appoint the produce of a policy amongst his children, and by his will bequeathed his personal property to his daughter, and by another writing he directed her as to the insurance money, and stated: "The money from the Equitable Insurance Office I would have equally divided between my daughters, Frances, Gertrude and Agnes." Proby v. Landor, 28 Beav. 504.

"It is my dying wish that the property which I now bequeath to my wife shall be used as to her seemeth best for her own and her children's welfare." Godfrey v. Godfrey, 11 Week. Rep. 554. (Wood, V. C., said: "The word 'wish' used by the testator did not render the direction to apply the property for the benefit of the children less imperative. In several of the cases where precatory words were held to create a trust, there were very strong indications of an absolute gift, followed by a wish that the property should be applied for certain objects. Here the words amounted only to an ordinary gift to the widow in trust for herself and her children.")

"I wish and desire that my daughter shall make a competent provision for my niece Mrs. Baby, at Hamilton." Baby v. Miller, 1 U. C. Err. & App. 218. (Robinson, Ch. J., said: "I take it to be the law still, that words of a testator intimating a request, wish, or desire are sufficient, when they are so plain and unequivocal as in this case, to create a trust, provided there be certainty of the gift and of the object to be benefited.")

"It is my particular wish and request, that my dear wife and Walter Williams, Esq., the grandfather of the said William Walter Foley, will superintend and take care of his education, so as to fit him for any respectable profession or employment." Foley v. Parry, 2 Myl. & K. 138, affirming 5 Sim. 138. (It was said: "It cannot be denied that the precatory words are as strong as in almost any of the cases on the subject, and much more precise than in most of them.") This case was distinguished in Shaw v. Lawless, 5 Clark & F. 129, 1 Drury & Wal. 512, Lloyd & Goold (t. Plunket) 558.

III. Recommending the employment of an agent or attorney.

It is generally held that there is no trust in favor of a person recommended to be retained or employed, and such a request is not binding on the devisee.

A will provided: "I direct and desire that my friend, Charles McLouth, the draftsman of this will, who has been my attorney and adviser for many years and has had charge of all my legal business, shall be continued in the management of my estate, so far as legal advice or assistance shall be necessary or had by my executors." It was held that this was not a trust in favor of the attorney, and that the executors could employ others at their discretion. Re Thistlethwaite, 104 N. Y. Supp. 264. The clause in question was held to be one merely of suggestion, and not of direction or command, and did not create a trust.

A will provided: "It is also my particular desire, that my said executors, whilst acting in the management of all or any of my affairs under this my will, as also my friend William Shaw, when he shall be entitled to enter into the receipt and perception of my said rents of Kentstown, Veldanstown, and Knockirk, shall continue the said Barry Edward Lawless in the receipt and management thereof, and shall likewise employ and retain him in the receipt, agency, and management of the rents and issues of all such other lands and premises as shall or may be purchased." It was held that there was no precatory trust requiring the owner of the life estate to retain the agent as his rent collector. Shaw v. Lawless, 5 Clark & F. 129.

Under a provision that "my solicitor, W. E. Foster, shall be the solicitor to my estate and to my said trustees in the management and carrying out of the provisions of this my will," it was held that the direction in this will imposed no trust on the trustees to continue the solicitor in his position. Foster v. Elsley, L. R. 19 Ch. Div. 618.

A will provided: "I desire that my friend Robert M. Jewell be retained in the employ of the firm on such liberal terms as his long and faithful service entitles him to." After this the employee remained some time with the firm, although his salary had been cut down; the firm changed hands, and he was finally discharged. This was held not to create a trust, and it was held not to be a charge of annuity on the widow. Jewell v. Barnes (Jewell v. Louisville Trust Co.) 110 Ky. 329, 53 L.R.A. 377, 61 S. W. 360. The court said: "The amount of compensation is expressly left to the firm, and no desire is expressed as to anything that should be done after that firm went out of business."

Testator provided: "I hereby select as the attorney of my estate John W. Mitchell, and direct my executrix to consult and employ him in all matters pertaining to the distribution of my estate, and the requirements of this my last will." It was held that this did not constitute a selection which was binding upon the executrix, but was simply an advisory provision which she could disregard if she chose. Re Ogier, 101 Cal. 381, 40 Am. St. Rep. 61, 35 Pac. 900.

A will provided: "I recommend she appoint a good agent to take charge of my real estate. I also give her discretionary power to give such sums of money to any as she may think prudent of my relatives." It was held that the discretionary power was inconsistent with the knowledge on his part that he had literally given her his whole property absolutely. It was therefore held that the widow only took an estate for life in the real and personal property. Re McClure, 136 N. Y. 238, 32 N. E. 758. The court said: "It is quite true that where there is a primary devise so framed as to convey a distinct and definite estate, it will not be cut down by later words which are merely ambiguous and inferential (Clarke v. Leupp, 88 N. Y. 231), and that, if the gift here in question had stopped with the words 'to have and to hold,' it would have been sufficient to have passed an absolute estate. But it did not stop there, and some of the after words are not at all ambiguous. They are clearly repugnant, for they take away the absolute power of disposition, or they mean nothing. On the other hand, the words of primary devise are not inconsistent with a life estate (Terry v. Wiggins, 47 N. Y. 515); and the theory of such an estate intended harmonizes and makes consistent all the words of the testator."

But in Tibbits v. Tibbits, 19 Ves. Jr. 657, testator said: I "recommend to my said son to continue his cousins James Tibbits and Richard Tibbits in the occupation of their respective farms in the county of Warwick as heretofore and so long as they continue to manage the same in a good and husband-like manner and to duly pay their rents." This was held to be a trust for the cousins. Eldon, L. C., said: "This is not like the plain uncertainty that occurs in the case of words of recommendation or confidence applied to 'what shall be left' at the death of the testator's wife, to whom the property is given in the first instance." This case was distinguished in Shaw v. Lawless, 5 Clark & F. 129, 1 Drury & Wal. 512, Lloyd & Gould (t. Plunket) 558, and Lefroy v. Flood, 4 Ir. Ch. Rep. 1.

In some cases and by some writers the term "precatory trust" was used, where there were no precatory words, as, "I give my wife my property for the purpose of taking care of and educating our children." In such cases the trust attaches or not according to the purpose of the gift being annexed to the gift. This distinction does not seem to have been noticed in some cases where they say this was or was not a precatory trust. This class of cases is not intended to be included in this note, as they belong rather to the general subject of trusts, and the cases considered herein are only those where precatory words were used by the testator. Note. — Public lands: prohibition of grant as including lease.

An extended search discloses no case except SAN PEDRO, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. HAMILTON in which the question under annotation has arisen. The general question whether the terms "grant" and "sell" include or exclude leases, however, is one not generally dependent upon precedent, since in practically every instance the scope of such terms must be determined from their connection and the manner of their use; and for this reason, if for no other, each case would be a law unto itself, except, of course, in rare instances, where the facts involved in any two or more cases might be identical or nearly so. As illustrative of this dependency upon the purpose and context of the enactment under consideration in each particular instance it may not be amiss to refer to a few cases involving the question whether or not a lease is included in the terms "grant," "sell," etc., although no attempt has been made to compile the decisions on any point other than that stated in the title. Thus, in Falls County v. De Laney, 73 Tex. 463, 11 S. W. 492, a constitutional provision permitting a county to "sell or dispose of its [school] lands in whole or in part" was held to confer power upon counties to derive a revenue from their lands by lease, if such a disposition would be deemed best for the interests of the public schools. And that the term "grant" may include leases, see Carlton v. Williams, 77 Cal. 89, 11 Am. St. Rep. 243, 19 Pac. 185, wherein it was held that a lease was a "grant" within the meaning of a statute providing that "no estate in real property of a married woman passes by any grant purporting to be executed or acknowledged by her unless the grant or instrument is acknowledged by her in the manner," etc. Here, however, it is obvious that the term "grant" was used in a broad sense.

But aside from the question of the obvious purpose of a statute, or of the use of other words indicative of the meaning of the words attached to the term "grant," it would seem that a lease is not a grant within the meaning of that term, and that therefore merely prohibiting the sale or grant of public lands would not prohibit the leasing thereof. In fact, as late as 1893, the supreme court of Iowa, in Des Moines County Agri. Soc. v. Tubbesing, 87 Iowa, 140, 54 N. W. 68, said: "We are unable to find a single instance where the word 'grant' is construed as 'lease,' without other words to control its meaning." G. J. C.

harbors is not within the constitutional inhibition of special legislation.

Government land — prohibition of grant — lease.

3. A constitutional prohibition of the grant or sale of tide lands fronting on any harbor or bay within 2 miles of any municipality does not forbid leases of such lands.

Mr. H. M. Barstow, amicus curiæ:

The confirmatory act of March 23, 1907, confirming tide-land leases, is a general law.

Upham v. Hosking, 62 Cal. 259; Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 89 Pac. 352; Redlands v. Brook, 151 Cal. 474, 91 Pac. 150.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The above-entitled cases involve a consideration of the same legal questions. The former case is an action to quiet title, the latter an action in ejectment, both between the same parties.

The facts found by the court, over which there is no controversy, may be briefly stated. In 1903 the government of the United States was engaged in the improvement of the harbor of San Pedro. The work contemplated a deepening of the "inner harbor" (an estuary or arm of the sea), the rectification of the inner harbor lines, the construction of jetties delimiting those lines, and to the seaward the construction of an enormous breakwater which, in a great sweep or curve, extends across the entrance to the inner harbor, and, while protecting it, affords safe anchorage to vessels on its landward side. Much dredging was necessary to deepen the inner harbor. The disposition of the material dredged was important. If cast into the ocean, the refluxing tides would carry it back to the inner harbor. This being the condition in April, 1903, the United States government entered into a contract with the San Pedro Railroad Company, by which it was agreed that the corporation would build in the Pacific ocean, east of the inner harbor and of the government jetty bounding that harbor upon the east, a sea wall and retaining wall which would protect and confine not less than 2,500,000 cubic yards of the material dredged by the government from the inner harbor, and permit the government to pump its dredged material onto the corporation's land. The object to be attained was one of mutual benefit to the contracting parties. The government, upon the one hand, would thus safely and economically dispose of the dredged material, and the corporation, upon the other hand, would receive the benefit of this dredged material in the contemplated reclamation of tide and submerged lands fronting on the Pacific Ocean. Thereafter the railroad company obtained a lease from the city of Long Beach, a municipality of the sixth class, whose jurisdiction then extended over the territory in question, to a tract of land including the lands in controversy. It then proceeded, at an expense of $30,000, to build the retaining wall. The government deposited the materials dredged from the inner harbor within the confines of the wall, and thus were reclaimed from the Pacific Ocean the lands here in controversy. Thereafter, on March 23, 1907, the legislature of the state of California passed a validating act, ratifying leases of a certain class, within which class this lease admittedly comes. Of the greater part of the lands in controversy, the railroad company has been in possession under its lease. To a minor portion of the lands, in the possession of Louise M. Hamilton and her husband, the railroad company has claimed the right of possession.

The foregoing outlines the railroad company's claim of title. Louise M. Hamilton, defendant in the one action, plaintiff in the other, claimed a right of possession to a portion of the lands by virtue of her attempt to comply with the provisions of the possessory act of 1852. Stat. 1852, p. 158. Without regard to the question whether this act has been repealed, it is sufficient to say that the act contemplates the occupation of public lands "for the purpose of cultivating or grazing the same." The court found that none of the lands was suitable for purposes of cultivation or grazing,—a finding which, under the circumstances, will excite no surprise. In truth, no serious attempt is made to support the asserted claim of title of the Hamiltons; their possession of a small portion of the land, however, affording sufficient standing ground from which to attack the title of the railroad company.

It was made to appear that the city of San Pedro had made leases similar to the one here in question, and that the city of San Pedro had subsequently become annexed to or amalgamated with the city of Los Angeles. The city of Los Angeles had also from the state acquired certain rights to the lands contiguous to the harbor of San Pedro, which rights, it is asserted, include the lands here in question. The city of Los Angeles, however, did not connect itself with this litigation, but was permitted through its representatives to file a brief. Other briefs were filed in answer thereto by others interested in the principal question here to be considered.

That question may be thus broadly stated: When the Constitution (art. 15, § 3) declares: "All tide lands within 2 miles of any incorporated city or town in this state, and fronting on the waters of any harbor, estuary, bay, or inlet used for the purposes of navigation, shall be withheld from grant or sale to private persons, partnerships, or corporations,"—does this language forbid the leasing for a term of any part of such lands?

For the consideration of the question thus broadly stated, "tide lands," as thus used in the Constitution, will be construed more broadly than in the ordinary signification of lands covered and uncovered by the daily efflux and reflux of the tide. It will be construed to embrace lands properly described as submerged lands (Ward v. Willis, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 183, 72 Am. Dec. 570), such as, in major parts, the lands here in controversy unquestionably were. The phrase will be so construed to carry out the manifest intent of the framers of the Constitution to protect the harbors of cities and towns from falling into private monopolistic ownership. People ex rel. Harbor Comra. v. Kerber, 152 Cal. 731, 125 Am. St. Rep. 93, 93 Pac. 878. Such being the undoubted purpose, it would result in the absolute destruction of that purpose to hold that a city might not convey its tide lands proper, but might convey into private ownership all of the submerged lands beyond the tide lands proper. For there thus might be erected an impassable barrier between the city and its own harbor waters, with the resulting monopolistic control of the harbor itself. It will further be assumed that the lands here in controversy front on a "bay." They certainly do not front upon the harbor of San Pedro, for the maps in evidence in the case establish that between these lands and the harbor of San Pedro is a wide jetty, wholly under the ownership and control of the government of the United States. To seaward these lands front upon the Pacific Ocean. They do not even front upon the outer harbor, but upon the open sea. The slight indentation in the shore line upon which they do front is San Pedro bay, and, as has been said, it will be assumed that this bay is used for purposes of navigation, so as to bring the lands within the purview of the language of the Constitution.

The legislature, by its general validating act, as has been said, admittedly confirmed the lease made by the city of Long Beach. Stats. 1907, p. 987. If this confirmatory act is valid, it, of course, cures any defects in the lease from the town of San Pedro which may be thought to exist by reason of the lack of power in that municipality. Against the validity of the act, it is contended that it is special legislation. But this contention is completely answered by Upham v. Hosking, 62 Cal. 250; Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 89 Pac. 352; and Redlands v. Brook, 151 Cal. 474, 91 Pac. 150. The principle of decision is that such curative acts do not come within the constitutional inhibition against special legislation. Elsewhere the same principle of decision is uniformly applied. Read v. Plattsmouth, 107 U. S. 568, 27 L. ed. 414, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 208; State ex rel. Board of Education v. Brown, 97 Minn. 402, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 327, 106 N. W. 477; State v. Squires, 26 Iowa, 340.

This conclusion, then, is a declaration that the legislature did not violate this particular constitutional inhibition against special legislation in the passage of the curative act, and thus clears the way for the consideration of the ultimate question first above stated. In passing, it may be said that it is, of course, recognized that the legislative department of the state, like the Congress of our national government, has plenary power over the management and disposition of state lands, subject, of course, in the case of lands under navigable waters, to the paramount right of the national government to exercise a control in the interest of commerce and navigation, and subject, also, to the trust for the whole public upon which these lands are held by the state,—a trust which would forbid the alienation into private ownership of any such considerable part of them as would interfere with the proper exercise of the public trust upon which they are all held. But with none of these questions does this case concern itself. The question before us is a much narrower one. It is the question of the extent of the limitation of this general power imposed upon the legislature by the constitutional mandate. The Constitution has clearly forbidden the legislature from granting or selling lands of the character of those here in controversy. The question is: Did the Constitution by this language mean to forbid the legislature from leasing, as contradistinguished from disposing of the fee, any such lands?

Over the meaning of these words "grant or sale," as thus employed in the Constitution, many niceties of reasoning are indulged in, and many authorities upon either side are cited. Thus it is pointed out that § 1053, Civil Code, provides that a transfer in writing is called a "grant," or "conveyance," or "bill of sale," and that the term "grant" in that section and in the succeeding articles includes all these instruments. Again, it is pointed out that § 1091, relating to the transfer of real property, provides that an estate in real property, other than an estate at will or for a term not exceeding one year, can be transferred only by operation of law, or by an instrument in writing; that § 1092 provides that a "grant of an estate in real property may be made in substance as follows;" and that this contemplates a leasehold interest exceeding one year. Again, § 1105 provides that a fee-simple title is presumed to be intended to pass by a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended, and that by this section the lesser estate referred to must be a life estate or a leasehold estate for years. Again, § 1108 deals with "a grant made by the owner of an estate for life or years." Still further it is pointed out that in San Francisco & O. R. Co. v. Oakland, 43 Cal. 502, it is declared that at the present day the word "grant" is effectual to convey an estate in a corporeal hereditament; that the word has now become a generic term, applicable to the transfer of all classes of real property; and that in Commercial Bank v. Pritchard, 126 Cal. 600, 59 Pac. 130, a lease of land for a term of five years is construed to be a conveyance of real property, within the meaning of § 1215 Civil Code. Upon the other hand, respondent points out that these interpretations have to do generally with recordation acts, and that, while § 1053, as above set forth, declares that "a transfer in writing is called a grant or conveyance or bill of sale," a transfer itself, defined by § 1039 of the same Code, is "an act of the parties or of the law by which the title to property is conveyed from one living person to another;" and that in the case of leases the title is not transferred. Attention is directed to such cases as Simonson v. Burr, 121 Cal. 582, 54 Pac. 87, where it was contended that the lease of the homestead was an abandonment of the homestead right, under § 1243 of the Civil Code, which declares that a homestead is abandoned "by a grant thereof," and this court held that a lease was not embraced within the meaning of "grant," as there employed; and Mott v. Ruckman, 3 Blatchf. 71, Fed. Cas. No. 9,881, where the statute provided that no conveyance of a vessel should be valid, unless recorded, and the vessel had been leased, the United States circuit court held that a lease was not included in the word "conveyance;" and Des Moines County Agri. Soc. v. Tubbessing, 87 Iowa, 138, 54 N. W. 68, where the court declared: "We are unable to find a single instance where the word 'grant' is construed as a 'lease,' without other words to control its meaning." And, finally, the American & English Encyclopedia of the Law, 2d ed. vol. 7, p. 487, is cited to the following effect: "Blackstone enumerates leases as among the primary 'conveyances' at common law, and in several cases the term 'conveyance' has been held to include a lease; but the weight of authority is to the effect that in its ordinary significance the term does not embrace a chattel interest in realty."

Enough has been said to show that the meaning of the word "grant" has by judicial interpretation been narrowed or enlarged to meet the exigencies of specific cases and the spirit of the law in which the word is employed. We are still left to determine the specific meaning as employed in the Constitution. And here resort first must be had to the rule of construction that, in interpreting the Constitution, as in construing a legislative statute, unless a special definition has been given to a word, the word shall be taken in its ordinary and generally accepted sense. Harris v. Reynolds, 13 Cal. 514, 73 Am. Dec. 600; Houghton's Appeal, 42 Cal. 35. These cases have to do with the construction of statutes. The applicability of the same rule in constitutional interpretation is declared in Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 491, 11 Pac. 3. Indeed, even if the word have a technical, as well as popular, meaning, the latter will be given it, unless the context forces the conclusion that it was otherwise used. Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111. It cannot be gainsaid but that, in the ordinary and general acceptance of the word "grant" and of the word "sale," and particularly where the two are used in conjunction, as here, they convey the idea of parting with the fee for a monetary or other consideration, and do not embrace the concept of a lease. It would require no explanation if a man declared that he had granted his farm. But it would require explanation if he desired to be understood thereby that he had merely leased it. It would require no explanation if a man should desire to convey the idea that he had sold his horse or his house, but it would require much explanation if he said that by the use of the word "sold" he meant to convey the idea that he had leased his house or let his horse. Only by a resort to meanings given to the words in extreme cases, and not to their generally accepted meaning, can they be stretched to cover and include the idea of leasing.

A resort to the constitutional debates to which we are invited throws no light upon the question. An amendment to the provision as it now stands was offered, authorizing boards of supervisors to lease for a limited period of years, excepting from this provision the board of supervisors and the water front of the city and county of San Francisco. In the debate which followed, little light is thrown upon the question, because the attack was directed principally to the whole section, with or without its amendment. It cannot be determined from the debates, under any consensus of opinion expressed by the debaters, why the amendment was stricken out, and for aught that appears to the contrary, it might have been under the view that the section as it now appears authorized leases without the amendment. It might have been because the term of leasing in the proposed amendment was deemed too great or too small; or it might have been because the city and county of San Francisco was excluded from the operation of the provision. It might have been for any of these or for a multitude of other reasons.

Much more light, however, is thrown upon the question by the interpretation put upon it by the body which first declared it, and which, saving for the constitutional restrictions, has supreme charge and control over the public lands; namely, the legislature. The constitutional provision itself was originally a legislative enactment. It will be found in the early statutes (see Pol. Code, § 3488), which, making provision for the sale of swamp, marsh, and tide lands, excluded from the operation of the law all such lands within 5 miles of the corporate limits of either San Francisco or the city of Oakland, or within 2 miles of any other incorporated city or town. The advocates of the constitutional amendment declared in debate that by subdivision 3 they were merely putting into the Constitution what for years had been upon the statute books of the state. As this provision originated with the legislature, its interpretation of its own enactment is peculiarly persuasive. Throughout it will be found that the legislature has never regarded its provision or the constitutional declaration as forbidding the leasing of such lands. The act of the legislature ratifying this lease does not stand alone. An act of the legislature in 1889 (Stat. 1889, p. 305) creates a board of state harbor commissioners for the bay of San Diego. By this act certain sections were added to the Political Code, and one of them (§ 2605) declares: "The commission shall have the right to lease said lands under such established rules and regulations as it may adopt." In 1901 (Stat. 1901, p. 601) the lease of China basin in the bay of San Francisco was ratified and confirmed by the state. By act of March 26, 1895 (Stat. 1895, p. 194), the state board of harbor commissioners of San Francisco was authorized "to lease such portion or portions of the sea wall as they may deem expedient for such purposes solely as will be most advantageous to the commerce of the port." The legislature of 1909 ratified and approved amendments to the charter of the city of Los Angeles. Stat. 1909, p. 1289. And herein was the provision that the city may "lease by ordinance from the water front in excess of said 10,000 feet so owned by the city . . . alternate frontages," etc. While in an act granting to the city of Los Angeles the tide lands and submerged lands of the state within the boundaries of the city (Stat. 1911, p. 1256), it is declared "that said city or its successors may grant franchises thereon for limited periods for wharves and other public uses and purposes, and may lease said lands or any part thereof for limited periods for purposes consistent with the trusts upon which said lands are held by the state of California." And prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, authority to make leases of the tide lands had been frequently granted by the legislature to the harbor commissioners of San Francisco. Stat. 1863, p. 408; Stat. 1865-66, p. 853; Stat. 1867-68, p. 408; Stat. 1869-70, pp. 799-800. Finally, it may be said that by this court there has been a judicial acceptance of the soundness of this interpretation expressed in Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. Kimball, 114 Cal. 414, 46 Pac. 275, where the city of Monterey had leased land to a steamship company, which had erected thereon its private wharf; the land being within the corporate limits of the city. In discussing the power of the municipality to make such a lease, the court, speaking through Justice Temple, said: "Wharves are often appropriated to the use of an individual or a company, and it cannot be doubted that Monterey could lease small portions of its water front for bathing grounds, or for any lawful purpose, not injurious to the harbor or an inconvenience to commerce. This being so, I see no reason why it might not lease a small portion to a steamship company for its special use."

But if, after all this, doubt can be entertained, that doubt must be resolved in favor of the power of the state so to lease, from the manifest benefits which will follow such construction, as contrasted with the most obvious detriments to commercial development which would attend the other. The purpose of the constitutional provision was not to blight commercial development, but to foster it. It designed to foster it by preventing the alienation into private ownership of the fee of such lands, whereby all might be acquired and held in private ownership to the destruction of the public use. But it did not mean to abort commerce in embryo or to strangle it in its infancy by putting a ban upon the activities of private commercial enterprises. Saving in San Francisco, most of the improvements of our harbors have been made by private capital. The case last referred to in 114 Cal. 414, 46 S7 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pac. 275, is typical of it, where the sole wharf of the town of Monterey, at which five steamers a week landed, was due wholly to private enterprise and private capital. To hold that the state, or that municipalities acting as its mandatories, may not lease, with proper restrictions of time and proper regard to public and quasi public use, lands such as these, so that private enterprise and capital may build up the commerce of our seaport cities, is to declare that all such commerce must await the slow and frequently incompetent initiative of the municipalities themselves,—municipalities which frequently are unwilling to incur the expense and risk which would be accepted under reasonable terms by private enterprise. If municipalities may not so lease these lands, they may not even grant franchisees in connection with them; for, notwithstanding the well-recognized legal distinctions existing between a lease of land and a franchise involving the use of land for specific purposes, in practical effect the franchise is nothing other than a lease, with a right of possession and use for the indicated purposes. Pol. Code, § 2911. Nor need the slightest apprehension be felt that the power so to lease may result in a monopoly comparable to that which might follow the power to sell. In the case of sale, the title and control over the land are gone. In the case of leases, all proper restrictions may be cast about the use. An entry by the lessor may be had for breach of covenant; possession of the land, with its improvements, after the term of years, returns to the municipality and state, and in the meantime the interests of navigation and commerce are not impaired, but are in the highest degree stimulated and fostered. The lease in this instance is typical. Vast expenditures were made which the lessor would never have made, and to a portion of land—a mere fragment of all of the like water-front lands—access is given to a transcontinental railroad for all purposes of inland and marine commerce, while at the expiration of the term of the lease the possession of the lands returns to the state. What policy more beneficial to the state itself than this, it would not be easy to point out. No other matters call for special mention.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgments and orders appealed from are affirmed.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

RE HENRY SCHRIBER et al.

(19 Idaho, 531, 114 Pac. 29.)

Bail — right of convict.

1. The Constitution of this state (§ 6, art. 1), which provides that "all persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offenses, where the proof is evident or the presumption great," has reference only to those cases in which the party has not yet had a trial, and applies to all persons prior to conviction, but does not refer to cases wherein a conviction has been had in a court of competent jurisdiction.

Constitution — former construction — adoption.

2. Where a constitutional provision has been adopted from another state, and the court of last resort of such state had construed the provision in that state prior to its adoption in this state, the presumption arises that the framers of the Constitution in adopting such provision meant and intended to also adopt the construction that had been placed upon it by the highest court of the state from which it was taken.

Bail — appeal — right.

3. Under the provisions of § 8104, Rev. Codes, a defendant who has appealed to the supreme court from a judgment imposing a fine only is entitled to bail as a matter of right; but where a defendant appeals from a judgment which imposes a term of imprisonment, admission to bail is a matter of discretion.

Same — discretion — habeas corpus.

4. Where a defendant who has been convicted and sentenced to serve a term of imprisonment appeals from such judgment, and applies to the trial judge for admission to bail, such application is addressed to the sound legal discretion of such judge or court, and, unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused, the action of the trial judge or court will not be disturbed or interfered with by the supreme court on application for a writ of habeas corpus.

(March 11, 1911.)

APPPLICATIONS for writs of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioners from the custody of the sheriff of the county jail, to which they had been committed pending their appeals to the Supreme Court, after conviction for a violation of the local-option statute. Granted as to petitioner Schriber. Denied as to petitioner Haggerty.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John A. Bagley, K. I. Perky, T. L. Glenn, and E. J. Hornibrook for petitioners.

Messrs. D. C. McDougall, Attorney General, J. H. Peterson, and O. M. Van Duyn for the State.

Allshie, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two petitions have been filed for writs of habeas corpus. In the one case, it appears that Henry Schriber was convicted of a violation of the local-option statute, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $250, or, in default thereof, to be imprisoned in the county jail for one day for each $2 of such fine. He thereupon took an appeal from the judgment, and on application to the trial judge was admitted to bail. Haggerty was likewise convicted of violation of the local-

Note. — Right to release on bail pending appeal under a general statute.

With slight variations the common form of constitutional guaranty of bail is that all persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offenses, when the proof is evident or the presumption of guilt great. 5 Cyc. 63.

In Ex parte Voll, 41 Cal. 29, a prisoner convicted of manslaughter claimed admission to bail as of right under the Constitution of California, providing that "all persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, unless for capital offenses, when the proof is evident or the presumption great," and, as infringing upon this clause, denied the constitutionality of the state statute which provided that a person charged with such an offense as manslaughter may be admitted to bail after conviction as a matter of discretion merely, in so far as it enacted that a conviction already had should take away the right of bail and leave it to the discretion of the court. It was insisted that the language of the Constitution was sufficient-

ciently broad to embrace not only a case where no trial had been had, but equally a case in which a conviction of an offense less than capital in degree had occurred; that the Constitution did not regard the particular stage of proceedings which the prosecution may have reached, but only the grade of the offense involved as being less than the capital grade. The court held that such a statute was not unconstitutional as being more restrictive than the Constitution, for the provision of the latter was designed only to alter the rule of the common law as to certain criminal cases before conviction, and that bail after conviction was still left discretionary as at common law, with the modifications wrought by the statute. The court was of the opinion, by a bare majority of its members, two judges not expressing an opinion, that the Constitution, in declaring bail to be a matter of right, had in view only those cases wherein the guilt of the party had not already been judicially ascertained; cases in which the prisoner as yet stood upon his plea of not guilty, supported with all the presumptions of option statute, and was sentenced to pay a fine, and also to serve a term of imprisonment in the county jail. On application to the trial judge he was granted a certificate of probable cause and was admitted to bail. The appeals were taken in these cases in June, 1910. Up to the present time, however, the records on appeal have not been filed in this court.

There has been apparently some delay in the matter of prosecuting the appeal. On the 1st day of March, 1911, Hon. Alfred Budge, judge of the district court, and from whose district these convictions were had, made an order revoking the previous order admitting both parties to bail, and directed the sheriff to arrest them and commit them to the county jail. The order recited innocence with which the law delights to surround him; but when his trial is had, and his plea proven untrue, the law will not stultify itself by presuming him other than it has adjudged him to be. It was said in the course of the opinion that the absolute right to bail after conviction as well as before would lead to the result that no convict would be punished for his crime if he had either wealth or friends, and would operate as a mere money commutation for the infamous corporeal punishment which the law provides for the perpetration of crime; and construing the language of the Constitution in its literal sense, bail must be taken in any case, whether or not there be an appeal; and that this absurd result was not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

A constitutional clause identical with that set out in the above case is contained in the Constitutions of other states, and when relied upon to support a claim for bail after conviction, the courts have generally ruled as in Ex parte Voll, supra.

In Mississippi (Ex parte Dyson, 25 Miss. 356) such a clause was held to have no application after conviction, where one convicted of manslaughter was denied bail in the absence of circumstances warranting the court in exercising its discretionary power to bail.

So, such a clause in the Missouri Constitution was held inapplicable after conviction in Ex parte Heath, 227 Mo. 393, 126 S. W. 1031, where petitioner, convicted of murder, and sentenced to life imprisonment, applied for bail pending appeal, on the ground that the assessment of punishment and sentence for life imprisonment repelled and effectually removed not only all weight of evident proof and great presumption of capital guilt, but established the fact that he was not guilty of a "capital" offense. It was held that the statute denying bail in such a case did not infringe the Constitution, and governed petitioner's application.

And in a North Carolina case (State v. Ward, 9 N. C. [2 Hawks] 443) where defendant was convicted of passing counterfeit money, the court said: "I think that the clause in the Constitution which declares that the defendants are not prosecuting their appeals with diligence and in good faith. Counsel for the parties insist that under the provisions of § 6 of article 1 of the state Constitution, all persons are bailable as a matter of right, except in capital cases, and that this is true both before and after conviction, provided an appeal is prosecuted.

Section 6, art. 1, of the Constitution reads as follows: "All persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offenses, where the proof is evident or the presumption great. . . ." The Constitution of California contains a like provision, and § 6 of article 1 of our Constitution was evidently adopted from the California Constitution. As early as 1871, the that all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient securities, unless for capital offenses, where the proof is evident or the presumption great, relates entirely to prisoners before conviction; for although the words, 'where the proof is evident or the presumption great,' relate to capital cases only, that is, to prisoners in capital cases, the meaning is evidently prisoners before conviction; for after conviction there is no such thing as proof and presumption . . . we think the spirit of our law requires a middle course to leave it to the sound discretion of the judge before whom the appeal is taken."

So, in Ex parte Ezell, 40 Tex. 451, 19 Am. Rep. 32, a conviction of felony, and in Ex parte Scwartz, 2 Tex. App. 74, a conviction of assault and battery, it is held that the constitutional provision guarantying bail except in capital cases relates to persons who are accused, before trial and conviction.

So, in Re Boulter, 5 Wyo. 263, 39 Pac. 875, where petitioner, convicted of manslaughter, insisted upon bail as matter of right under such a constitutional clause, claiming the statute denying bail after conviction for felony repugnant thereto, it was held that the constitutional guaranty of the right to bail was inapplicable after conviction of felony. The court said: "This statute expressly forbids the admission to bail of a person convicted of a felony, after sentence, by directing that he shall be imprisoned until his cause in error is disposed of, and the Constitution extends the right to bail to persons before judgment has been passed in crimes of this magnitude, under the construction that we are compelled to give to the provisions of that instrument conferring the right of admission to bail. While we recognize the right of the legislature to enlarge this constitutional grant so as to include persons sentenced for a felony, this court has no power and no inclination to invade the domain of the legislature and confer such a right in the face of the unambiguous direction of a valid statute."

And in Hampton v. State, 42 Ohio St. 401, it is held that in a criminal case, "ex-supreme court of California in Ex parte Voll, 41 Cal. 29, passed upon this provision of the California Constitution, and held that it applied to all persons prior to conviction, but that it had no reference to any person after a conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction and pending an appeal. This case has been uniformly followed and approved by the California court ever since that time, as may be seen by an examination of the following cases: Ex parte Hoge, 48 Cal. 5; Ex parte Smallman, 54 Cal. 36; Ex parte Brown, 68 Cal. 177, 8 Pac. 829, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 55. According to the rule heretofore announced by this court in Stein v. Morrison, 9 Idaho, 426, 75 Pac. 246, "When a statutory or constitutional provision is adopted from another state, where the courts of that state have placed a construction upon the language of such statute or Constitution, it is to be presumed that it was taken in view of such judicial interpretation, and with the purpose of adopting the language as the same had been interpreted and construed by the courts of the state from which it was taken." The courts of this state would be most strongly inclined to follow the interpretation placed upon the like constitutional provision by the California court prior to our adoption of the same. This construction appeals to us as being reasonable and just, and fairly within the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution. It would certainly be disastrous if we should hold that this provision of the Constitution grants to a per-cept for capital offenses where the proof is evident or the presumption great," after a verdict of guilty, and before sentence, the court may, in its discretion, take a recognition for the appearance of the prisoner to abide the judgment of the court, the court's power to admit to bail having been taken away by statute after sentence. The court said: "We do not say that after a verdict of guilty of felony the prisoner, on tendering sufficient bail, can demand as of right his discharge from the sheriff's custody pending his motion for a new trial; we only say, the court, in the exercise of a wise judicial discretion, may so admit to bail."

But in the case of Re Longworth, 7 La. Ann. 247, where a prisoner was convicted of larceny and sentenced to one year's imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary, it is said by the court that the people of Louisiana have, by their Constitution, restrained the discretion of the courts and judges at common law and enlarged the liberty of the citizens by declaring "that all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient securities, unless for capital offenses, where the proof is evident or presumption great," and, against the interpretation given in State v. Ward, supra, to a clause of the North Carolina Constitution identical with the one here involved, the court held that a prisoner was entitled to bail as a matter of right pending an appeal after conviction of larceny, notwithstanding an act of the general assembly directing the sheriff in all cases where persons convicted of crimes shall be sentenced to death or to imprisonment to hard labor to take such person into custody and keep him confined for a prescribed period, notwithstanding any appeal or reprieve. The court manifests great reluctance in holding unconstitutional the statute requiring the imprisonment of the person convicted of a felony during the pendency of the appeal, and suggests the probability of an amendment of the Constitution in that respect, so as to take away the right of bail after conviction, which was afterwards done by inserting "unless after conviction for any offense or crimes punishable with death or imprisonment at hard labor." Mr. Justice 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Rost, dissenting, adheres to the opinion in the North Carolina case of State v. Ward, supra, decided under an identical constitutional provision.

The provision of the Louisiana Constitution on this subject was subsequently amended by expressly excepting the case of conviction for an offense punishable with death or imprisonment at hard labor from the guaranty of the right to bail; and under the amended provision it was held in State v. Anselm, 43 La. Ann. 195, 8 So. 583, that in case the defendant is charged with and has been convicted of a crime which is necessarily punishable with imprisonment at hard labor, and upon motion in arrest of judgment the indictment is held to be defective and wanting in essential averment, and set aside, he is not entitled to bail pending a suspensive appeal on the part of the state.

And in State ex rel. Collette, 106 La. 221, 30 So. 746, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 51, where relators convicted of petty larceny were admitted to bail pending appeal from sentence to five months imprisonment in the parish jail, and to work during that sentence on the public roads and other public works of the parish, it was held, construing together the constitutional clause set out in State v. Anselm, supra, and a state statute requiring imprisonment after conviction, that it is only where persons convicted of crime shall have been sentenced to death or to imprisonment at hard labor that such persons are to be kept in confinement notwithstanding an appeal in their case.

In Re Comolli, 78 Vt. 337, 63 Atl. 184, it was held that where a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor and sentenced to the house of correction for a term was in the custody of the sheriff on the mittimus, he was "in execution," within the meaning of Const. art. 2, § 33, providing that "all prisoners, unless in execution, or committed for capital offenses, when the proof is evident or the presumption great, shall be bailable by sufficient sureties," and was not entitled as of right to bail pending appeal under such provision, though the final commitment had not been made.

son convicted of crime the absolute right to be admitted to bail pending appeal, irrespective of the merits of the case.

Turning now to the statutes, we find that § 8104 of the Revised Codes provides as follows: "After conviction of an offense not punishable with death, a defendant who has appealed may be admitted to bail: 1. As a matter of right, when the appeal is from a judgment imposing a fine only. 2. As a matter of discretion in all other cases."

It would seem clear that, under the provisions of the foregoing statute, the defendant Schriber is entitled by statute to be admitted to bail until his appeal is finally disposed of. Whether his appeal be in good faith or not must be ultimately determined by this court. If he fails to prosecute it with diligence, it may be dismissed on motion by proper showing in this court; but until the appeal is disposed of, either by being dismissed or determined on its merits, he is clearly entitled to admission to bail. This court will therefore order and direct the trial judge to admit the petitioner Schriber to bail in such sum as he may deem just and sufficient to insure his appearance for final judgment in the case.

A somewhat different question arises with reference to the petitioner Haggerty. He has been sentenced both to pay a fine and to serve a term of imprisonment. Under the provisions of § 8104, above quoted, the admission to bail in such a case after conviction is "a matter of discretion." The trial judge exercised his discretion in admitting the petitioner to bail. For some reason the judge subsequently concluded that he should no longer be admitted to bail. So far as we are informed by the petition, the trial judge bases this conclusion on the fact that the petitioner is not prosecuting his appeal in good faith. We would not feel justified in interfering with the discretion of the trial judge under the facts and circumstances as they present themselves to us in this petition. The petitioner can again apply to the judge for admission to bail, and if he can possibly convince the judge of his good faith in the prosecution of his appeal and the merits thereof, he may be again admitted to bail. He has also applied to this court for admission to bail in the event the court does not see fit to release him from custody, but we are not inclined to do so. We are not familiar with the situation and the circumstances of the petitioner, and we think that is a matter with which the trial judge can deal more justly and wisely. He is familiar with the parties and their ability to give bail, and also knows the facts surrounding the commission of the offense for which he was convicted.

The trial judge is directed to admit the petitioner Schriber to bail pending the appeal. The application of the petitioner Haggerty is denied.

W. J. STAPLES.

Billboard — right to regulate.

A municipal corporation may forbid the construction of billboards nearer than 24 inches to the ground, when not placed against solid walls.

(December 20, 1911.)

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Superior Court for Buncombe County quashing a warrant issued by the police judge of the city of Asheville, charging defendant with violation of the billboard ordinance. Reversed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

Criminal action tried on appeal from police court of the city of Asheville. It appeared that the defendant was arrested, tried, and convicted on a warrant issued by the police judge of said city, and the testimony showed a violation by defendant of an ordinance of the city in terms as follows: "Sec. 773. That no person, firm, or corporation shall erect or maintain within the city of Asheville any billboard or other similar structure used solely for the purpose of displaying posters or other public advertisements, the boards of which shall be nearer the ground than 24 inches, except where said billboards are erected and maintained against the wall of a building or other solid wall, and any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be subject to a penalty of $25 for each and every such offense." In the superior court, on motion, there was judgment quashing the warrant which was based on and recited the ordinance, and the state excepted and appealed.

Messrs. T. W. Bickett, Attorney General, and G. L. Jones, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Mr. J. Frazier Glenn, for the city:

The charter of the city of Asheville gives its mayor and board of aldermen the right to enact ordinances on the subject of billposters and billboards.

State v. Whitlock, 149 N. C. 543, 128 Am. St. Rep. 670, 63 S. E. 123, 16 Ann. Cas. 765.

The ordinance is a reasonable regulation.

People v. Havnor, 1 App. Div. 459, 37 N. Y. Supp. 314, 149 N. Y. 195, 31 L.R.A. 689, 52 Am. St. Rep. 707, 43 N. E. 541; Rochester v. Simpson, 57 Hun, 36, 10 N. Y. Supp. 499, 134 N. Y. 414, 31 N. Charter authority to license billposters and prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such license shall be granted includes the power to regulate the height and distance from the ground of boards erected for the purpose of billposting; so far, at least, as such regulations are necessary for the safety and welfare of the inhabitants of the city.

Messrs. Craig, Martin, & Thomason for appellee.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is well recognized in this state that "courts will not interfere with the exercise of discretionary powers conferred upon municipal corporations for the public welfare unless their action should be so clearly unreasonable as to amount to an oppressive and manifest abuse of their discretion." Rosenthal v. Goldsboro, 149 N. C. 128, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 809, 62 S. E. 905, 16 Ann. Cas. 639; Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L.R.A. 671, 19 S. E. 767. There was some limitation placed on the principle in the case of State v. Higgs, 126 N. C. 1014, 48 L.R.A. 446, 35 S. E. 473, but that case was expressly overruled in Small v. Edenton, 146 N. C. 527, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 145, 60 S. E. 413, and the opinion of the present chief justice in Small's Case is in 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

full approval of the position as it had formerly prevailed. The charter of the city of Asheville confers ample power to pass an ordinance of the general character in question. State v. Whitlock, 149 N. C. 542, 128 Am. St. Rep. 670, 63 S. E. 123, 16 Ann. Cas. 765.

And in the learned and well-considered brief of the counsel for the city it is suggested in support of the ordinance in question here that the same is reasonable and "necessary to protect the public generally from the unsafe condition caused by the accumulation of leaves, papers, and other waste material which accumulate against billboards when constructed against the ground. It is a necessary restriction to protect adjoining and other buildings contiguous thereto from the danger of fire, which could so easily be conducted from such condition. It is also necessary for the purpose of keeping vacant property in a sanitary condition." On authority here and elsewhere these considerations should, in our opinion, be allowed to prevail, and the ordinance upheld as a valid exercise of the powers conferred. Rosenthal v. Goldsboro, State v. Whitlock; and Small v. Edenton, supra; Chicago v. Gunning System, 214 Ill. 628, 70 L.R.A. 230, 73 N. E. 1035, 2 Ann. Cas. 892; Rochester v. West, 164 N. Y. 510, 53 L.R.A. 548, 79 Am. St. Rep. 659, 58 N. E. 673; Passaic v. Paterson Bill Posting, Advertising & Sign Painting Co. 71 N. J. L. 75, 58 Atl. 343; Re Wilshire (C. C.) 103 Fed. 620.

In our present decision we do not intend to qualify or question in any way the disposition made of Whitlock's Case, supra. In that case it appeared that the ordinance prohibited the erection of billboards on private property, regardless of whether the same were secure or insecure. It seemed to have been based on esthetic considerations alone, having no reference whatever to the protection and security of the public, and, on that account, it was held to be an unwarranted and unreasonable interference with the rights of the individual owner. In his forcible and learned opinion in Whitlock's Case, Associate Justice Brown states the doctrine applicable and the reasons upon which it rests as follows: "Esthetic considerations will not warrant its adoption, but those only which have for their object the safety and welfare of the community. It is conceded to be a fundamental principle under our system of government that the state may require the individual to so manage and use his property that the public health and safety are best conserved. It is to restrict the owner in those uses of his property which he may have as a matter of natural right, and make them conform to the safety and welfare of established society, that the police power of the state is invoked.

"While this is true, yet it is fundamental law that the owner of land has the right to erect such structures upon it as he may see fit, and put his property to any use which may suit his pleasure, provided that in so doing he does not imperil or threaten harm to others. Tiedeman, Pol. Power, 439. All statutory restrictions of the use of property are imposed upon the theory that they are necessary for the safety, health, or comfort of the public; but a limitation which is unnecessary and unreasonable cannot be enforced. Although the police power is a broad one, it is not without its limitations, and a secure structure upon private property, and one which is not per se an infringement upon the public safety, and is not a nuisance, cannot be made one by legislative fiat and then prohibited,"—citing Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 374. There is error, and this will be certified, that the cause be further proceeded with.

MARY L. HOLLENBAEK, Appt.,

v.

J. H. CLEMMER, Respnt.

Theater — step in exit — negligence.

1. The proprietor of a moving-picture show is not negligent in maintaining a step at the exit of the darkened room where the pictures are shown, into the corridor, so as to render him liable to a patron who, in attempting to use the exit, falls down the step, to his injury, although a light is maintained over it which tends to dazzle the eyes of persons who emerge from the darkness.

Same — unfamiliar exit — directions to use.

2. The proprietor of a moving-picture show is not negligent in directing patrons to use exits with which they are not familiar, if they are reasonably safe, so as to render him liable to a patron who falls down a step, to his injury, in attempting to use the exit to which he is directed.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County sustaining defendant's motion for a directed verdict, and dismissing an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Harris Baldwin for appellant:

Whether this case is to be determined upon the question of the defendant's negligence, or upon plaintiff's contributory negligence, the whole question in either instance is: Can the minds of reasonable men differ? If, upon the evidence, the minds of reasonable men cannot differ, the question presented is a question of law; if, however, upon the evidence the minds of reasonable men can differ, the question presented is a question of fact.

Mount, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action to recover for personal injuries. At the close of plaintiff's case, the trial court sustained defendant's motion for a directed verdict, and dismissed the action. Plaintiff has appealed.

It appears that on October 11, 1910, the respondent was conducting a moving-picture show in the city of Spokane. The plaintiff and two other ladies purchased tickets, and entered the room where the pictures were being shown. The exhibition was in progress when they entered. The room was darkened. When they entered, an usher met them at the entrance, and conducted them to seats about two thirds of the way down an aisle. They remained seated until the pictures had all been shown and a repetition was begun, when the plaintiff stated to her companions that it was time to go. Plaintiff walked into the aisle on her way out of the building, and proceeded a short distance out by the way she had entered, when she was met by an usher and directed to go out through an exit at the side of the room. She proceeded to the exit indicated, where a bright light was located directly in the corridor, and where there was a step down of about 7 inches,—an ordinary step to the floor of the corridor. She did not notice this step. She testified that the bright light dazzled her as she came out of the darkened room, and as she stepped into the corridor she fell and broke her leg. The plaintiff had never been in the place before, and was not acquainted with the arrangement thereof.

It is argued by the appellant that it was negligence to maintain the step at that place, and also negligence to direct the plaintiff to depart by a way other than the way by which she had entered. There is no merit in these contentions. It is no doubt the rule that an owner of a place of public entertainment is charged with the duty to maintain a reasonably safe place for his patrons. 38 Cyc. 268. The mere fact that a step up or one down, or a flight of steps up or down, is maintained at the entrance or exit is no evidence of negligence, especially if the step is in good repair and in plain view. There is no claim in this case that the step was in bad order, or not properly lighted, or was not in plain view of any person who might use it. In Dunn v. Kemp, 36 Wash. 183, 78 Pac. 782, we held that it was not negligence per se to maintain a stairway in a store or public place. It is not uncommon to find a step up at the entrance of places where the public is invited, and it is certainly not negligence, as a matter of law, to construct floors above the level of the streets or sidewalks. It follows that it was not negligence to maintain a step down at the exit in question. It is apparent that it was the plain duty of the plaintiff to use her sense of sight and look where she was stepping. If it was not negligence to maintain the step, it was not negligence for the defendant to direct the plaintiff to retire by that exit.

There was no error, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

VIII. Miscellaneous, 716.

I. Introductory.

"The surety," says Chancellor Kent, in Hayes v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. 123, "by his very character and relation of surety, has an interest that the mortgage taken from the principal debtor should be dealt with in good faith, and held in trust, not only for the creditor's security, but for the surety's indemnity. A mortgage so taken by the creditor is taken and held in trust, as well for the secondary interest of the surety, as for the more direct and immediate benefit of the creditor; and the latter must do no wilful act, either to poison it in the first instance, or to destroy or cancel it afterwards. These are general principles, founded in equity. . . . This doctrine does not belong merely to the civil-law system. It is equally a settled principle in the English chancery, that a surety will be entitled to every remedy which the creditor has against the principal debtor, to enforce every security, and to stand in the place of the creditor, and have his securities transferred to him, and to avail himself of those securities against the debtor. This right of the surety stands not upon contract, but upon the same principle of natural justice upon which one surety is entitled to contribution from another."

The authorities are agreed that if a creditor, without the consent of the surety, affirmatively releases collateral security, the surety is discharged; at least, to the extent of the value of the security lost. 32 Cyc. 216. But there is much difference of opinion where a loss is claimed to have occurred through the inactivity of the creditor.

The reader will find in the cases the assertion of two opposing theories: one, that the creditor owes no duty of active vigilance in regard to the collateral security; the other, that his duties towards the collateral are those of any trustee. But it would seem that, upon the adjudicated cases, on the one hand, it is doubtful whether any court would hold that under no circumstances is the creditor bound to take any affirmative action, and, on the other hand, few of the cases asserting the view of trusteeship go far along that road in actual decision, unless, perhaps, in the cases holding that the creditor must not omit to record the papers which protect his lien. And while, as will be seen hereafter, some support can be found for the decision in FIRST NAT. BANK v. KITTLE, it should be noticed here that the court has not chosen well the cases it mentions in connection with its statement that, with respect to collateral securities in his hands, "the authorities all hold the creditor bound to use proper care and diligence in the management and collection of such collateral, and that a surety is released, to the extent of the loss actually sustained by the negligence of the creditor, to the same extent as if lost by the positive act of the creditor." The cases named by the court as sustaining this proposition are Clow v. Derby Coal Co.; Phares v. Barbour; Hall v. Hoxsey; First Nat. Bank v. Parsons; and (possibly) Davenport v. State Bkg. Co. 126 Ga. 136, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 944, 115 Am. St. Rep. 68, 54 S. E. 977, 7 Ann Cas. 1000. In the Clow Case the creditor satisfied the mortgage security; in First Nat. Bank v. Parsons the creditor consented to the setting aside of a decree which was a lien on the debtor's land; in the Phares Case the creditor sold the security at auction to his dummy for a trifling price, without notice to the surety; in Hall v. Hoxsey, it was held that the surety on a lease was not discharged because the landlord declined to distrain for rent on request and notice that the tenant was about to remove; (and in the Davenport Case the judgment was against the surety).

Perhaps the real situation may be stated thus: While in general the creditor owes Kittle, and C. W. Brandon, though joint makers, were in fact sureties for V. W. Kittle, and they alone appealed, the judgment of the justice against V. W. Kittle, principal, remaining in full force, and unappealed from.

On the trial of the appeal in the circuit court, the court, on defendant's motion, struck out plaintiff's evidence, and directed a verdict in their favor, and from the judgment below, of nil capiat, and for costs, the plaintiff obtained this writ of error.

The defense of the sureties before the justice, and in the circuit court on appeal, was, that the bank, at the time of note sued on, had required of V. W. Kittle, principal, additional security, and who then, September 20, 1905, assigned to the bank, to use the language of the assignment, "$200 of the amount due me by the county court of Barbour county for work done under contract with said court for court square paving, as collateral security for the payment of said note;" and that by the negligence of the bank in failing to give notice of said assignment, and to take such steps as was necessary to preserve its own rights and the rights of defendants as sureties, the same had been lost or surrendered, and the sureties thereby discharged.

For the bank it was replied that Mary D. Kittle was estopped from denying her liability, on the grounds, first, that after the trial and judgment by the justice, she had, on October 1, 1906, joined with her husband, V. W. Kittle, in a deed to one Golden for a house and lot belonging to her, by which deed the grantee, in part consideration, had no duty of active vigilance, circumstances may arise under which he must act for the preservation of the security.

This note does not include cases between debtor and creditor as to collateral where there was no original surety, as where a debtor gives notes of third parties as collateral, or transfers a debt due him as conditional payment, or sells or assigns securities where there is recourse to him.

Cases where the security is the lien of a judgment or execution which has been lost by inaction or by having the execution returned unsatisfied are also excluded.

It is not intended to include cases which simply sustain the rule that an active release of collaterals by the creditor, or permitting the debtor to take them out of his hands, is a breach of duty.

As to effect upon the surety or indorser of bank's failure to apply principal's deposit account upon note, see the note to Davenport v. State Bkg. Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 944.

For the release of the indorser of a note by failure to enforce liability of maker, see the note to Rogers v. Detroit Sav. Bank, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 530.

For the effect of failure to present claim against the estate of a deceased or bankrupt principal to release the surety, see the note to Yerxa v. Ruthruff, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 139.

The reader will remember that the creditor need not accept additional security when offered (see Berlin Nat. Bank v. Guay, 76 N. H. 216, 81 Atl. 475, as stating this rule), nor may the surety require the creditor to accept security (see Rouss v. King, 69 S. C. 168, 48 S. E. 220, and later appeal in the same case, 74 S. C. 251, 54 S. E. 615).

In distinguishing loss through action, from loss through inaction, the expression "negligence" is not to be applied to the latter unless the failure to perform a legal duty is intended; for if it be granted that loss has occurred through what is legal "negligence," there is, of course, a legal default.

II. Duty as dependent on nature of possession or lien.

The nature of the real or constructive control over the security which the creditor has in each particular case enters largely into the consideration by the courts of the extent of his duty towards the surety; but while it cannot be comprehensively treated as a separate question, some of the judicial views in regard to it are here collected.

It has been held that the property which the creditor is required to retain must be property on which he has a lien. Thus, where a company was the creditor of one of its stockholders for his subscription for stock, as evidenced by his note, on which the defendant was the indorser, and under the statute the company might prohibit the transfer of stocks or withhold the dividends until the stock had been paid for, but did not exert this privilege, it was held that the indorser was not discharged. Perrine v. Fireman's Ins. Co. 22 Ala. 575, where the court considered that there was no lien until the option was exercised, but thought it probable that the surety could have demanded that the lien be created. Compare Fegley v. McDonald, infra, III. a, 2.

In Whitehouse v. American Surety Co. 117 Iowa, 328, 90 N. W. 727, it was said: "The law, in the absence of special statute, annexes no condition requiring the creditor . . . to do any act, no matter what his opportunity to procure security. . . . He may remain entirely passive, and rely on the undertaking of the surety. . . . What shall be deemed a security, within the meaning of these rules, is a matter upon which there has been some contrariety of decision. But we are inclined to the view that it must be a mortgage, pledge, or lien,—some right to or interest in the property which the creditor can hold in trust for the surety, and to which the surety may be subrogated." And it was held that while a laborer on a public building had a privilege which, under the covenanted to pay said judgment, then a lien on said lot; second, that subsequently, in a chancery suit of George against her, said debt had been reported, and decreed as a debt and lien on said house and lot; third, that subsequently in a suit by Howell against said Golden's administrator, and others, said judgment was reported and decreed as a personal debt against said Golden, and decreed to be paid out of his estate; and that if said debt or any part of it, should be paid out of that estate, Mary D. Kittle would be relieved pro tanto therefrom.

And as applicable to both defendants, it was said, that the bank was not bound to the utmost or even active diligence, while the sureties remained passive; and that in as much as said assignment was only collateral, and that on October 13, 1905, before said note fell due, orders were issued and paid as follows: one to V. W. Kittle, for $247.50; another for $76.84; and another to V. W. Kittle, for the use of said Charles W. Brandon, for $336.76; and that on April 10, 1906, three days after Kittle's assignment to the bank had been filed in the clerk's office of said court, said court, disregarding said assignment, had paid directly to V. W. Kittle $112.50, for extra work on said court square, the defendants have not been prejudiced by any neglect or want of diligence on the part of plaintiff.

The fact of said collateral assignment is not denied, but fully established by the proof; and it is scarcely denied that the statute, he might have enlarged into a lien upon a certain fund, he was not bound to do so, and his omission did not discharge the contractor's surety.

The first accommodation indorser is not discharged from liability to the second by the latter's failure to have an amount equal to the note retained, for purposes of set-off, from an indebtedness to the maker of the note, due from a firm of which he (the second indorser) was a member, and which indebtedness was incurred after the giving of the note, and was paid after the note had been taken up by the second indorser, since he was under no duty of active diligence to obtain the assent of his partners, necessary to a set-off. Glazier v. Douglass, 32 Conn. 393, 87 Am. Dec. 181. The court was apparently of the opinion that even if the indebtedness had been due from the second indorser individually, his failure to retain the amount of the note therefrom would not have discharged the first indorser. In this connection the court said: "The creditor shall apply in payment of the debt, or hold in trust, for the benefit of the surety, all securities which he may receive or procure for that purpose by contract or operation of law; so that, if compelled to discharge the debt, the surety may be subrogated to them. . . . In respect to what shall be deemed a security within the meaning of the condition, there has been some contrariety of decision. The better opinion is that it must be a mortgage, pledge, or lien,—some right to or interest in property which the creditor can hold in trust for the surety, and to which the surety, if he pay the debt, can be subrogated; and the right to apply or hold must exist and be absolute."

In Higdon v. Bailey, 26 Ga. 426, where a man purchased certain property of his father's estate, giving notes on which the defendants were his sureties, and thereafter the administratrix delivered to him his share in the estate without retaining anything to cover the notes, it was held that she was not bound to retain funds to indemnify the sureties.

Where the administrator of the surety upon a lease notified the landlord that the tenant was about to remove, and requested him to distrain for the rent then due, which he refused, and the tenant moved out of the state, it was held that the surety was not discharged. Hall v. Hoxsey, 84 Ill. 616.

So, where, long after the giving of a note with a surety, the debtor as tenant hired a farm from the creditor, and stipulated in the lease that the produce and profits of the farm were holden to the payment of the note, it was held that it was no defense to the surety that the landlord did not take and hold possession of the produce. The court said: "It was a mere executory agreement, authorizing the plaintiff to take possession of the produce when it should come into existence; and if he had exercised that power, and taken such possession, before the right of any creditor or purchaser had intervened, it might have given him a lien. Bartlett v. Williams, 1 Pick, 288. But until possession taken, he had no lien, and could not hold the produce against a bona fide purchaser or attaching creditor. Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 481. And we think he was not bound to active diligence in availing himself of the power to obtain a lien, any more than the holder of a note, with a surety, is bound to active diligence in securing his note by attachment of the property of the principal, when he has an opportunity to do so. 1 Story, Eq. § 325. It was a collateral security, not given at the time the note was made, but afterwards, and not taken with the knowledge or for the use and benefit of the surety. It was a means of obtaining a pledge, at the option of the plaintiff, of which he might have availed himself or not, but it did not constitute an actual security. The plaintiff's forbearing to act upon this executory agreement, and taking no measure to enforce it, was not such a voluntary relinquishment of any pledge or security as to bring the case within the principle relied on by the defendant." Taft v. Gifford, 13 Met. 187.

bank was negligent, grossly negligent, in failing to present said assignment, or give notice to the county court thereof, and demand payment. If it had done so, there is no reason to believe, and it is not shown or pretended, that the county court would not willingly and without objection have paid the bank the money which it did pay directly to Kittle. It is contended, however, that the county court was not bound to accept and pay a partial assignment of the amount due Kittle; but in equity, if not at law, it was. At all events, it is not shown that the county court decline to honor said assignment. The assignment was never presented, and the court given an opportunity to honor and pay, until it had actually paid out the money actually assigned to Kittle and others. We must say, therefore, on the evidence, that the bank lost this security, by its negligence.

We see nothing in the suggestion of counsel, in argument, based on Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pinnacle Coal Co. 44 W. Va. 574, 41 L.R.A. 414, 30 S. E. 196, that the justice had no jurisdiction to try the rights of defendants as sureties, because equitable in nature. The fact that it might have been necessary for the bank or the sureties finally to enforce its or their rights by a suit in equity furnishes no excuse for the negligence of the bank. That loss by its negligence constituted a legal defense to the action against the sureties.

But was the bank bound to active dili-

Compare Lichtenthaler v. Thompson, infra, III. b. 2.

Where the seller of land took a title bond to convey within twelve months, and did not rely at all upon a lien on the land for the purchase money, but took the purchaser's note with a surety, and after the time mentioned in the title bond gave a deed to the purchaser, and took a mortgage from him which, at his request, she did not record, as he said if he was not able to sell the land, he would surrender and cancel his deed, but instead of that he mortgaged the land, it was held that these things did not release the surety, and that the power to withhold the deed could not be considered as a collateral security, which the creditor must retain at the hazard of releasing the surety. Coombs v. Parker, 17 Ohio, 289, 49 Am. Dec. 459.

excursive character, and is apt to contain obiter views of various situations not supported by actual decisions. And here, as in every branch of the civil law where a legal distinction is made or attempted between positive and negative conduct, misfeasance and nonfeasance, commission and omission, difficulties arise in drawing the line between them. Thus, in Clopton v. Spratt, 52 Miss. 251, where the creditor, in enforcing his remedy against the collateral, which was land, omitted the most valuable part of the land, it was held that this was a positive act whereby the value of the collateral had been impaired; and that, if the creditor, in attempting to enforce the collateral, had failed to accomplish the result by reason of any negligence or want of skill on his part, the surety was pro tanto discharged; and that it was no answer to say that the omitted part of the land might still be looked to, as it was clear that the omission of the most valuable part had injured the sale.

III. Is there a duty of active vigilance?

a. In general.

1. Contradictory opinions.

As heretofore stated, two opposing views are asserted as to the nature of the creditor's duty to the surety with respect to the collateral security: one, that there is no duty of active vigilance; the other, that he holds the collateral as an active trustee.

The reasons given for the first view are (1) that the duty of activity is rather upon the surety than upon the creditor, and it is not for him to stand by and see the security lost, and then complain of the inactivity of the creditor; and (2) that at any time after default of his principal he may pay the debt and take the collateral.

The second view rests rather upon what the court considers reasonable under the circumstances than upon any specific reason. The loss of the right of subrogation is not, of course, a reason, as the question is how far the creditor is obliged to go to preserve the surety's right of subrogation.

The discussion in the cases is often of an

2. Various judicial views.

In English v. Seibert, 49 Mo. App. 563, where, after judgment against the principal and surety, the judgment creditor took a chattel mortgage on a crop of wheat from the principal debtor, who, however, declined to acknowledge it so that it could be recorded, and the creditor did not make any effort to prevent the disposal of the wheat by the debtor, it was held that this did not discharge the surety. The court said: "We know of no case where it is held that if, by his mere negligence or nonaction, the lien or security becomes fruitless, this releases the surety. It is indeed said by Judge Norton, in giving the opinion of the court in Priest v. Watson, 75 Mo. 315, 42 Am. Rep. 409, that, 'if the payee has a specific lien on the property of the debtor sufficient to satisfy the debt, and voluntarily surrenders the lien or loses it by his own neglect, the surety will be discharged.' But it is evident that in this dictum the learned judge was not using language with his usual care. He seems to have been misled into the expression by gence? The authorities cited and relied on by plaintiff's counsel hold that a creditor is not bound to active diligence in pursuing his principal debtor, unless required by the sureties to do so. But this proposition, and the authority cited for it, we think inapplicable to the duty of a creditor respecting collateral securities in his hands. With respect to such securities the authorities all hold the creditor bound to use proper care and diligence in the management and collection of such collateral, and that a surety is released to the extent of the loss actually sustained by the negligence of the creditor, to the same extent as if lost by the positive act of the creditor. This proposition we think fully sustained by the following: 1 Brandt, Suretyship, 3d ed. §§ 480, 481, 482 & 498; Clow v. Derly Coal Co. 98 Pa. 432; Phares v. Barbour, 49 Ill. 370; Hall v. Hoxsey, 84 Ill. 616; First Nat. Bank v. Parsons, 42 W. Va. 137, 24 S. E. 554; 32 Cyc. 216, and many cases cited in notes; Davenport v. State Bkg. Co. 115 Am. St. Rep. 100, note page 100.

If the bank had given due notice to the county court, or filed said assignment in time to preserve its and the sureties' rights thereunder, the bank might not have been bound, in order to preserve its rights against defendants, to have pursued the county court by suit. It was, however, in the interest of the sureties, bound to preserve those rights by diligence. It is following the language of the syllabus in Ferguson v. Turner, 7 Mo. 497. That syllabus does not correctly state the doctrine of the court." The court goes on to state that in the Ferguson Case the ground of the decision was not the omission by the creditor to record the deed of trust, but because of his affirmative act in causing the execution which had become a specific lien on the property to be returned unsatisfied. The court said further: "When it is said that, in such a case, the creditor, by taking additional security or acquiring a lien, constitutes himself a trustee for the surety in order to preserve for his benefit the advantage thus gained, it is not meant that he constitutes himself an active trustee in the sense of being obliged to go forward and take any other affirmative steps for the benefit of the surety. The meaning is that he can go forward as far as he wishes, but that having by going forward acquired any advantage, he cannot voluntarily go backward and surrender it."

In Vance v. English, 78 Ind. 80, where the surety alleged that she became such by reason of the fact that there was a mortgage securing the debt, and she alleged further that an older mortgage had been foreclosed, the creditor making default, and not notifying her of the foreclosure, and that it was now too late for her to redeem, it was held that this was no discharge of her contract. The court said: "It is also the duty of the creditor to use all reasonable care in the preservation of all collateral securities which he may have acquired for the security of his debt, and to which the surety has a right to become subrogated on payment of the debt, but it has never been held that the mere passiveness of the creditor in the collection of his debt, either of the principal debtor, or from collateral securities held by him, is sufficient ground for discharging the surety. As regards collateral securities, the creditor must be guilty of some wrongful act, such as by a release or fraudulent surrender of such securities, in order to discharge the surety. . . . If, when she indorsed the notes, she relied upon the mortgage for her indemnity, she was much more interested in maintaining intact the lien of the mortgage than was the appellee, and it involved upon her to take whatever measures were necessary for the preservation of that lien in case she continued to rely upon it. It follows, from what we have said, that the appellee was under no legal obligation to notify the appellant of the institution of the suit by Fletcher to foreclose his mortgage."

In Fanning v. Murphy, 126 Wis. 538, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 666, 110 Am. St. Rep. 946, 105 N. W. 1056, 5 Ann. Cas. 435, where it was claimed that a surety of a note secured by mortgage was released by laches of the creditor in not proceeding to collect the indebtedness after it became due, the court said: "The conclusive answer to that is, as counsel for respondent suggests, the payee of an instrument having a principal obligor and surety owes no duty of active vigilance to the latter to enforce collection of the indebtedness. The way is open to the surety at any time after default of his principal to pay the debt and reimburse himself by enforcing the obligation of such principal and the cosureties, if there be such."

In Schroeppell v. Shaw, 3 N. Y. 446, where the creditor had not proceeded to foreclose a mortgage security as early as possible, Harris, J., said of the surety who was the plaintiff in the suit: "There was no time after the first instalment upon the bond and mortgage became due, when the plaintiff was not in default, and liable to be sued for such default. To allow him to take advantage of any want of diligence in the defendant in collecting the bond and mortgage, under such circumstances, seems very much like allowing a man to take advantage of his own wrong. If the defendant was guilty of negligence, the plaintiff was guilty of a positive omission of duty. The defendant was under no higher obligation to collect the bond and mortgage than the plaintiff was to pay the note, and take the bond and mortgage himself. . . . In reference to collateral securities, the rule is the same as in reference to the collection shown in this case to have neglected that duty.

It is very clear, therefore, unless Mrs. Kittle is estopped by her acts, as claimed, from denying her liability, or she and her codefendant Brandon have not been prejudiced by the negligence of the plaintiff in the premises, that they have both presented complete defenses to the action.

We do not find any element of estoppel in the fact that in the deed to Golden, Golden covenanted to pay the bank the judgment recovered before the justice, then pending in the circuit court on appeal by Mrs. Kittle and Brandon; nor in the fact that in the subsequent decrees in the two chancery cases referred to, that judgment was allowed and decreed. Those decrees were involuntary on her part. The plaintiff was in no way prejudiced by anything done or omitted by Mrs. Kittle. When she sold her property to Golden the lien of the judgment existed. Some provision had to be made to protect the purchaser. The parties chose to make such provision in the deed. The bank was no party to that agreement, did not rely thereon to its prejudice. For this reason plaintiff is not in a position to plead estoppel.

For a like reason it may be said with respect to the decrees in the chancery suits. The judgment of the bank had been recovered. It was a lien as it stood, though appealed from, certainly as to V. W. Kittle. Evidently nothing was ever realized by the bank in those suits, and we do not see any-of the debt of the principal debtor. The creditor is under no obligation of active diligence for the protection of the surety, so long as the surety himself remains inactive. Until the surety moves in the matter, it is enough that the creditor holds himself in readiness to transfer to him, when he applies, all the securities he holds, that he may have the benefit of such securities in aid of his own responsibility. . . . In no single instance has it ever been held that the mere passiveness of the creditor in the collection of his debt, either of the principal debtor or from collateral securities held by him, is sufficient ground for discharging the surety from his liability. No rule is more uniformly recognized than that mere indulgence, at the will of the creditor, however long, or whatever may be the consequences, will not operate to discharge the surety. I think it may safely be added that this rule is equally applicable whether the indulgence is extended towards the principal debtor, or towards a third person, liable to the creditor upon a collateral security. The criterion by which to determine in any and every case, whether a creditor has done, or omitted to do, anything which will have the effect to exonerate the surety, is stated, as I think, with perfect accuracy by Judge Story, as follows: 'If a creditor does any act injurious to the surety, or inconsistent with his rights; or if he omits to do any act, when required by the surety, which his duty enjoins him to do, and the omission proves injurious to the surety; in all such cases the latter will be discharged, and he may set up such conduct as a defense to any suit brought against him, if not at law, at all events, in equity.' But in another part of the same opinion, Harris, J., considers that the passiveness of the creditor, outside of the failure to collect upon the security, might discharge the surety. He states that in Capel v. Butler, infra, "the plaintiff had become surety on the faith of the vessels being effectually assigned as a security for the annuity;" and continues: "For the defendant to omit an act necessary to render the assignment effectual was equivalent to a surrender of the security to the principal debtor." 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

pal debtor. It was like the case of a creditor taking a mortgage upon personal property and omitting to file it, or the omission of the creditor to protest a note held by him as collateral security, so as to charge the indorser. In these and similar cases, a surety whose means of indemnity had been impaired by the neglect of the creditor to do what was necessary to protect the security might well insist upon his right to be discharged, to the extent of the loss sustained by reason of such neglect. If, for example, in the case under consideration, the mortgaged premises had been sold upon the foreclosure of the prior mortgage, the defendant would have been bound to take the necessary measures to secure the surplus moneys arising from the sale. . . . Such cases of negligence, however, differ very widely in principle from mere inactivity in the collection of a debt held as collateral security. It was well said by the court below, in noticing the case of Capel v. Butler, that "the nature of the security required something to be done at once by the creditor to make it a valid security, and hence the law should, as it doubtless did, imply an agreement on his part to perform that act without which the security was invalid. An omission to do this would be gross neglect in an agent, bailee, or trustee, and would be a breach of good faith on the part of the creditor towards the surety." It is this kind of negligence, undoubtedly, to which Justice Story refers when he says (Story, Eq. § 326) that "if the creditor has any security from the debtor, and by his gross negligence it is lost, that will operate, at least, to the value of the security, to discharge the surety."

In Clopton v. Spratt, 52 Miss. 251, where it was conceded that no mere forbearance or nonaction on the part of the creditor toward the principal debtors would release the surety, but it was insisted that this applied only to forbearance or passiveness in the pursuit of property belonging to the principal persons, and that it did not apply to claims upon third persons which had been turned over by the principal debtor as collateral (being here land notes of a thing in the record thereof, so far as presented, estopping Mrs. Kittle in this action.

But were defendants prejudiced by the negligence of the plaintiff? They were not, if, as intimated in the record and in argument, either got the money, or the benefit thereof, paid out on orders of the county court to Kittle, subsequent to said assignment. That Mrs. Kittle is the wife of V. W. Kittle, without more, is not sufficient to show that she was benefited in such a way as to excuse the bank from loss due to its negligence. It is not prov-third person), the court, in denying the point, said: "The surety is in all respects equally bound with the principal for the payment of the debt, so far as the creditor is concerned. He can therefore never claim to be released without showing that he has been in some manner damaged by the act of the latter. No mere laches on the part of the creditor, short of a bar of the statute of limitations, can have this effect, for several reasons. In the first place the surety—who, in the eyes of the law, so far as the creditor is concerned, is as much an original debtor as his principal—is himself always in default and guilty of laches, after the maturity of the debt, in not paying it off; secondly, he may at any time, by paying it off, become himself the owner of the original debt, as well as entitled to the control of all collaterals by which it is protected, or he may compel the creditor to sue and exhaust the principal, or he may, before the maturity of the debt, by bill quia timet, compel proceedings to collect the collaterals if he deems them likely to depreciate or be destroyed by lapse of time. With all these remedies in his hands, why should he be allowed to sit still and do nothing, and then be heard to complain because his creditor has done the same thing? The creditor, it is true, is his trustee of all securities placed in his hands for the protection of the debt; but surely he is no more bound to protect the surety than the latter, with the same facilities, is bound to protect himself. The creditor discharges his duty when he takes care that no affirmative act of his shall either diminish the value of the security, or tie up his own hands against the principal debtor, or release any claim he holds against the property of the latter."

In Brick v. Freehold Nat. Bkg. Co. 37 N. J. L. 307, where it was claimed that, owing to the neglect of the creditor to sell, the collateral had somewhat depreciated, the court, while not satisfied that there had been any material depreciation beyond wear and tear, said: "It is well settled that mere delay by the creditor to sue the principal debtor will not discharge the surety, for the obvious reason that the surety may at any time discharge his obligation to the creditor, and thus make the principal his debtor. The same rule holds when collaterals are pledged by the principal debtor. The surety may at any time after the debt becomes due and owing discharge it and take the collaterals. The law implies no contract on the part of the creditor to proceed on the collaterals before he can sue the surety. Nor are the rights of the parties affected by the fact that the collaterals have depreciated between the time of the maturity of the debt for payment of which they were pledged, and the commencement of suit against the surety."

Theory of active vigilance.

Where the creditor and his assignee had, as collateral security, a mortgage on property which was already held by trustees upon prior trusts, and the creditor and the assignee both failed to notify such trustees of the existence of their mortgage, so that the trustees distributed the property without notice of the claim, it was held that the surety was discharged. Strange v. Fooks, 4 Giff. 408, where Stuart, V. C., said: "It is perfectly established in this court that if, through any neglect on the part of a creditor, a security to the benefit of which a surety is entitled is lost, or is not properly perfected, the surety is discharged. . . . It seems to me that this case comes within the general doctrine of the court that a surety being entitled to the benefit of every security, where a security is lost through the negligence of the principal creditor by his not having had it perfected in the proper way, the surety is released to that extent."

In Fegley v. McDonald, 89 Pa. 128, where the debtor sent his creditor a check for the amount of the debt, not having funds in the bank that day, but deposited them the following day, and the creditor did not deposit or use the check for a week, on the last day of which the bank appropriated the money to a debt of the debtor to it, it was held that the surety was discharged. The court said: "The rule is well settled that when a creditor has in his hands the means of paying his debt out of the property of his principal debtor, and does not use it, but gives it up, the surety is discharged. It need not be actually in the hands of the creditor; if it be within his control, so that, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, he may have realized his pay out of it, yet voluntarily and by supine negligence relinquished it, the surety is discharged."

In Mingus v. Daugherty, 87 Iowa, 56, 43 Am. St. Rep. 354, 54 N. W. 66, it was held that when a creditor holds a landlord's lien for the debt due to him, it is a security; and if, through his act or neglect, that security is lost in whole or in part without the consent of a personal surety, it works a discharge of the personal surety to the extent of the security lost; but whether it was his duty to enforce his landlord's lien is a question for the jury.

en, or attempted to be, that Brandon did not have a bona fide debt against Kittle for the amount of the order of the county court to his use; or that he was in any way benefited by the orders issued in favor of Kittle individually; or that either Mrs. Kittle or Brandon knew, as a fact, that the bank had not presented its assignment to the county court, and protected its own rights as creditor, and their rights as sureties.

For these considerations, we conclude that the judgment below was right, and should be affirmed.

The court said: "All that the law required of the appellant was the exercise of reasonable diligence in preserving his lien. What would be reasonable diligence depends upon the facts and circumstances. So long as he had no reason to anticipate loss by delay, he was not bound to proceed, nor was he bound to bring an action, if the amount of property covered by the lien did not justify it. . . . Whether it was the duty of the appellant to enforce his landlord's lien was a question that should have been submitted to the jury. It is not the law that the sureties are entitled to be exonerated merely because he did not enforce it. He must have been negligent in not doing so, and loss resulted from his negligence."

In Galbraith v. Townsend, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 447, 20 S. W. 943, where it appeared that losses had occurred, among other things, from failure to record a chattel mortgage and failure to prevent the shipping out of the state by the mortgagor of mortgaged sheep, the court, in denying that the creditor might remain inactive, said: "While it is true that, for the purpose of having an execution run against the property of the principal, generally, it does not require, for the protection of the surety, that the payee of a note shall institute suit at any particular time, unless requested in writing to do so by the surety, yet, when property is pledged to the creditor, by mortgage or otherwise, to secure a debt, and the latter has the right to control the property, he becomes trustee for the surety as well as the principal, and he rests under the same obligations that other trustees similarly situated do. The surety, by paying the debt, has the right of subrogation to all the security held by the creditor, and the law demands of the trustee—the creditor—the exercise of reasonable care and diligence for the preservation of the property, to the end that it may be devoted to the purpose for which the trust was created,—the payment of the debt."

In Nelson v. Munch, 28 Minn. 314, 9 N. W. 863, where the creditor permitted the proceeds of collateral realized by him to be absorbed by the debtor's firm, and also permitted them to absorb certain lumber transferred to him by bill of sale in trust, to be sold and the proceeds applied upon the debt, the court said, in crediting the sureties with the value of these items: "It is a well-settled rule of equity that any laches by the creditor in the care or management of collateral remedies or securities, if loss ensues, will discharge the surety pro tanto; that is, so far as he is actually damnified. This rule follows from the right of subrogation on the part of the surety. When a surety pays the debt of his principal, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor to all collaterals held by him for the payment of the debt. This right of subrogation implies an obligation on the part of the creditor to keep it unimpaired; and if this duty is violated, the loss must be borne by him who is in default. In short, the equity of a surety depends on the right of subrogation, and the consequent duty of the creditor to do no act by which the exercise of that right may be frustrated."

(The principle of the Nelson Case is approved in Bandler v. Bradley, 110 Minn. 66, 124 N. W. 644, where, however, the question was not decided.)

b. Particular inactivities.

1. Failure to sell or foreclose against the collateral.

The mere failure to sell or foreclose against the collateral will not discharge the surety. Clopton v. Spratt, 52 Miss. 251; Brick v. Freehold Nat. Bkg. Co. 37 N. J. L. 307; Schroeppell v. Shaw, 3 N. Y. 446; Fanning v. Murphy, 126 Wis. 538, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 666, 110 Am. St. Rep. 946, 105 N. W. 1056, 5 Ann. Cas. 435; Gray v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, infra; Bank of Montreal v. Davy, infra.

In Lancaster v. Johnson, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 244, it was held that the failure of a creditor to take personal judgment on lien notes held by him as collateral, the payor being insolvent, did not release the sureties in the note for the payment of which the lien notes were held as collateral.

So, in Howe Mach. Co. v. Farrington, 82 N. Y. 121, it was held that the mere failure of the creditor to enforce a security or secure the application of the property upon the debt did not release the surety, but here it did not appear that the security had become in any way impaired.

In Cherry v. Miller, 7 Lea, 305, where bonds had been deposited as collateral security for a note, and were not sold at the time of the maturity of the note, and at the time of their sale had depreciated, it was held that, in the absence of a request by the principal debtor or the surety to sell the bonds, the surety was not discharged, and that the creditor was not responsible for a depreciation in the collaterals, and that a mere omission to act or passive negligence of the creditor, the surety himself being inactive, would not discharge such surety.

But in Bank of Gettysburg v. Thompson, 3 Grant, Cas. 114, the court seemed to be of the opinion that a creditor who took the assignment of a note as collateral security must use due diligence to collect it; but it was held in that case that the sureties were estopped from claiming that they were discharged under the circumstances.

In Murrell v. Scott, 51 Tex. 520, where the debtor made a mortgage in trust to a third person to secure the debt, it was held, in an action against principal and surety, that the court properly charged the jury that the creditor was not legally bound to require the trustee to proceed to carry out the terms or conditions of the trust deed, and that any failure or default of the trustee fully to carry out the trust would not affect the legal right of the creditor to recover, unless it was further shown that such failure or default was procured by the fraudulent acts or procurements of the creditor, or expressly authorized by him.

The opinion is expressed in some of the cases that the surety would be discharged by the creditor's failure to proceed in time to avoid the statute of limitations, but the question does not seem to have been decided. In Pfirsching v. Peterson, 98 Ill. App. 70, where, in an action by a chattel mortgagor against the mortgagee, seeking to enjoin the foreclosure of the mortgage, a decree was entered for the defendant, permitting the foreclosure, and the defendant permitted the lien of the mortgage to expire, the court, while not deciding the question, was of the opinion that the surety in the appeal bond would be exonerated by such inaction. Compare New York Nat. Exch. Bank v. Jones, infra, III. b, 4, as to failure to refile a chattel mortgage; where, however, the court also found it unnecessary to decide the question.

Special agreements requiring activity.

In Berman v. Elm Loan & Sav. Asso. 114 Md. 191, 78 Atl. 1104, it was held that where there is a stipulation in the contract of suretyship as a condition of the surety's execution that the creditor will diligently enforce the payment of a mortgage held as collateral security to the principal debt, proof of the failure to perform such stipulation to the satisfaction of the jury will be a good defense to the surety.

Where the defendant gave his promissory note to the plaintiff as collateral security for a note and mortgage of a third party, and the understanding between them was that, as soon as the note of the third party became due, the plaintiff would proceed to collect it at once, and that the defendant should only be liable for the deficiency, and the plaintiff did not take any steps to collect the first note until some four years after it was due, it was held that the surety was discharged. Bouche v. Louttit, 104 Cal. 230, 37 Pac. 902.

In Crim v. Fleming, 101 Ind. 154, where certain fees due the debtor were assigned to the creditor, and the first paragraph of 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the complaint alleged a reassignment by the creditor, but the second paragraph did not allege such reassignment, the court said: "The second paragraph of the complaint is good, for the reason that it shows that the creditor undertook to collect the fees assigned to him, and that he negligently failed to do so. The complainant shows more than mere passiveness on the part of the creditor, for it shows that he permitted the principal debtor to collect the fees and appropriate them to his own use. It is quite clear that a creditor who receives from the principal debtor securities which he undertakes to collect and apply on the debt is guilty of positive negligence if he surrenders them to the principal debtor, and permits him to collect and appropriate the proceeds. Equity will not suffer the rights of the surety to be thus frittered away. There was here an express agreement to collect and apply the money to the payment of the debt, and it was a violation of this agreement to permit the principal debtor to regain possession of the securities and use them for his own benefit."

But where a note recited that certain certificates of stock were pledged as security, which stock the payee "may, after maturity of this note, sell for cash, or on time, as she may deem best, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the note, and any deficit remaining thereafter is to be made good by the sureties hereof," and there was no request to sell the security, the court said: "The holder of collateral securities, in the absence of an agreement upon his part to dispose of them at a certain time, is not liable for his failure to realize on the securities, unless he has been directed by the pledgor or surety to proceed to enforce their collection by a sale or otherwise, or he has such information as would put an ordinarily prudent business man on notice that action must be taken to prevent loss on the securities. To put it in another way, the pledgee is only held to the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, and is not responsible for loss unless it results from negligence or bad faith upon his part." Cromwell v. Rankin, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 123, 97 S. W. 415.

2. Failure to take possession of collateral covered by a mortgage or lien.

In Otis v. Von Storch, 15 R. I. 41, 23 Atl. 39, it was held that it was necessary to show that the creditor had come into possession of personal property of the debtor mortgaged as collateral security, and afterwards relinquished it; and it was not sufficient to show that with a little more care he could have taken possession.

See also, in this connection, Myers v. Farmers' State Bank, infra, e.

In English v. Seibert, 49 Mo. App. 563, where, after judgment against the principal and surety, the judgment creditor took a chattel mortgage on a crop of wheat from the principal debtor, who, however, declined to acknowledge it so that it could be recorded, and the creditor did not make any effort to prevent the disposal of the wheat by the debtor, it was held that this did not discharge the surety.

And in Freaner v. Yingling, 37 Md. 491, where a mortgage of personal property on a stock of goods in a store had been made after the loan, and not part of the original transaction, it was held that the creditor was not compelled to take the goods out of the debtor's hands, whereby they were lost, and that the surety was not discharged by this omission.

A surety who stands by and sees the principal debtor consume part of the crops mortgaged as collateral security for the debt cannot then set up the negligence of the creditor in regard to the crops so consumed. Grisard v. Hinson, 50 Ark. 229, 6 S. W. 906, where the court said: "The surety," says Lord Eldon (Eyre v. Everett, 2 Russ. Ch. 381), 'has no right to say that he is discharged from the debt which he has engaged to pay, together with the principal, if all that he rests on is the passive conduct of the creditor in not suing. He must himself use diligence, and take such effective means as will enable him to call on the creditor either to sue or to give him, the surety, the means of suing.'"

But in Galbraith v. Townsend (supra, III. a, 2), where losses had occurred from failure to prevent the shipping out of the state of mortgaged sheep, the court held that the creditor rested under the same obligation as other trustees.

Landlord and tenant.

In Ewing v. Williams, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 319, 39 S. W. 843, supra, it was held that the failure of the landlord to enforce his lien upon the crops did not discharge the surety, although the surety asked him, at the time that the crops were being removed, to enforce such lien.

See also, in this connection, Hall v. Hoxsey, supra, II.

So, in Taft v. Gifford, 13 Met. 187, supra, where, long after the giving of a note with a surety, the debtor, as tenant, hired a farm from the creditor, and stipulated in the lease that the produce and profits of the farm were holden to the payment of the note, it was held that it was no defense to the surety that the landlord did not take and hold possession of the produce.

And see also, for cases under the Louisiana statute, infra, d, 2.

But where, by the agreement between a landlord and tenant and a surety, it was stated that the landlord would "retain a lien on the crops, to secure the payment of the above sum," and the landlord simply allowed the crops to be taken off the premises, it was held that the surety was discharged. Hubbard v. Pace, 34 Ark. 80, where the landlord was an administrator, and, as an individual, he was in partnership with the tenant, and this partnership 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sold the crops, and it was held that his position as administrator did not affect the question at issue.

See also Taylor v. Scott, infra, VI., and Mingus v. Daugherty, supra, III. a, 2.

And it was held in Lichtenthaler v. Thompson, 13 Serg. & R. 157, 15 Am. Dec. 581, where the surety of a tenant called upon the landlord to claim his lien from the officer who had seized the tenant's goods in execution, but he declined to do so, that the surety was discharged.

In Bell v. Howerton, 111 N. C. 69, 15 S. E. 891, where a landlord brought an action against the tenant by virtue of his landlord's lien, for the possession of cotton grown on the premises, and the same having been seized, was relinquished under claim and delivery proceedings in the suit on the giving of the usual undertaking, the principal and sureties in which were solvent, and the landlord afterwards submitted to a nonsuit, and thereafter brought an action on the bond given him by his tenant for rent, with a surety, it was held that the surety was discharged.

In Kesler v. Linker, 82 N. C. 456, where a judgment for the creditor was reversed for omitting to submit to the jury the question whether the creditor had agreed to active vigilance as to growing crops mortgaged as security, it was held that while without an express agreement to that effect there is no duty of active vigilance on the part of the principal creditor, "when there is such an agreement or understanding, the creditor is bound to active diligence; and if by his neglect the property is lost, or destroyed, or surrendered, the surety will be exonerated to the extent of the value of the property conveyed in the mortgage or other security, which might be secured by proper diligence; and the reason is because, by the understanding or agreement to look after the mortgage and see that the property conveyed therein shall be applied to the debt, it put to sleep the vigilance of the surety, and produces a false confidence, but for which he might have taken security for his own indemnification."

Where title of chattel sold is retained as security.

Where machines were sold, to remain the property of the sellers until paid for, and notes of the purchasers were taken, guaranteed by the seller's agent, it was held to be no defense to an action upon these guaranties that the sellers permitted the property to remain in the hands of the buyers, and neglected and refused to take it from them and sell it as the contract permitted. Fuller v. Tomlinson Bros. 58 Iowa, 111, 12 N. W. 127.

So, in Massey-Harris Co. v. Graham, 12 West. L. Rep. 593, it was held, where a chattel had been sold, the title to remain in the seller until payment was made, that the seller was not required to repossess himself of the chattel, and to sell it in order to protect the surety.

In Sheldon v. Williams, 11 Neb. 272, 9 N. W. 86, the court seems to have held a similar opinion; but it is doubtful whether the case goes further than to hold that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the creditor.

3. Defaulting in suits.

It was held in Vance v. English, 78 Ind. 80, where the creditor held mortgage security which was swept away by the foreclosure of an older mortgage, the creditor making default in the foreclosure, and not notifying the surety of it, that the surety could not complain.

So, in Carver v. Steele, 116 Cal. 116, 58 Am. St. Rep. 156, 47 Pac. 1007, where the principal debtor gave a note and a mortgage, and the sureties indorsed the note, and a prior mortgagee foreclosed his mortgage, and the principal creditor made default, so that his mortgage was extinguished, it was held that he had not lost his recourse against the sureties, even supposing that it was the law that his default would have prevented him from maintaining any personal action against the mortgagor.

Where a creditor having a mortgage, the mortgaged lands became delinquent in taxes, and were sold at a tax sale, and the purchaser brought an action to clear his title, in which the creditor did not appear, and so lost his lien, it was held that the surety was not discharged. Wasson v. Hodshire, 108 Ind. 26, 8 N. E. 621.

But compare where the omission to appear is the result of fraudulent collusion against the surety. Clark v. State National Bank, infra, VII.

And compare as to submission to non-suit, Bell v. Howerton, supra, III. b, 2.

4. Failure to record papers.

By the weight of authority, if the security is lost by the failure of the creditor to record mortgages, etc., the surety will be pro tanto discharged; but some of the courts hold the contrary.

Where a county treasurer lent some of the school fund upon the note of a debtor and a surety, and took also a mortgage, but failed to record it for over two months, and until after the recording of a subsequent mortgage to a third party, it was held that the surety was discharged. Sullivan v. State, 59 Ark. 47, 26 S. W. 194.

Where, during negotiations to procure a surety the creditor agreed to take a mortgage from the debtor and have it recorded for the surety's protection as well as his own, and the surety asked him to permit him to take the mortgage for record, but he refused, and delivered it to an agent, who recorded it in the wrong county, whereby the lien of it was lost, other mortgages having intervened before it was properly recorded, it was held that the surety was 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) discharged. Redlon v. Heath, 59 Kan. 255, 52 Pac. 862.

So, where it appeared that the surety signed a note in reliance on the debtor that he would give a certain mortgage on personal property to the creditor, which was done, and the creditor failed to register the mortgage, whereby the mortgaged property, which was sufficient to have paid the debt, was lost, it was held that the surety was discharged. Bennett v. Taylor, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 30, 93 S. W. 704. See also to similar effect Galbraith v. Townsend (supra, III. a, 2).

Also where the creditor failed to register a mortgage of personal property, and failed to take possession of the property mortgaged, the debtor being in default for interest, and the creditor knowing that his bankruptcy was imminent, it was held that the surety was discharged to the extent of the value of the security lost by this neglect of the creditor. Wulff v. Jay, L. R. 7 Q. B. 756.

In Capel v. Butler, 2 Sim. & Stu. 457, 4 L. J. Ch. 69, where a man became surety on the faith of certain securities being given for the debt, among which were certain vessels, the transfer of which was not registered under the statute by the creditor, and being without this register they were sold by the debtor and lost as a security, it was held that they being lost by the neglect of the creditor, the surety was discharged so far as their value was concerned.

And in State Bank v. Bartle, 114 Mo. 276, 21 S. W. 816, it was held that if a deed of trust was delivered to the creditor as collateral security for notes in which the surety was accommodation indorser, with a view of protecting the indorser, as well as affording additional security to the creditor, and if the omission to record the instrument was prejudicial to the surety, and not with his consent, he should be pro tanto exonerated. But a judgment against the surety was affirmed.

In Burr v. Boyer, 2 Neb. 265, the court, while recognizing and holding that where the creditor has received a chattel mortgage as collateral security, if, through his failure to record or file the mortgage, the property is lost to the surety, this is an exoneration of him pro tanto, holds nevertheless that where, nearly a year after the claim came due, the surety alleged that the property was lost, this did not show that it was lost at the time the surety ought to have paid the debt.

No duty to record papers.

In Hampton v. Levy, 1 M'Cord, Eq. 107, it was held (in reversing the chancellor's decision) that the creditor's neglect to record a mortgage given to secure the debt would not discharge the surety on the debt, although the failure to record the mortgage resulted in the loss of the lien.

In Lang v. Brevard, 3 Strobb. L. 59, the Hampton Case was approved and followed as to the failure to record the mortgage.

So, in Jephson v. Maunsell, 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 132, affirming 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 38, it was held that the surety on a lease was not discharged by the failure to enroll the tenant's recognizance whereby the priority of lien was lost.

And in New York Nat. Exch. Bank v. Jones, 9 Daly, 248, the court, while not considering it necessary to decide in the case, was of the opinion that the failure of the creditor to refile a chattel mortgage did not discharge the surety.

In Pickens v. Finney, 12 Smedes & M. 468, where the creditor obtained a judgment and an execution which was bonded with complainant as surety, and at that time the debtor had sufficient property, but the creditor failed to enroll the judgment so as to preserve the lien, and the property was taken by inferior judgments, it was held that the surety was not discharged. The court said: "Forbearance or mere passiveness on the part of the creditor will not release the surety; but he must do no positive act which would increase the hazard of the surety."

In Philbrooks v. McEwen, 29 Ind. 347, where the creditor neglected to have recorded a mortgage of the debtor and his wife covering ample personal property of the husband to have paid the debt, and also real property of the wife, and the debtor was thus enabled to sell the personal property, leaving the wife's real estate to bear the burden, it was held that, in the absence of a request by her to the creditor, he was not bound to record the mortgage, and the wife was not discharged. The court distinguished Capel v. Butler, supra, on the ground that in that case there was an express agreement that the surety became such on the faith of the vessels becoming effectually assigned as a security for the debt. The court said: "We know of no American case where loss of another security, in consequence of mere passiveness, in the absence of a request to act, has been held to discharge the surety."

5. Miscellaneous omissions.

In Gillespie v. Darwin, 6 Heisk. 21, where the principal debtor died, and an order was made requiring claims to be presented in court, and the claim was presented, and enough of the estate sold to pay all the claims, and the creditor did not apply to have his claim paid from the money in court, it was held that the surety was discharged, and that the payment into court of the proceeds of the sale sufficient to pay all the claims was a discharge of the surety. The court stated that if the creditor who has had or ought to have had the securities "in his full possession or power loses them or permits them to get into the possession of the debtor, the surety will, to the extent of such security, be discharged."

So, where the money of a principal debtor upon which the plaintiff's judgment was a lien was actually brought into court, and the plaintiff neglected to obtain it, it was held that the surety was discharged. Ramsey v. Westmoreland Bank, 2 Penr. & W. 203.

See also Fegley v. McDonald, III. a, 2, for failure to deposit a check.

In comparison with Strange v. Fooks, supra, III. a, 2, reference should be made to Macdonald v. Bell, 3 Moore, P. C. C. 315, which arose at the Cape of Good Hope, in which it was held that under the civil law, where a mortgage was lost through the neglect of the creditor to enforce it, the sureties were not discharged, there being no act done by the creditor, which was the Crown, and which omitted to claim its mortgage on the sale of the property. The case, however, is not very satisfactory, as it is stated that the conveyance, free from the mortgage, was "with the sanction of the government;" yet the court said: "If the title of the Crown, therefore, was lost, it was not by a positive act, but an omission."

c. Particular agreements.

(See also supra, III. b, 2.)

Where, in accordance with the understanding of the parties, personal property which, as collateral security, was covered by a lien, was annexed to real estate, and thus became subject to a mortgage on the real estate, so that the lien was lost, it was held that the surety was not discharged. Evans v. Kister, 35 C. C. A. 28, 92 Fed. 828.

In Watts v. Shuttleworth, 7 Hurlst. & N. 353, 7 Jur. N. S. 945, 5 L. T. N. S. 58, 15 Week. Rep. 132, where a contract was made to complete fittings, and provided that the owner "shall and may" insure, and deduct the amount of the premium from the amount of the contract, and the owner failed to insure, and there was a loss by fire, it was held that one guarantying the performance of the contract was entirely discharged.

So, where an agreement for the building of a church provided that "the owner, the church, shall protect by insurance to cover his interest when payments have been made to contractor," and the church was destroyed by fire before it was finished, and the insurance was only partial, it was held that the sureties on the building contract were exonerated. Gallagher v. St. Patrick's Church, 45 Neb. 535, 63 N. W. 864.

Where the creditor held two debts of his debtor, on one of which there was a surety, whom he promised that, on realizing from the security held for the other debt, he would also collect from it the debt for which the surety was holden, and thereafter he did not collect this debt from the proceeds of the security, but turned the property over to the debtor without notice to the surety, it was held that the creditor could not recover from the surety, who might have tried to get other security had it not been for the promise. Strong v. Wooster, 6 Vt. 536.

Where part of sheep mortgaged as collateral security to a bank was, before any default, sold by the mortgagor upon six months' credit, with the assent of the mortgagee, which inquired into and approved the purchaser's credit, and which discounted the purchaser's note for the purchase money, indorsed by the mortgagor, and passed the proceeds to the latter's credit, and he drew out the amount, and the note was dishonored, it was held that the sureties who had bound themselves to reimburse and pay to the bank all moneys which the mortgagor should borrow from it, or which it should lend, pay, or advance to him up to a certain sum, were not discharged, although they had no notice of the sale, as it was held to have been within the contemplation of the parties that the mortgagor should manage the sheep, and from time to time make sales thereof, the court considering that it did not appear that the sale upon six months' credit was not in the usual course of business. Taylor v. Bank of New South Wales, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 596, 55 L. J. P. C. N. S. 47, 55 L. T. N. S. 444.

But compare Lakenan v. North Missouri Trust Co. 147 Mo. App. 48, 126 S. W. 547, where the principal debtor sold cattle which were security for the debt under a chattel mortgage, and deposited the money with the creditor, which was a trust company, and thereafter the creditor permitted him to draw a certain part of the money, it was held that if the creditor knew the source of the money, then the surety was pro tanto discharged, and inasmuch as the creditor had information sufficient to put it on inquiry as to the source of the money, this result must follow.

Where the principal creditor had first mortgages on cattle on which Scott, the surety, had a second mortgage, and it was agreed between all parties that one of the members of the partnership which was the principal creditor should buy the cattle at a certain price per head, the court said: "It cannot be doubted, if this testimony states the facts truly, that plaintiffs became charged with a duty to Scott, and that duty was to ascertain the cattle subject to the mortgages, and to at least use diligence to obtain possession of and apply them to the secured debts. Plaintiffs owned the principal mortgage, and had as good opportunity as Scott had to know the property covered by it; and when they assumed the management of the transaction and made the promises stated, their duty was not only to account for the value of the property delivered to them, but to use reasonable diligence to secure all that was called for by the mortgages; and for any loss sustained by Scott which such diligence on their part would have prevented, they were liable to him." Scott v. Llano County Bank, 99 Tex. 221, 89 S. W. 749.

In Folk v. Cruikshanks, 4 Rich. L. 243, it was held that it was no defense to a surety on a bond, to allege that there had been a prior agreement between the debtor and the creditor to have also a mortgage as security, which the creditor did not get, as such agreement, having preceded that of the surety, was to be regarded as merged in it, and it was for the surety to secure himself if he so desired.

1. Georgia.

In Toomer v. Dickerson, 37 Ga. 428, under the statute which provides that "any act of the creditor, either before or after judgment against the principal, which injures the surety, or increases his risk, or exposes him to greater liability, will discharge the security," where the debtor, to secure his bonds given with a surety, made a mortgage on slaves in South Carolina, and there recorded, and shortly afterwards took the slaves to his home in Georgia, and the creditor did not have the mortgage registered in Georgia, which was necessary to be done within a certain time in order to give the lien priority, it was held that the surety was discharged, although it did not appear that he had actually lost any security, as he had been "exposed to greater liability," within the terms of the statute.

So, where, by the contract of the surety, the debtor is to give a mortgage to the creditor, and does so, and the latter does not record it, and cancels it, taking another, although the mortgage if recorded would have been of no avail, owing to prior liens, the surety is nevertheless discharged, under the same statute. Atlanta Nat. Bank v. Douglass, 51 Ga. 205, 21 Am. Rep. 234.

Toomer v. Dickerson, supra, was followed in Cloud v. Scarborough, 3 Ga. App. 7, 59 S. E. 202, where it was held that a failure to record a mortgage of personal property released the surety, although no loss was shown. The Scarborough Case was followed in Cordele Grocery Co. v. Thigpen, 4 Ga. App. 643, 62 S. E. 97.

In Trammell v. Swift Fertilizer Works, 21 Ga. 778, 49 S. E. 739, the court charged the jury that if a lien on crops was intended to cover only the crops of the principal debtor, and not of the surety, the failure to record the instrument would release the surety; but a judgment against the surety was affirmed.

Although without the scope of this note, reference may be here made to Williams v. Kennedy, 134 Ga. 339, 67 S. E. 821, where it was held when a lien was lost by failure to put an execution on the special execution docket, that the surety was not discharged, under the statute providing that "any act of the creditor, either before or after judgment against the principal, which injures the surety or increases his risk, or exposes him to greater liability, will discharge him," as the same section also provides that "a mere failure by the creditor to sue as soon as the law allows, or negligence to prosecute with vigor his legal remedies, unless for a consideration, will not release the surety." The court said that there was a difference in not recording an instrument given when the contract was made, and in not pursuing a remedy.

2. Louisiana.

In Saulet v. Trepagnier, 2 La. Ann. 427, where an appeal was taken from a judgment in favor of the creditor on a community debt, which was affirmed, but pending the appeal the debtor had died, and the creditor took no steps to bring in the widow, so as to make the judgment on the appeal binding on the community property, it was held that the surety on the appeal bond was discharged. The court said: "It would seem to be a necessary consequence of the principles of the law of suretyship, that the surety is entitled to the benefit of all the securities in the hands of the creditor; and, if any of them be lost by his wilful neglect or want of due diligence, the surety is, to that extent, discharged. . . . By article 3030 of the Code the surety is discharged when, by the act of the creditor, the subrogation to his rights, mortgages, and privileges can no longer be operated in favor of the surety. Article 2037 of the Napoleon Code is to the same effect; and the court of cassation has more than once decided that the term 'act of the creditor' applied to omissions or neglects of the creditor, and consisted in omittendo as well as in committendo. . . . When the surety on the appeal bond in this case signed it, there was a judgment against Pierre Trepagnier, and the community existing between him and his wife was bound by it. The judgment rendered on the appeal, though it affirmed the judgment of the court, only bound those who were parties; to wit, the heirs of Pierre Trepagnier. There is to this day no judgment against the community. The creditor was bound to make the proper parties on the demise of the principal debtor, so as to maintain the judgment in its integrity. If, by his neglect, it has been impaired, so that a subrogation to the rights under the original judgment is impossible, his recourse against the surety, pro tanto, is lost."

Where a landlord did not proceed against her tenant until his effects were removed, the court said, in holding that the surety was not discharged: "The surety is not discharged by the mere omission of the creditor to enforce or preserve a privilege. To produce that effect, the creditor must do some act by which the subrogation can no longer be operated in favor of the surety. Civil Code, art. 3030." Parker v. Alexander, 2 La. Ann. 188.

In Hill v. Bourcier, 29 La. Ann. 841, an action for rent, brought against the tenant and the surety, it was held that the surety was not discharged because the landlord did not pray for judgment with privilege against the tenant's effects, under the statute providing that "the surety is discharged when, by the act of the creditor, the subrogation to his rights, mortgages, and privileges can no longer be operated in favor of the surety." The court said: "Jurisprudence has settled the law that the surety is not discharged by the mere omission of the creditor to sue the principal, or to enforce his privilege."

Where a company having a claim against its agent of about $33,000, on which there were sureties to the extent of about $10,000, received from the agent all his property, and administered it to its own benefit, appropriating it to its own use, it was held under the same statute that the sureties were entirely discharged. The court said: "The duty of the company was not to appropriate or dispose of the property, whether received before or after the sureties' liability had accrued by the defalcation of Randall, without the knowledge and consent of the sureties, but to hold it impartially for its own and the sureties' benefit. . . . This the company has not done. The plaintiff has placed the property beyond the reach of the sureties. They cannot demand subrogation to the creditors' rights against the principal, to which they are entitled under their contract of suretyship. When the creditor intends to look to the surety for payment, he is compelled to preserve, unimpaired, all his rights against the debtor. If the creditor, therefore, does any act without the surety's consent, which impairs his rights of subrogation or the means of enforcing his claim against the principal in case he should be called upon to pay the debt, the surety will be discharged." The court said, however, that the evidence left little doubt that the sureties could have done better with the assets than the company did. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Randall, 42 La. Ann. 260, 7 So. 679.

3. Canada.

Where, by agreement between the parties, it appeared that the creditor was to pay the premiums on a life insurance policy assigned as security, a special provision being made for securing the premiums paid by a general appointment of an agent to collect rents, it was held that while mere passiveness would not discharge the surety in this case, the failure to pay the premiums, whereby the policy was lost, would discharge him pro tanto. The court seemed to consider that the Canadian Code was substantially declaratory of the ordinary law in the following provisions: "The creditor is liable for the loss or deterioration of the thing pledged according to the rules established in the title of obligations. On the other hand, the debtor is pledged to repay to the creditor the necessary expenses incurred by him in the preservation of the thing. . . . The suretyship is at an end when, by the act of the creditor, the surety can no longer be subrogated in the rights, hypothecs, and privileges of such creditor.

Trust & L. Co. v. Wurtele, 35 Can. S. C. 663."

The law as to requests to realize on collateral would seem to follow the rule in the several jurisdictions as to requests to proceed against the principal, irrespective of collateral.

In Ewing v. Williams, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 319, 89 S. W. 843, it was held that the failure of the landlord to enforce his lien upon the crops did not discharge the surety, although the surety asked him at the time that the crops were being removed to enforce such lien.

See also, to similar effect, Hall v. Hoxsey, supra, II.

In Gray v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 81 Md. 631, 32 Atl. 518, where it was claimed that the surety urged upon the creditor that he should realize upon the security, and he agreed to do so, but delayed for a very considerable period, the court said: "Stat-ing the proof in its strongest aspect against the bank, its action amounted to no more than inaction or passive delay; and when that is the case, there is no impairment of the creditor's right to resort to the surety."

... If the surety desires to expedite payment, he may pay the debt, and by that means put himself in the place of the creditor, or he may call on the creditor, by the aid of a court of equity, to proceed against the debtor upon giving the proper indemnity against costs and delay."

In Myers v. Farmers' State Bank, 53 Neb. 824, 74 N. W. 252, it was held that "where the maker of a note secures its payment by a chattel mortgage, and the payee of the note indorses and delivers it to a third party, the failure of the indorsee to seize the mortgaged property for the purpose of satisfying the note, even though requested so to do by the sureties of the maker, will not discharge them."

In Bank of Montreal v. Davy, 21 U. C. C. P. 179, it was held that the creditor was not required, on the demand of the surety, to sell a vessel mortgaged as collateral security, under the power of sale in the mortgage.

On the other hand, in New York it has been held that the creditor may discharge the surety by failure to collect the collateral when requested. Remsen v. Beekman, 25 N. Y. 552, where the court said: "The principle was settled in this state more than forty years ago, and has since been steadily maintained, that if a surety request the creditor to collect the debt from the principal, and the creditor refuse or neglect to do so at a time when it is collectable, and from a subsequent change of circumstances it becomes uncollectable, the surety is, by such conduct of the creditor, exonerated from his liability." ... It is not contended that it makes any difference in the rule, or in the application of the principles on which it is founded, that the principal to which the creditor refuses or neglects to resort when he should is a fund or property primarily liable for the debt in exoneration of the surety, instead of being a person so primarily liable."

So it was held in Pennsylvania in Lichtenthaler v. Thompson, 13 Serg. & R. 157, 15 Am. Dec. 581, where the surety of a tenant called upon the landlord to claim his lien from the officer who had seized the tenant's goods in execution, but he declined to do so, that the surety was discharged."

Where a mortgagor conveyed the premises to a purchaser, who assumed the payment of the mortgage, and, upon the maturity of the bond and mortgage, the mortgagor requested the mortgagee to proceed immediately to foreclose and collect the debt, on the ground that the premises, which were then sufficient, might depreciate and become inadequate, and the plaintiff neglected to do so for a year, it was held that the original mortgagor was discharged. Russell v. Weinberg, 2 Abb. N. C. 422.

But in Black River Bank v. Page, 44 N. Y. 453, where the plaintiff, who was requested by one of the sureties to realize upon the securities, waited a considerable time before doing so, the court said: "This did not impose the absolute duty upon the plaintiff to proceed at once. It held these securities for two notes, upon one of which the defendants were not indorsers. It was to judge, acting in good faith, when it was best to convert them. If it delayed unreasonably, or was guilty of bad faith or gross negligence in the care and management of the property mortgaged to it, and the securities were thus damaged, they would undoubtedly, to the extent of such damage, have a defense to the note." ... Here the court found that the plaintiff acted in good faith, and was not guilty of culpable neglect."

In Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Davies, 56 How. Pr. 440, it was held that the request must be full and explicit.

In Bingham v. Mears, 4 N. D. 437, 27 L.R.A. 257, 61 N. W. 808, it was held that it is no defense to the surety that the creditor holds sufficient security to pay the debt, which he, on request, has failed to realize upon, in the absence of prejudice to the surety from such inaction.

IV. Sale merging security in the debt.

In Johnson v. Young, 20 W. Va. 614, it was held that where the owner of land which is subject to the lien of a judgment purchases the judgment, a surety for the debt covered by the judgment will be discharged to the extent of the value of the land.

So, in Wright v. Knepper, 1 Pa. St. 361, where, after a judgment became a lien upon the real property of the principal debtor, the latter sold the property to a third person, who afterwards bought the judgment, and the lot was worth the value of the judgment, it was held that the purchaser could not recover upon the judgment against the surety.

In Clow v. Derby Coal Co. 98 Pa. 432, where the plaintiff having agreed to furnish the money to pay off a mortgage and other indebtedness of a company, and take a new mortgage, also became the owner of a judgment against the company, secured by a supersedeas bond which became absolute on dismissal of the writ of error, and consented that the old mortgage be satisfied, and sold the property under the new mortgage, and became the purchaser, apparently not supposing that the judgment was a lien, it was held that he could not recover from the sureties on the supersedeas bond.

V. Waiver and estoppel of surety.

The surety, of course, may waive the retention of the collateral or be estopped from objecting to its release.

This was shown in Clark v. Smallwood, 156 Fed. 409, where the vendor of property discounted purchase-money notes at a bank and assigned to it the mortgage securing them, and later repurchased the property, and in consideration assumed the payment of all the notes. Thereafter the original purchaser often requested the bank to foreclose, but it did not do so, and he continued to put his name on the renewal notes, and it was held that while he could have required the bank to foreclose, inasmuch as he continued to put his name on the renewal notes he must be deemed to have acquiesced, and that his remedy was to pay the debt and obtain subrogation to the mortgage, or sue in equity to be relieved from his liability on the notes, on account of the laches of the bank; and, that therefore he was not discharged as surety.

See also Grisard v. Hinson, supra, III. b, 2, for the view that a surety may be estopped by his own want of diligence.

In Berlin Nat. Bank v. Guay, 76 N. H. 216, 81 Atl. 475, it was held that where a litigation arises as to the application of property to various creditors, and the surety, being invited to join therein, refuses, he cannot complain of a reasonable settlement made by the creditors.

VI. Applying collateral to other debts.

The creditor cannot apply the security held for a particular debt to some other debt, at the expense of the surety. Holliday v. Brown, 33 Neb. 657, 50 N. W. 1042.

In Hutchinson v. Woodwell, 107 Pa. 509, where, under the contract between the debtor and the creditor, the creditor was to hold possession of personal property of the debtor for the fulfilment of the contract, and thereafter the creditor caused such personal property to be sold under an execution on a judgment he had in another matter against the debtor, it was held that the surety upon the contract was discharged.

In Kuhns v. Westmoreland Bank, 237 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Watts, 136, it was held that where, by statute, a bank had a lien upon the stock of a stockholder whose paper it had taken, that such lien must also be exercised for the benefit of the sureties; and that therefore the bank had no right to exercise this lien in favor of subsequent paper of such stockholder.

In Eppinger v. Kendrick, 114 Cal. 620, 46 Pac. 613, which was an action upon notes given in renewal of an original note, the court approved an instruction to the following effect: If the jury believe from the evidence that Kendrick was in fact a surety for Farnham upon the original note, yet, if they further believe that before the renewal of the original note, Farnham placed in plaintiff's hands a quantity of wheat sufficient to pay said original note, and requested plaintiff to sell the same for that purpose, and apply it on said note, but that he failed to do so, and without Kendrick's consent applied the proceeds to other uses, and that Kendrick did not consent to such application to other uses, and did not know of Farnham's said request at the time he signed the renewal notes, they must find for the defendant; and quoted the general rule as codified in California, viz.: "A surety is entitled to the benefit of every security for the performance of the principal obligation held by the creditor or by a cosurety, at the time of entering into the contract of suretyship, or acquired by him afterward, whether the surety was aware of the security or not." (Civil Code, § 2849.) The "other uses" referred to in the instruction was the payment of another debt owed by the principal to the creditor.

So, where, in pursuance of an agreement between the creditor and the surety, made at the time of the suretyship, the creditor took a mortgage from the debtor, but failed to carry out his promise to appropriate the proceeds to the debt, but appropriated them to another debt, it was held that the surety was pro tanto discharged. Montgomery v. Martin, 94 Ga. 219, 21 S. E. 513.

The Martin Case was approved in Barratt v. Bass Bros. 105 Ga. 421, 31 S. E. 435, where it was held that if, at the time of executing the contract of suretyship, the creditor informed the surety that he had taken a mortgage on personal property of the debtor, and thereafter he applied the proceeds of such personal property to other debts, the surety would be discharged.

Where the debtor executed to the creditor notes containing a factor's crop lien, and such notes were also executed by sureties on the faith of the creditor's promise that he would apply the principal debtor's cotton crop to those particular notes, and the crop was sufficient for that purpose, but was not so applied except in a very small amount, it was held that the sureties were discharged. Taylor v. Scott, 62 Ga. 39, where most of the crops and proceeds were applied to other and later debts to the firm of which the principal creditor was a member.

But in Morrison v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 65 N. H. 253, 9 L.R.A. 282, 23 Am. St. Rep. 39, 20 Atl. 300, where a creditor on the same day brought several actions against the debtor on various claims, and attached his property, the action in which there was a surety being the first suit and attachment, and the creditor, having obtained judgments, applied the proceeds of the attached property to other claims, it was held that the surety had no cause of complaint.

VII. Good faith and fraud.

The creditor is only responsible for the fair value of the security, and where he deals with it in a reasonably prudent way, the surety will not be discharged. Denniston v. Hill, 173 Pa. 633, 34 Atl. 452.

In Miles v. Johnson, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 229, it was held that sureties had no right to complain where the creditor exercised ordinary diligence and good faith in making collateral available, although they may have become bound upon the faith of the collaterals held by him.

See also Berlin Nat. Bank v. Guay, supra, V.

In State Bank v. Smith, 155 N. Y. 185, 49 N. E. 680, affirming 85 Hun, 200, 32 N. Y. Supp. 999, it was held that as the effect of release of collaterals is measured by the injury done to the surety, a substitution of one security for another, when made in good faith, and apparently for the benefit of all concerned, should be governed by the same rule. In this case, however, the security which was given up was probably of no value, and the securities taken in exchange were worth something.

In Bailey v. Griffith, 40 U. C. Q. B. 418, it seems to have been the opinion of the court that a surety is discharged to the extent of the loss suffered by substitution of securities.

Where a trustee holding securities for the benefit of the creditor and the surety sold the securities at a public sale, and they were bought by the creditor and the surety, and an opportunity arising to make sale of the securities, the creditor declined to accept the price offered, although asked to do so by the surety, so that the sale was lost, and the decision of a lawsuit shortly afterwards rendered the securities worthless, it was held that the surety was not discharged. Kaufman v. Loomis, 110 Ill. 617.

In Coates v. Coates, 33 Beav. 249, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 448, 10 Jur. N. S. 532, 9 L. T. N. S. 795, 12 Week. Rep. 634, where, after the principal debtor had become a bankrupt, the creditor surrendered an insurance policy on his life to the insurance company, obtaining certain amounts thereby, it was held that this did not discharge the surety on the debt, as it would have been a mere speculation to have continued to hold the policy, and the assured being a bankrupt, the probability was that he would not keep up the policy. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

On the other hand, in Mutual Loan Assn. v. Sudlow, 5 C. B. N. S. 449, 28 L. J. C. P. N. S. 108, 5 Jur. N. S. 338, where the creditor took the goods as security under a bill of sale, and sold them in a wasteful manner, it was held that the surety was rightly allowed to show that a proper sale would have realized enough to pay the debt, and a verdict in his favor was sustained.

So it was held in Everly v. Rice, 20 Pa. 297, that where a creditor, by fraud upon the surety, diminishes the amount of the proceeds from the security, the surety is pro tanto discharged.

So, where the creditor sold the security at auction to his dummy, for a trifling price, without notice to the surety, it was held that the surety was discharged to the extent of the value of the property appropriated by the creditor. Phares v. Barbour, 49 Ill. 370.

In Parks v. State Nat. Bank, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 34 S. W. 1044, the court was of the opinion that "when a judgment creditor has, through such process, reached the assets of the principal debtor in the hands of a third party, and obtained judgment against the garnishee, and that when a garnishee seeks to enjoin such judgment, and the surety has requested the creditor, in order to protect himself, to be allowed to appear and contest the injunction, promising to pay the attorney's fees and all costs, and the request has been denied, and the creditor himself has promised the surety to appear, answer, and contest the injunction, it was his duty to make such contest, and not, through collusion with the principal debtor and garnishee, for the purpose of injuring and making the surety pay the debt, make no resistance, and, by default, let the injunction be perpetuated."

VIII. Miscellaneous.

Where a bank had an arrangement with its debtor by which it would discount paper to the amount of $9,000, receiving as security paper of his customers for the like amount, and, on the paying of any paper of the customers, it would lend back the money to the debtor, taking as security new paper of his customers, and later the bank declined to go on with this arrangement, but agreed to increase the amount of the discount to $10,000 upon the defendant indorsing the debtor's note as surety, it was held that the surety was not discharged by a continuance of credit under which, upon collection of the collateral notes, the creditor reloaned the money, with new collateral notes as security. First Nat. Bank v. Johnson, 65 Vt. 382, 26 Atl. 634.

But where the surety made a mortgage to the principal creditor, a bank, to secure the debts of the debtor and to permit his credit to be enlarged, the mortgage providing that it should cover renewals and substitutions, etc., and, at the time, the paper in the bank being, to a large extent, paper of the debtor's customers, which had been rediscounted or placed in the bank as collateral, the mortgage also provided that it should be a continuing security and that substitution of new credit might be made for the old, and the bank permitted a good deal of good paper to be taken up by apparent renewals which were forgeries, it was held that as to the amount of the forgeries, the surety was discharged. Merchants' Bank v. McKay, 15 Can. S. C. 672, affirming 12 Ont. Rep. 498.

In Rainbow v. Juggins, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 422, 49 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 718, 42 L. T. N. S. 346, 29 Week. Rep. 130, 44 J. P. 829, affirming L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 138, 49 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 353, 28 Week. Rep. 428, the court was of the opinion that it must be deemed, in contemplation of the contract, that the creditor may, if he sees fit, in case the debtor becomes a bankrupt, sue for the whole amount of his claim, which will, as matter of law, cause him to lose his lien, and that this will not discharge the surety.

In Jones v. Hawkins, 60 Ga. 52, the court seems to have been of the opinion that if a judgment creditor, having a judgment against the principal and surety, proved his debt against the principal in the bankrupt court without reservation of his lien, and thus lost the judgment lien, the surety would be discharged; but the court reversed a judgment for the surety on the ground that it did not appear that he had been damaged.

Where the creditor released to assignees in bankruptcy of the debtor what legally he could not have withheld from them, it was held that the surety was not discharged. Hardwick v. Wright, 35 Beav. 133.

It was held in Bixby v. Barklie, 26 Hun, 275, where the holder of securities for the benefit of the creditor and surety gave up the security and later took an assignment of the debt, and thereafter assigned it, that his assignee could not recover against the surety.

In City Bank v. Young, 43 N. H. 457, the court approved an instruction to the jury to the effect that if the holders of a note secured by a mortgage of personalty made the principal debtor their agent to sell the mortgaged property, and if they were guilty of any want of ordinary care and prudence in the sale of the property, or in securing the proceeds of it, and if, in consequence of such want of ordinary care and prudence, there was a loss upon the security, the surety must be exonerated for the amount which was so lost.

So, where, owing to the carelessness of the creditor, it is put in the power of his messenger fraudulently to deliver the security to the debtor, and this is done, the surety is pro tanto discharged. Sternbach v. Friedman, 34 App. Div. 534, 54 N. Y. Supp. 608.

In Harrison Mach. Works v. Templeton, 82 Tex. 443, 18 S. W. 601, where the judgment foreclosed a lien on the security, and required an order of sale to be issued to sell the property under the judgment in satisfaction of it, and the property by the principal judgment debtor was delivered to the attorney of the creditor, to be sold in accord with the terms of the judgment, but the creditor kept the property for a time, and then sold it at private sale, the court said: "The property by the principal judgment debtor was delivered to the attorney of appellant to be sold in accord with the terms of the judgment. This judgment created a lien on the property as effectually as if an execution had been levied thereon; and in order to place appellant in a position to enforce this lien by a sale of the property, it was actually delivered to it. These facts made it incumbent upon appellant to use diligence in selling the property and applying the proceeds to the payment of the judgment, and if, from a failure to so do, the property depreciated in value or a loss occurred, it is attributable to its own negligence, the results of which it must bear." And the judgment in favor of the surety was affirmed.

An answer by the surety that the principal creditor has in his hands sufficient property of the principal debtor to pay the debt is not a good defense. First Nat. Bank v. Wilbern, 65 Neb. 247, 90 N. W. 1126, 93 N. W. 1002, 95 N. W. 12, where the court said: "If the answer had pleaded in issuable form that the principal was insolvent, and that his property was fraudulently encumbered or concealed by the plaintiff, so as to delay or embarrass the surety in obtaining indemnity, it would have stated a complete defense at law."

If the security is lost without the negligence of the creditor, the surety is not discharged. Thus, in Gaar & Co. v. Taylor, 128 Iowa, 636, 105 N. W. 125, where, by an erroneous judgment, a note was declared paid and a chattel mortgage discharged, and the debtor disposed of the property a good while afterwards, and still later the judgment was set aside as without jurisdiction, it was held that although the security of the mortgage was gone, the sureties were not discharged.

In Wilbur v. Williams, 16 R. I. 242, 14 Atl. 878, it was held that a transfer of a mortgage by the creditor to a third person does not discharge the surety, but transfers also the debt secured. B. B. B.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

METROPOLITAN CASUALTY INSURANCE COMPANY, Resp't.,

v.

FRED W. CLARK et al., Appts.

(145 Wis. 181, 129 N. W. 1065.)

Runaway horse — injury — liability of owner.

The owner of a team is not, in the absence of negligence on the part of himself or his driver, liable for their breaking a window in a building abutting on the highway, while running away because of fright, where, at the time of their fright, they were being driven along the highway by an experienced driver.

(February 21, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for La Crosse County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to the premises of plaintiff's assignor, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. E. Higbee, for appellants:

If horses, while being lawfully and carefully driven upon a public street, become unmanageable and escape from the control of the driver, against his will and without any failure on his part to exercise proper care, and trespass upon real property adjacent to and abutting upon said street, the owner of the team is not bound to respond in damages to the property owner.

Note. — Liability, in absence of negligence, for damage by runaway horse.

As to whether negligence may be inferred from the mere fact that a horse runs away, see the note to Collier v. Knox, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 171.

For the duty of the driver of horse that is running away, see the note to Kimble v. Stackpole, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 148.

For cases on negligence in leaving horse unhitched in highway, see the notes to Moulton v. Lewiston, B. & B. Street R. Co. 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 845, and Corona Coal & Iron Co. v. White, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 958.

For cases on the liability for trespass on unfenced land by live stock being driven along the highway, see the note to Wood v. Snider, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 912.

No case has been found holding the owner or driver of a runaway horse liable for damage in the absence of negligence. Any such idea has been long since discarded.

The suggestion that the theory of the old law involved such an absolute responsibility seems by no means free from doubt, speaking generally of liability for injuries without negligence, while there are certain circumstances in which the inflicter of damage is held to the liability of an insurer, it has been pointed out that some of the old cases, which hold that trespass is the form of action where an injury is direct, may have been misunderstood.

Thus, in Brown v. Kendall, 6 Cush. 292, Chief Justice Shaw, in holding that the defendant was not liable for hitting the plaintiff accidentally with a stick which he was raising to strike fighting dogs, points out that he discussions which arose as to the form of action, as trespass or case, are not authority for holding that, in cases of this character, there could be a liability without negligence; and he says: "In the principal case cited, Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, the damage arose from the act of the defendant in driving on the wrong side of the road, in a dark night, which was clearly negligent, if not unlawful. In the course of the argument of that case (§. 595), Lawrence, J., said: 'There certainly are cases in the books where, the injury being direct and immediate, trespass had been holden to lie, though the injury was not intentional.' The term 'injury' implies something more than damage; but, independently of that consideration, the proposition may be true, because, though the injury was unintentional, the act may have been unlawful or negligent, and the cases cited by him are perfectly consistent with that supposition. So the same learned judge in the same case says (p. 597): 'No doubt trespass lies against one who drives a carriage against another, whether done wilfully or not.' But he immediately adds: 'Suppose one who is driving a carriage is negligently and heedlessly looking about him, without attending to the road, when persons are passing, and thereby runs over a child and kills him, is it not manslaughter? And, if so, it must be trespass; for every manslaughter includes trespass,' showing what he understood by a case not wilful."

The same view of the early cases was taken by Bramwell, B., in Holmes v. Mather, L. R. 10 Exch. 261, where he said, in holding that judgment must be for the defendant, whose horses running away injured the plaintiff: "As to the cases cited, most of them are really decisions on the form of action, whether case or trespass. The result of them is this, and it is intelligible enough: If the act that does an injury is an act of direct force, vi et armis, trespass is the proper remedy (if there is any remedy) where the act is wrongful, either as being wilful or as being the result of negligence. Where the act is not wrongful for either of these reasons, no action is maintainable, though trespass would be the proper form of action if it were wrongful. That is the effect of the decisions."

In view of these explanations, it may be doubted whether the court in Bennett v. Ford, 47 Ind. 264 (see also later in this note), correctly characterized the early cases on the general subject where it said: "According to the early English cases, the fault or negligence of the defendant had no bearing upon the question of his liability, liable for the injury which it commits by escaping from his control and entering adjacent private grounds.

In the course of the affairs of life, accidents must happen, and if they are not attributable to the breach of some legal duty owing to the sufferer, he has no legal right to complain.

The question of negligence is the only true test of liability.

but he was held liable for an injury which resulted from inevitable danger and unavoidable accident. The modern English decisions have, to some extent, relaxed the rigor of the old rule, but there is much conflict between the English and American rulings. In the very recent case of Brown v. Collins, in the supreme court of New Hampshire [53 N. H. 442, 16 Am. Rep. 372], reported in vol. 13 N. S., of the American Law Register, on page 364, the English and American authorities are reviewed with great ability and clearness, and the rule as laid down by Mr. Chief Justice Shaw in Brown v. Kendall, supra, is adopted as the rule in this country."

A more guarded but dissatisfied view is taken of the early cases in Brown v. Collins, 53 N. H. 442, 16 Am. Rep. 372 (see also later in this note), which is a direct authority for the decision in METROPOLITAN CASUALTY INS. CO. v. CLARK.

In Gibbons v. Pepper, 4 Mod. 404, 1 Ld. Raym. 38, where, in assault and battery, the defendant pleaded that he was riding on a horse in the highway, and that on a sudden-fright the horse started and run upon the plaintiff, who continued in the way after he was called to go out, which was the same assault, the plaintiff demurred to the plea. And while the plaintiff had judgment on the demurrer, it was held per curiam that the defendant should have pleaded the general issue, for if the horse run away against his will, he would have been found not guilty, because in such case it cannot be said with any color of reason to be a battery in the rider. (Note that the report in 4 Mod. is somewhat obscure as to whether the court or counsel made the statement as to giving the justification under the general issue.)

That the theory of negligence in respect to injuries by horses was an early one is shown not only by Gibbons v. Pepper, supra, but by Michael v. Alestree, 2 Lev. 172, 1 Vent. 295, where the defendant was held liable in case, in that he brought into a frequented place a pair of ungovernable horses, to train them, and they ran upon the plaintiff and injured him.

So, also, in Mason v. Keeling, 1 Ld. Raym. 606 (a dog case), Holt, Ch. J., and Turton, J., stated that "if the owner puts a horse or an ox to grass in his field, which is adjoining to the highway, and the horse or the ox breaks the hedge, and runs into the highway, and kicks or gores some passenger, an action will not lie against the owner; otherwise, if he had notice that they had done such a thing before."

So, the notion of liability without negligence is directly denied in Wakeman v. Robinson, 1 Bing. 213, although the charge of the trial court gives it countenance. In that case, there being several horses and carriages abreast in a road, one of the horses by plunging injured another horse, the action was brought in trespass, and the court instructed the jury that, it being an action of trespass, if the injury was occasioned by the immediate act of the defendant, it was immaterial whether that act was wilful or accidental. He did not direct them to consider whether the accident was occasioned by any negligence or default on the part of the defendant, or was wholly unavoidable, nor was he requested to do so by the defendant's counsel. Dallas, Ch. J., in sustaining a verdict for the plaintiff, said: "If the accident happened entirely without default on the part of the defendant, or blame imputable to him, the action does not lie. . . . But, upon the facts of the case, if I had presided at the trial, I should have directed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, because the accident was clearly occasioned by the default of the defendant. There can be no doubt that the learned judge who presided would have taken the opinion of the jury on that ground, if he had been requested so to do."

In Goodman v. Taylor, 5 Car. & P. 410, a pony and chaise belonging to the defendant injured the horse of the plaintiff, who sued in trespass. The defendant's witnesses testified that his wife stood by the head of the pony, holding it by the rein, when a "punch and judy" show coming by frightened the pony and he ran away, and the wife was unable to hold him. There was other evidence, however, that the pony was unattended. Denman, Ch. J., instructing the jury, said: "If the facts are true as suggested for the defense, I very much think you would be disposed to consider this as an inevitable accident, one which the defendant could not prevent." But the verdict was for the plaintiff.

In Hammack v. White, 11 C. B. N. S. 588, 31 L. J. C. P. N. S. 129, 8 Jur. N. S. 796, 5 L. T. N. S. 676, 10 Week. Rep. 230, where it appeared that the defendant was trying a horse which he bought the day before and which became unmanageable and swerved from the roadway on the pavement, notwithstanding the defendant's efforts to restrain him, and killed a man on the pavement, it did not appear that the defendant had omitted to do anything he could have done to prevent the accident, but it was insisted that the mere fact of his having ridden in such a place a horse with whose temper he was wholly unacquainted was evidence of negligence. The trial court, being of opinion that there was no evidence of negligence, ordered a nonsuit, which on appeal was sustained.

The Hammack Case was approved in Manzoni v. Douglas, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 145, where the plaintiff was knocked down while walking on the sidewalk, by a runaway horse attached to a carriage, and it was held that the plaintiff was properly nonsuited. Denman, J., said: "It is impossible to say that horses do not sometimes bolt without any negligence or unskillfulness of those having the charge of them. Here the evidence was that the horse started off and became uncontrollable; and no question was put to either of the witnesses as to negligence on the part of the driver. We cannot therefore assume that there was negligence."

And the decision in Holmes v. Mather, supra, would seem to have ended the necessity of any further discussion on the subject in the English courts.

While without the scope of this note, reference should be made in this connection to Tillett v. Ward, L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 17, where the court, in giving judgment for the defendant, whose ox, being driven down the street, entered the plaintiff's shop and damaged its contents, no negligence being shown on the part of the defendant, said: "It is also tolerably clear that where both parties are upon the highway, where each of them has a right to be, and one of them is injured by the trespass of an animal belonging to the other, he must, in order to maintain his action, show that the trespass was owing to the negligence of the other or of his servant. . . . There is also the statement of Blackburn, J., in Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, 3 Hurlst. & C. 774, 3 H. L. Cas. 330, that persons who have property adjacent to a highway may be taken to hold it subject to the risk of injury from inevitable risk."

In Bennett v. Ford, heretofore quoted from in this note, it was held error to charge the jury: "If the owner of a team, driving it or stopping it on a street or highway, permits or suffers his team to run away and do injury to another person or his property, the owner of the team is liable to the person injured for the injury done; as between the owner of this team and the man who sustained the injury, the owner of the team must bear the loss."

In Brown v. Collins, supra, the plaintiff sought to recover the value of a lamp-bearing stone post standing in the front of his place of business, and broken by the defendant's horses. It was agreed that the defendant was in the use of ordinary care and skill in managing his horses, until they were frightened by a locomotive on the railroad, and that they then became unmanageable and ran against and broke the post. The court, after reviewing the theories of law on the general subject, said: "Whatever may be the full legal definitions of necessity, inevitable danger, and unavoidable accident, the occurrence complained of in this case was one for which the defendant is not liable, unless everyone is liable for all damage done by superior force overpowering him and using him or his property as an instrument of violence. The defendant, being without fault, was as innocent as if the pole of his wagon had been hurled on the plaintiff's land by a whirlwind, or he himself, by a stronger man, had been thrown through the plaintiff's window. Upon the facts stated, taken in the sense in which we understand

v. May, 34 Wis. 666; Hartford v. Brady, 114 Mass. 466, 19 Am. Rep. 377; Mairs v. Manhattan Real Estate Assn. 89 N. Y. 498; St. Peter v. Denison, 58 N. Y. 417, 17 Am. Rep. 258.

Timlin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff corporation executed a policy of plate glass insurance on property abutting upon a highway. The plate glass was broken by defendants' team of horses, which, running away, dashed into the plate glass window. The plaintiff replaced the them, the defendant is entitled to judgment."

In the similar case of Goldschneider v. J. Rheinfrank Co. 132 N. Y. Supp. 401, where a horse owned by the defendant and driven by one of his servants ran away, broke the plaintiff's show window, and damaged its contents, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that there was no evidence that the owner had any reason to suppose that the horse had vicious tendencies, said: "There is no evidence that the driver was not competent. He had the reins in his hands, and no negligence on his part has been shown. He had never driven this particular horse before; but, unless the defendant had reason to believe that this horse had some vicious tendencies, it was not negligent on defendant's part to intrust the horse to this driver. . . . The horse was apparently frightened by a 'squeaky' whistle of an elevated train directly over his head. It was also shown that the horse was somewhat nervous and required a tight rein. These circumstances are perhaps sufficient to raise a question whether or not the horse had a dangerous character; but to sustain a recovery, the plaintiff must go further and show facts sufficient to allow the court to infer that the owner had knowledge of this character. I have searched the record, but find it bare of such facts. Certainly the mere fact that it was shown that it had a hard mouth and required a tight rein is insufficient. The defendant had owned this horse for six months, during which time it was kind and gentle and had never shied, run away, bitten, or kicked. The defendant had received no complaints about its behavior."

While the modern courts, in cases concerning runaway horses, often say that there is no responsibility upon the driver or owner without negligence, there are comparatively few cases which refer to any other theory of liability.

In Caughlin v. Campbell-Sell Baking Co. 39 Colo. 148, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1001, 121 Am. St. Rep. 158, 89 Pac. 53, the court said, in affirming a judgment for the defendant, whose horses running away injured the plaintiff's bicycle: "Here the defendant was lawfully on the highway with its plate glass at an expense of $104, took an assignment of their right of action against the defendants from the owners of the plate glass window, and brought this action for damages, charging the defendants in two separate counts with trespass and with negligence.

The jury by its verdict acquitted the defendants of negligence. There was, however, uncontroverted proof that the defendants owned the horses, and that there was damage done to the amount of $104. Allowing the verdict to stand, the circuit court rendered judgment for the plaintiff team and wagon. While it is possible that an injury might be caused by leaving the team restrained as it was, we cannot say, either as a question of law or of fact, that it was the natural or probable result of such act that the team would break loose and cause mischief. All the cases upon this and analogous questions which we have been able to find, decided by the courts of this country, lay down the rule that the cause of action is based upon negligence, and negligence must be established by the plaintiff, or he cannot recover."

In Stephenson v. Corder, 71 Kan. 475, 69 L.R.A. 246, 114 Am. St. Rep. 500, 80 Pac. 938, the court, in holding that it was error to have declined to instruct the jury to find for the defendant, said: "Quite true, the accident would not have occurred had the horses been hitched to an unbreakable rack with an unbreakable chain; nor would it have occurred had not the defendant driven to the city on that day; but ordinary care does not require the use of such precautions. If it did, it would, in the language of this court in Cleghorn v. Thompson, 62 Kan. 733, 54 L.R.A. 402, 64 Pac. 605, 'paralyze human effort and action on all lines.'"

It seems that in Louisiana the statute places the burden of proof on the owner. Thus, in Damonte v. Patton, 118 La. 530, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 209, 118 Am. St. Rep. 384, 43 So. 153, 10 Ann. Cas. 862, where the defendant was held in fault for leaving his horse unattended while he was chasing his hat, the court said: "The law is 'that the owner of an animal is answerable for damage he has caused' (Civil Code, art. 2321); and the presumption is that the owner of the animal is in fault, and the burden is on him to show that he was without the slightest fault, and did all that was possible to prevent the injury. Bentz v. Page, 115 La. 580, 39 So. 599."

In Groom v. Kavanagh, 97 Mo. App. 362, 71 S. W. 362, the court, in affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, approved the following instruction: "That the defendant was not liable in every event for damage caused by his runaway team; but that his liability depended on whether or not he took ordinary care to prevent it from running away. . . . That the defendant for this sum, on the ground that defendants, being the owners of the horses, were liable for the damage caused by such horses, without any negligence on the part of the owners, deducing this rule of liability from Chunot v. Larson, 43 Wis. 536, 28 Am. Rep. 567; Pettit v. May, 34 Wis. 666; Bulpit v. Matthews, 145 Ill. 345, 22 L.R.A. 55, 34 N. E. 525; Wood v. Snider, 187 N. Y. 28, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 912, 79 N. E. 858; Hazleton v. Week, 49 Wis. 661, 35 Am. Rep. 796, 6 N. W. 309; 2 Cyc. 376.

It appeared that the horses were in charge of an experienced driver, but took fright, became unmanageable and beyond the control of the driver, and ran away,—all in the highway,—and in their flight on the street they ran upon the sidewalk in front of the building in question and into the plate glass window.

The case is presented with commendable industry and ability. The appellants attack, and respondent defends, the ruling of the court below, each appealing to what he terms "common-law" rules in support of his position. That law being in a degree progressive, the term "common law" is somewhat ambiguous; for the common law of the seventeenth century is not in all details that of the nineteenth, nor the common law of England in all details that of the United States, nor the common law of one state in all details that of another. This difference in detail is frequently all important and decisive of the particular case under consideration. The Constitution of this state (§ 13, art. 14) provides that such parts of the common law as are now (1848) in force in the territory of Wisconsin, not inconsistent with this Constitution, shall be and continue part of the law of this state, until altered or suspended by the legislature. Viewed objectively and at large as a system of deducing from litigated instances just, reasonable, and consistent rules of decision, suitable to the genius of the people and to their political, social, and economic conditions, the common law never changes; but, with reference to the rules so deduced, we may say, with Francis Bacon: "As waters do take tincture and taste from the soil through which they run, so do laws vary according to the region where they are planted, though they proceed from the same fountains."

A rule of the common law, which has come down to us practically unchanged, made it the duty of every man to keep his cattle (herbivorous domestic animals) within the limits of his own possessions. If he failed to so keep them, he failed in duty, and when they strayed upon the land of

is not liable to the plaintiff if the casualty was a pure accident, in no way due to the defendant's carelessness."

In Unger v. Forty-second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co. 51 N. Y. 497, it was held that a person driving horses through a street is not bound absolutely to keep them under control. He is bound to exercise that reasonable degree of diligence and care which a man of ordinary prudence and capacity might be expected to exercise under the same circumstances. The court said: "It would be a very hard and unwise rule which would require of the owner of every vehicle driven in the streets of a city, that he use, in the construction of his carriage and in the harness of his horses, and all the means by which they are attached to the vehicle, the best methods which human skill and ingenuity have contrived and brought into use to prevent accidents to pedestrians in the streets. Such a rule has not and, probably, never will be adopted."

So in Cadwell v. Arnheim, 152 N. Y. 182, 46 N. E. 310, the court said: "There is no rule of law which compels a person driving horses upon a highway absolutely to keep them under control. He is bound only to exercise that reasonable degree of diligence and care which a man of ordinary prudence might be expected to exercise under the same circumstances."

In Tooker v. Fowler, & S. Co. 132 N. Y. Supp. 213, the court, in affirming a judgment of nonsuit, where the defendant's horse had run away and injured the plaintiff's vehicle, said: "Such a conjunction of circumstances would not occur in the natural course of events once in ten thousand times, and to say that it was the duty of defendant's driver to anticipate this accident . . . is to make the defendant liable as an insurer, rather than as one charged with the duty of exercising reasonable care."

In Kennedy v. Way, Brightly (Pa.) 186, where, however, the defendant was held liable, the court said: "If a horse runs away without the fault of the driver, he is not answerable."

In Vincent v. Stinehour, 7 Vt. 62, 29 Am. Dec. 145, the court said: "It has been laid down that if a horse, upon a sudden surprise, run away with his rider, and runs against a man and hurts him, this is no battery. . . . In the case of Gibbons v. Pepper, 4 Mod. 405, it was distinctly decided that if a horse runs away with his rider, against his will, and he could not have avoided it, and runs against another, it is no battery in the rider, and he can defend under the general issue." In the Vermont case, where the judgment was for the defendant, and the horse in question was not running away, the court said further: "The result of our examination is that we think there must be some blame, or want of care and prudence, to make a man answerable in trespass; and that where a horse takes a sudden fright, and there is no imprudence in the rider, either another, the owner was chargeable with a trespass. Nor did his liability for the mischief done by them depend in any degree upon his personal fault, since, if the cattle escaped from his custody, notwithstanding due care on his part, his responsibility for the injury committed by them was the same that it would have been had he voluntarily permitted them to roam at large. 2 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 684 (*397); Bigelow on Torts, 8th ed. p. 459; 2 Jaggard, Torts, p. 662. This rule of the common law was recognized in Wisconsin in the early case of Stone v. Donaldson, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 393, and also in Harrison v. Brown, 5 Wis. 27. The liability still exists in this state, but subject to conditions imposed by statute. Walls v. Cunningham, 123 Wis. 346, 101 N. W. 696. A learned review of the common law on this subject, and the reasons upon which the rule was based, will be found in the opinion of Justice Doe, in Brown v. Collins, 53 N. H. 442, 16 Am. Rep. 372. The rule itself appears to have been founded on ancient analogies and on the known propensities of such animals to stray, crop the herbage, destroy trees, etc., and in part on the forms of action made imperative by the ancient common law. There grew up, however, not without some struggle, a supplementary rule of the common law limiting the liability of the owners for damages caused by such animals when, being lawfully driven upon the highway, without negligence on the part of the owner or his servant in charge, they escaped from control and trespassed upon property abutting on the highway. Cooley speaks of it as an exception to the common-law rule that every man, at his peril, must keep his beasts from the lands of others. "If one is driving his domestic animals along the public highway, he is bound to observe due care; and if, notwithstanding he is guilty of no negligence, they escape from him and go upon private grounds, he is not responsible, provided he removes them within a reasonable time." 2 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 690 (*401). "A person whose horses, frightened by a locomotive, became uncontrollable, ran away with him, went upon land of another, and broke a post there, is not liable for the damage, if it was not caused by any fault on his part." Brown v. Collins, supra. "An ox belonging to the defendant, and while being driven by his servants through the streets of a country town, entered the plaintiff's shop, which adjoined the street, through the open doorway, and damaged his goods. No negligence on the part of the persons in charge of the ox was proved. Held, that the dein managing the horse or in driving an unsafe horse, and the horse runs against another and injures him, the trespass is wholly involuntary and unavoidable, for which no action can be maintained."

In Trow v. Thomas, 70 Vt. 580, 41 Atl. 652, where the judgment was for the plaintiff, the court said: "In effect the charge was this, that if the horse became unmanageable without the fault of the defendant, he would not be liable; but if it became unmanageable through the fault of the defendant, he would be. This was correct."

In Lynch v. Kineth, 36 Wash. 368, 104 Am. St. Rep. 958, 78 Pac. 923, the court, in reversing a judgment for the defendant on the ground that the question of scienter was not submitted to the jury, said: "It is the contention of the respondents, in brief, as gathered from a citation from the case of Cadwell v. Arnheim, supra, that there is no rule of law which compels a person driving horses upon a highway to keep them absolutely under control; that he is bound to exercise only that degree of diligence and care which a man of ordinary prudence might be expected to exercise under the same circumstances; that, in the course of the affairs of life, accidents must happen, and, if they are not attributable to the breach of some legal duty owing to the sufferer, he is without legal right to complain. This, no doubt, is a correct statement of the law."

It has been held also in Canada that, in 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

order to permit a recovery, there must be negligence on the part of the proprietor of the horse. Quebec v. Picard, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 14 C. S. 94.

In Patterson v. Fanning, 2 Ont. L. Rep. 462, affirming 1 Ont. L. Rep. 412, where the defendant's horses escaped from the field in which they were pasturing, into the highway, through a defective fence, and on the highway they were startled by a boy, and, running away, went upon the sidewalk where the plaintiff was walking, and knocked her down, there was a by-law of the city making it unlawful for any person to allow his horses to run at large within the city. Armour, C. J. O., said: "The effect of this by-law being in existence was, in my opinion, that the same liability was imposed upon the defendant in allowing his horses to run at large upon the public highway as would have been imposed upon him at the common law, had he allowed his horses to stray into the land of his neighbor without the default of his neighbor; that he was bound to take care that his horses did not run at large upon the public highway, and that he was answerable for the consequences of their doing so." Osler, J. A., said it was conceded that the horses had no right to be unattended and at large upon the highway, but whether he grounds this opinion upon the by-law of the city or not is not clear.

B. B. B.

defendant was not liable." Tillett v. Ward, L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 17. In the case last cited, Coleridge, Ch. J., says: "Persons who have property adjacent to a highway may be taken to hold it subject to the risk of injury from inevitable risk. . . . The accident to the plaintiff was one of the necessary and inevitable risks which arise from driving cattle in the streets in or out of town."

This exception to the common-law rule referred to, or supplementary rule of the modern common law, whichever it may be called, is recognized in Wisconsin. It is said in Harrison v. Brown, supra: "It is further conceded, that the alleged trespass was committed by the hogs escaping through the fence while running at large and depasturing in the highway, and not in consequence of breaking into the close while being driven along the same in transitu." The court seemed to think it was necessary to draw this distinction. See also Van Roy v. Watermolen, 125 Wis. 333, 104 N. W. 97. This is also supported by Roche v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 5 Wis. 55, and Fahn v. Reichart, 8 Wis. 255, 76 Am. Dec. 237. In the latter case it is said: "A possible damage to another in the cautious and prudent exercise of a lawful right is not to be regarded, and, if a loss is the consequence, it is damnum absque injuria." See also Wood v. Snider, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 912, and cases in note (187 N. Y. 28, 79 N. E. 858), 1 Thomp. Neg. §§ 1294, 1297; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 588; Erdman v. Gottshall, 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 295. The case of Chunot v. Larson, 43 Wis. 536, 28 Am. Rep. 567, chiefly relied upon in the court below to support the decision, is not in point. That case falls under a different rule of law.

Judgment reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for defendants.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

JULIUS H. SURE, Appt.,

v.

MILWAUKEE ELECTRIC RAILWAY &
LIGHT COMPANY, Resp't.

(148 Wis. 1, 133 N. W. 1098.)

Carrier — injury to passenger — act of fellow passenger.

A street car company is not liable for injury to a passenger standing in the vestibule, by the act of a fellow passenger in releasing, without request from or notice to the company, a set brake, and letting the handle whirl around, where there is nothing to show that it ought to have anticipated 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that passengers would meddle with its machinery.

(January 9, 1912.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Note. — Liability of carrier for injury resulting from negligent or meddlesome act of fellow passenger.

Cases involving injuries to passengers resulting from crowded conditions on cars or at stations are excluded from this note, and notes covering such situations will be found appended to Lynn v. Southern P. Co. 24 L.R.A. 711; Alton Light & Traction Co. v. Oller, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 399; Kuhlen v. Boston & M. Street R. Co. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 729; and Glennen v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 470.

The general rule underlying the cases in this note seems to be that a carrier will not be liable for injuries to passengers from negligent or meddlesome acts of other passengers, unless it has notice of such acts, or reason to anticipate them, and that injury will result from them.

This is also the general rule as to liability of a carrier for injuries resulting to a passenger from acts of a fellow passenger. 6 Cyc. 602.

Accidental discharge of firearms.

The general rule above stated is well illustrated by the cases under this head.

Thus, in Northern Commercial Co. v. Nestor, 70 C. C. A. 523, 138 Fed. 383, and West Memphis Packet Co. v. White, 99 Tenn. 256, 38 L.R.A. 427, 41 S. W. 583, the owners of steamboats who permitted shooting therefrom were held liable for injury to passengers from the accidental discharge of guns in the hands of other passengers.

And in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Flake, 114 Tenn. 671, 108 Am. St. Rep. 925, 88 S. W. 326, a carrier which failed to interfere with drunken passengers who were exploding dynamite caps in canes, and shooting pistols, was held liable for injury to a passenger from the accidental discharge of a pistol in the hands of one of such passengers.

On the other hand, in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Long, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 604, 36 S. W. 485, where a passenger who was somewhat intoxicated, but not boisterous, stumbled on some baggage as he was passing through the car, and a revolver fell from his pocket and was discharged, injuring plaintiff, it was held that the company had no reason to anticipate such a result from the passenger being permitted on the cars, and was therefore not liable.

And in Flint v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. 6 Blatchf. 158, 34 Conn. 554, Fed. Cas.

Statement by Winslow, Ch. J.:

Action for personal injuries. On the 27th day of February, 1908, plaintiff boarded one of defendant's cars standing at the east end of the North avenue line, and became a passenger thereon. The car was soon to start upon its return trip. The plaintiff was smoking and stood in the rear vestibule, as required by the rules of the company. The rear brake was set in order to hold the car in its position until it was ready to start, and the plaintiff stood very close to the handle thereof, which is a heavy brass handle such as is usual in city street cars. Just as the motorman started the car, or just after he had started it, a boy standing on the rear platform intentionally and without authority from the conductor, but with the idea of assisting in the operation of the car, released the brake, and either accidentally or otherwise let go of the handle, and it swung around with considerable rapidity and force, striking the plaintiff a blow in the stomach of some severity, and for which this action is brought.

The brake and its mechanism are thus correctly described in respondent's brief: "The brake handle swings freely towards the left or anti-clockwise, but, when moved clockwise, the ratchet in the handle at the point where the handle is attached to the brake staff engages the brake staff and turns the entire staff so as to wind up a chain fastened at the lower end of the staff and under the platform of the car. When the chain is wound up to the desired point, a ratchet wheel, through which the

No. 4,873, where a passenger upon a steamboat which was carrying a large number of soldiers, among whom was some disorder, was injured by the accidental discharge of a gun dropped or thrown down by a soldier, it was left for the jury to determine whether or not defendant had exercised proper care for the protection of its passengers.

Articles negligently placed.

The specific question as to the liability of a carrier for injury to a passengers from baggage or parcels placed in the aisle of a car is treated in a note appended to Pitcher v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 481, and such cases are therefore excluded from this note.

In Morris v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 678, 13 N. E. 455, where a wringer fell from the parcel rack and injured plaintiff, it was held that the carrier was liable only for failure to exercise ordinary care to prevent such accidents, and that such failure was not shown, inasmuch as the wringer was so wrapped as to conceal its identity and prevent the attracting of particular attention to it on the part of defendant's employees.

And this same degree of care was held to be all that was required in such cases, in Whiting v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 97 App. Div. 11, 89 N. Y. Supp. 584, and a judgment for plaintiff was reversed, it appearing that there was no evidence that the appearance of the grip which struck plaintiff was such as to indicate that it was insecurely placed in the rack, or was likely to fall.

And in Adams v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 134 Ky. 620, 135 Am. St. Rep. 425, 121 S. W. 419, 21 Ann. Cas. 321, where a woman wearing a heavy veil was injured by a suit case belonging to another passenger falling from the parcel rack, it was held to be for the jury to determine if the trainmen, by the exercise of ordinary care, should have apprehended danger from the suit case to a passenger sitting beneath it.

Mass. 293, 96 N. E. 675, an action for injuries to a street car passenger struck as he was entering the car, by a tool left standing in the vestibule by another passenger, it was held that the lower court could not say, as matter of law, that the company was negligent, but that it was a question of fact.

And in Farrier v. Colorado Springs Rapid Transit R. Co. 42 Colo. 331, 126 Am. St. Rep. 158, 95 Pac. 294, where a hoe was carried by a passenger in such a way that it was caught by the forward car and a part of it thrown back against plaintiff, it was held to be for the jury to say whether the conductor was negligent in permitting the hoe to be carried in that position.

Fires.

In Sullivan v. Jefferson Ave. R. Co. 133 Mo. 1, 32 L.R.A. 167, 34 S. W. 566, a street car company was held not liable for injuries received by a passenger when a fellow passenger negligently threw a lighted match which ignited her dress, where its employees did all they could to extinguish the fire when it was discovered. And in Fanizzi v. New York & F. C. R. Co. 113 App. Div. 440, 99 N. Y. Supp. 281, where a lady's dress was ignited in the same manner, the Sullivan Case was approved, and recovery was denied to a passenger injured in the panic which ensued, the court holding, furthermore, that the fact that the passenger who threw the match was allowed to smoke in the front seat, contrary to the rules, was not sufficient to charge defendant with negligence, as such act could not be regarded as the proximate cause of the injury.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shields, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 652, 28 S. W. 709, 29 S. W. 652, where a drunken passenger boarded the train, carrying a sack in which was a jug of alcohol, which he dropped, breaking the jug and spilling the alcohol, which was almost immediately ignited by another passenger, burning plaintiff, it was held that the company was not liable.

brake staff passes, and which is keyed firmly to the staff, is engaged by a dog being pressed against the ratchet by the foot of the operator, and the staff is thus held until the brake handle is forcibly moved clockwise far enough to disengage the dog from the ratchet, or until the dog is by some other method forcibly removed from the ratchet. At all times, except when the dog is engaged, the brake handle moves freely anti-clockwise." It was the conductor's duty to loosen this brake at about the time the car started, and the conductor testified that just as or just after he gave the motorman the signal to start, he was coming out of the back door of the car to release the brake, and it was released by the boy.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"Question 1: Did the witness Harold Krebs release the brake at the time of the accident? Answer: Yes.

"Question 2: If you answer question No. 1 'yes,' then answer: Was such release of the brake by Harold Krebs the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff? Answer: Yes.

"Question 3: Ought the defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have anticipated that the brake, if left in a set position, might be released by a jar or jolt caused by the operation of the car? Answer: No.

"Question 4: Ought the defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have anticipated that the brake, if left in a set position, might be released by a person upon the car not an employee? Answer: Yes.

"Question 5: Was the failure of the defendant to exercise the care described in the third and fourth questions, or either of them, the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff? Answer: Yes.

"Question 6: Was the plaintiff guilty of any want of ordinary care which proximately contributed to his injury? Answer: No.

"Question 7: What sum will reasonably compensate the plaintiff for the injury which he sustained? Answer: $1,000."

On motion the court changed the answers to the fourth and fifth questions from "Yes" to "No," and rendered judgment for the defendant on the verdict, from which the plaintiff appeals.

Couplings and air brakes.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Storey, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 156, 83 S. W. 852, it is held that as long as an air brake was sufficient while the train remained intact, the company was not liable for injury to a passenger caused by collision of two parts of the train after it had been uncoupled by a drunken passenger, as this act, not the failure of the air brake to stop the detached car before the forward part of the train stopped, was the proximate cause of the injury.

In McDonnell v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 35 App. Div. 147, 54 N. Y. Supp. 747, appeal dismissed in 159 N. Y. 524, 53 N. E. 1127, it is held that the carrier was not liable to a passenger injured by the parting of the train caused by a passenger in the rear coach inadvertently setting the air brake.

Announcements and signals.

In Columbus & I. C. R. Co. v. Farrell, 31 Ind. 408, the court said that an instruction that the railroad company was legally responsible for the actions of persons not its servants, in falsely announcing the station, whereby plaintiff was injured in alighting in the dark, was clearly erroneous, but harmless, inasmuch as the jury found that the announcement was in fact made by defendant's servants.

In Cohen v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. 228 Pa. 243, 77 Atl. 500, it is held that a carrier is not liable to a passenger injured while boarding a car, by the premature starting of the car by an unauthorized fellow passenger.

In Ferry v. Manhattan R. Co. 118 N. Y. 497, 23 N. E. 822, affirming 22 Jones & S. 325, it was held that the carrier was not liable for injuries received by a passenger because of the premature starting of the train, if the starting signal was given by another passenger who, according to some of the evidence, grabbed the bell rope to steady himself.

And in Mississippi & T. R. Co. v. Harrison, 66 Miss. 419, 14 Am. St. Rep. 573, 6 So. 319, where plaintiff knew that the giving of the signal for the train to move was the unauthorized act of a fellow passenger, but nevertheless attempted to alight as it was starting, it was held that she was not entitled to recover for injuries received in doing so.

In Nichols v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 168 Mass. 528, 47 N. E. 427, where a passenger was injured while alighting from a street car which started prematurely on signal given by another passenger, it was held that the company was liable, it appearing that the same passenger had given the stopping signal, and that, to the knowledge of the conductor, passengers sometimes took it upon themselves to give signals.

In Blair v. Brooklyn, Q. C. & S. R. Co. 141 App. Div. 843, 126 N. Y. Supp. 466, it was held that the street car company was liable to a passenger injured while alighting, by the premature starting of the car on signal of another passenger, it appearing that the conductor, though on the platform was counting transfers and paying attention to nothing else, and that the passenger had given the signal before on that trip.

And in Leavenworth Electric R. Co. v.

Mr. H. B. Walmsley, with Mr. W. B. Rubin, for appellant:

The company, as persons of ordinary care and prudence, ought reasonably to have anticipated that some injury to someone might naturally and probably result somehow from the situation in which the brake was left before the boy touched it.

Other cases involving the liability of a street car company for injury to alighting passengers by the starting of a car on signal of a fellow passenger will be found in a note appended to Cary v. Los Angeles R. Co. 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 764.

Miscellaneous cases.

In Simmons v. New Bedford, V. & N. S. B. Co. 97 Mass. 361, 93 Am. Dec. 99, where a passenger on a steamboat was injured by the falling of a small boat suspended above the deck, because of other passengers getting into it, the court said: "They were not indeed responsible for the negligent or wrongful acts of the passengers to the same extent as for those of their own officers and crew. But they had the power to make reasonable regulations as to the places which passengers might occupy, and as to their conduct while on board. And they were bound to use the utmost skill and care of prudent men in taking precautions to prevent any passenger from being injured by the ignorant, negligent, or reckless acts of other passengers."

plaintiff was injured by the street car door being closed upon her as she was entering the car, it was held that the closing of the door was evidence of negligence, and made a prima facie case, even if some passenger intentionally started the machinery by which it was closed, as the mechanism was under defendant's control, and it was its duty to see that no stranger started it.

In Montgomery Traction Co. v. Whatley, 152 Ala. 101, 126 Am. St. Rep. 17, 44 So. 538, where a passenger was injured by a drunken fellow passenger falling against her, a judgment for plaintiff was sustained, it appearing that the passenger, though so drunk he could not stand, was permitted to pass up and down the car instead of being required to remain seated or leave the car.

It is as much the duty of a carrier to see that its passengers are safely landed as it is to see that they are safely carried, and in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Russell, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 578, 28 S. W. 1042, the company was held liable for injuries to a passenger received while alighting, by being jostled by other passengers scuffling on the platform of the car, which it could have prevented had it had an employee in attendance upon alighting passengers.

In Dumas v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 43 S. W. 908, the railway company was held not liable for an injury received by a woman passenger by the falling of a window which a fellow passenger had raised for her, but which he failed to raise far enough to catch.

Winslow, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The brake in question and all the machinery connected with it seem to have been of approved pattern, in excellent condition, and were absolutely essential machinery for the proper operation of the car. So far as appears in the case, it would not be possible to have a brake covered or so firmly fastened in position that a passenger could not release it if he deliberately endeavored to do so, and yet have it capable of instant release by an employee when the necessities of the service required. There are numerous appliances of this nature connected with the transportation of passengers by steam and by electricity as well.

The general principle often decided is that a carrier is not bound to anticipate that a passenger will intentionally meddle or interfere with the machinery of the car or train; that the meddler becomes thereby a trespasser, and, if injury results to another passenger by his act, the carrier will not be liable, in the absence of any other ground of negligence. Carriers are rightly held to a high degree of diligence, but they are not held responsible for the lawless acts of third persons not under their control, which they could not reasonably anticipate. McDonnell v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 35 App. Div. 147, 54 N. Y. Supp. 747; McDonough v. Third Ave. R. Co. 95 App. Div. 311, 88 N. Y. Supp. 609; Moore v. Woonsocket R. Co. 27 R. I. 450, 114 Am. St. Rep. 59, 63 Atl. 313; Krone v. Southwest Missouri Electric R. Co. 97 Mo. App. 609, 71 S. W. 712. While there is some evidence in the case to the effect that passengers sometimes played with the brake, or leaned against it, or touched the dog with their feet, there is absolutely nothing in the evidence to show that a passenger was ever known to deliberately loosen it when properly set as in this case. Had the brake here been released by accident, by reason of a passenger striking the dog with the foot and releasing it, or in some other purely accidental way, the question presented would be of a different character.

On the undisputed facts presented, a verdict for the defendant should have been directed, on the ground that no negligence was shown.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

EDDIE A. REDMAN, Impleaded, etc.,
Appt.,
v.

JACOB HUBBARD et al.

(140 Ky. 71, 130 S. W. 955.)

Will — vested remainder.

1. Under a will directing that an estate be held for the use of testator's son and his family for life, and that after his death the property so set apart shall pass and

Note. — Character of remainder given by will as affected by a direction that children, etc., of a deceased remainderman, shall take their parent's share.

In solving the question which forms the subject of the present inquiry, when presented in any given case, the courts are obliged, more or less consciously, to dispose of one or more of the following questions:

First, during what period does the contingency implied by the provision operate, the lifetime of the testator, or the continuance of the precedent estate? If the former, obviously the remainder will vest absolutely upon testator's decease; if the latter, it thereupon becomes necessary to consider,

Second, whether the element of contingency is incorporated into the description of or into the gift to the remainderman, in which case the remainder is contingent; or whether it is merely annexed to the gift in the character of a condition subsequent, in which case the remainder is vested subject to be divested by the operation of the contingency. This question sometimes appears clothed in a different phraseology, its variant form being whether the gift to the children, descendants, issue, etc., of a deceased remainderman, was intended to be original or substitutional. If the gift is original, the children, etc., take under the original gift as members of the class to whom the remainder is limited. If it is substitutional, they take by executory devise or bequest upon the contingency by go to his children, the descendants of any child to take the share which its parent would have taken if alive at the time, the interest of the children is vested, and the father will inherit from any child who dies in his lifetime without issue.

Levy — estate of life tenant — rental.

2. A judgment creditor of a life tenant may have the estate rented out, and the income applied in satisfaction of his claim, until the debt is paid or the estate terminates.

Judgment — res judicata — construction of will.

3. A judgment in an action to enjoin the sale of real estate as the property of a judgment debtor, to the effect that he did not inherit any part of it from his child, is which the remainder given to their parent is devested.

And before a case involving the question under consideration may be finally disposed of, it may become necessary to determine whether the contingency implied from the provision that children of a deceased remainderman shall take their parent's share, upon which a vested remainder may be devested, is one of dying simply (with a substitutional gift to descendants if any), or of dying leaving descendants. If the former, the remainder is devested by death alone; if the latter, it is devested only in case of death leaving issue.

There are, then, accordingly as the context evinces the testator's intention, four possible conclusions to be reached in the class of cases under discussion: 1, That the remainder is contingent; 2, that the remainder is vested (no necessity existing for determining whether or not it is likely to be devested); 3, that the remainder is vested subject to be devested; and 4, that it is vested absolutely. Now in certain situations, e. g., where a remainderman has died during the continuance of the life estate leaving issue, and without having attempted to alien or encumber his interest, it is obviously immaterial, for most practical purposes, whether the court calls the remainder one contingent on surviving the life tenant with an original gift to issue, or one vested subject to be devested upon the contingency which has occurred, with a substitutional gift to issue by way of executory devise. But suppose him to have died without issue, it manifestly becomes a question of importance whether the remainder was contingent or vested subject to be devested, unless, indeed, the contingency itself is interpreted as meaning death during the continuance of the preceding estate, either with or without issue. And even in the situation first supposed, that of a remainderman dying with issue, it may still be important to determine whether the remainder is contingent or vested subject to be devested, as in one case the contingency of survival may also apply to the gift to the deceased remainderman's children, whereas in the other case the devesting clause would operate only on without effect, where a prior unmodified judgment in a suit to settle the accounts of the trustee, to which the interested persons were parties, determined that he did so inherit.

A PPEAL by defendant Redman from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Larue County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to subject the rents and income of a life estate in certain lands to the payment of a judgment against the owner thereof. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

the deceased remainderman's estate. Again, in certain situations, it may be that a case may be disposed of by simply holding that a remainder is vested, without proceeding to consider whether or not it is subject to become devested. Clearly cases of this sort cannot be considered as authority for regarding remainders created by similar testamentary provisions as absolutely vested.

These instances are adduced to show the necessity of reading each decision in the light of the situation occasioning the litigation. An attempt has therefore been made in setting out the decisions contained in this note to indicate, whenever it seemed advisable, or was possible to do so, the situation of the parties and the ultimate question before the court for decision.

The reader's attention is also directed to the fact that decisions in New York and other states having statutory definitions of vested and contingent remainders, upon the question whether a remainder is vested or not, are to be received with some caution, owing to the fact that by virtue of such definitions remainders are sometimes held to be vested which at common law would have been regarded as contingent; although this is not apt to be the case, in the more recent decisions at least unless some question as to the unlawful suspension of the power of alienation is involved. This complication is explained in detail in a note to Robertson v. Guenther, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 889.

This note includes both those cases in which the effect of a provision that the children of a deceased remainderman shall take their parent's share has been directly considered, and those in which such a provision existed, although not expressly referred to. It does not, however, assume to present cases in which the question is as to the character of a remainder created by a gift either to individuals or a class and their heirs, children, descendants, etc., or by a gift to them or their heirs, children, descendants, etc., without the superadded provision as to the issue taking the parent's share, as in such case the element of contingency is not so clearly created, and the decision is apt to go off upon the question whether there is a substitutional gift or

Mr. John S. Kelley, with Mr. L. A. Faurest, for appellant:

M. M. Hubbard inherited no part of the remainder from his deceased daughters.

That M. M. Hubbard took no interest in the remainder by inheritance from his daughters is res judicata.

23 Cyc. 1288, 1302; Owingsville & Mt. S. Turnp. Road Co. v. Hamilton, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 815, 53 S. W. 5; Newport v. Newport & C. Bridge Co. 90 Ky. 193, 8 L.R.A. 484, 13 S. W. 720; Mills v. Hopkinsville, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 164, 11 S. W. 776; Stevenson v. Flournoy, 89 Ky. 561, 13 S. W. 210.

whether the words are merely words of limitation. Nor does it assume to include cases in which the question as to whether the remainder is contingent or vested turns on the time at which the class is to be ascertained, although there may be a provision that descendants of a deceased member of a class shall take the parent's share, e. g., where the remainder is given to "surviving children" or to members of a class "whom shall be living at that time," etc. Most, if not all, of these, may be found in the note in 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 888, on "Character of remainder created by grant or devise to one for life, with remainder to his children who may survive him."

So far as it is possible to make any general statement in regard to the cases upon the question under consideration, it is that a direction that the children or descendants of a deceased remainderman shall take their parent's share is not of itself sufficient to warrant the inference of an intention on the part of a testator that the remainder shall be contingent, at least where no period of time beyond the testator's death is indicated for its operation; or, to put it in another way, such a direction is not sufficient to prevent a remainder from being held to be vested.

In Gibbens v. Gibbens, 140 Mass. 102, 54 Am. Rep. 453, 3 N. E. 1, the court said: "Words to the effect that the issue of deceased children shall take by right of representation are not uncommon in wills when, strictly speaking, they are entirely unnecessary; and the use of so familiar and common an expression does not carry with it a strong inference that the testator thereby designed to express some peculiar intention with reference to the vesting or contingency of the interest devised."

In some cases such a provision is regarded as having been inserted to protect the issue of a remainderman from the supposed consequence of their parent's death in the lifetime of testator. See Johnes v. Beers, 57 Conn. 295, 14 Am. St. Rep. 101, 18 Atl. 100; Northern Trust Co. v. Wheaton, 249 Ill. 606, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1150, 94 N. E. 980; *Heilman v. In other cases it is regarded as denoting merely the inheritable quality of the estate. See Knight v. Pottgieser, 176 Ill. 368, 54 N. E. 934; Middleton v. Middleton, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1232, 43 S. W. 677; REDMAN v. HUBBARD; Trowbridge v. Coss, 126 App. Div. 679, 110 N. Y. Supp. 1108, affirmed without opinion in 195 N. Y. 596, 89 N. E. 1114.

Such a provision does not operate in any way to abridge the estate given the remaindermen, even though it is regarded as creating a substitutional or alternative gift. See McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 340, 28 L. ed. 1015, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652; Clanton v. Estes, 77 Ga. 352, 1 S. E. 163; Taylor v. Stephens, 165 Ind. 200, 74 N. E. 980; Engel v. State, 65 Md. 539, 5 Atl. 249; *Lenz v. Y. 688, 30 N. E. 68; Fishburne v. Sigwald, 79 S. C. 551, 60 S. E. 1105.

It is referred to in Hudgens v. Wilkins, 77 Ga. 555, as casting some doubt upon the character of the remainder, although not sufficient to prevent it from being regarded as vested; and in Thompson v. Thompson, 28 Barb. 432, as being consistent with vesting, for the reason that the statute of distribution would place the issue in the same position.

According to the court in Re Tienken, 131 N. Y. 391, 30 N. E. 109, however, it is an argument of some force that such a clause is needless except upon a construction which postpones vesting until the termination of the life estate; and in one instance (Schaeffer v. Schaeffer, 54 W. Va. 681, 46 S. E. 160) the fact that the bard had a life estate under the will of John S. Hubbard. The appellant, Eddie A. Redman, a daughter of M. M. Hubbard, and who owns the remainder of the estate in which M. M. Hubbard has a life estate, resisted the effort to subject the income and rent, upon the ground that M. M. Hubbard had wasted or taken possession and disposed of a large part of the principal of the estate, and therefore was not entitled to receive, nor could his creditor subject, any portion of the income or rent until the principal used by him had been restored. In answer to this, and in avoidance of the claim of the remainderman, it is insisted for Jacob Hubbard that, although M. M. Hubbard took only a life estate under the will, he subsequently inherited under the law of descent and distribution two thirds of the remainder, from two of his daughters who died intestate, and that the only part of the principal estate used by him was that portion received by inheritance from his deceased daughters. They further set up that in a suit in the Jefferson circuit court it was adjudged that the trustee under the will of John S. Hubbard had properly paid him the amounts received by them, and therefore the question of whether he was entitled to said amounts was res judicata.

The lower court held that M. M. Hubbard took no interest in the estate by descent from his deceased daughters, but decided that the settlement of the accounts of M. M. Hubbard as trustee in the suit of Stratton v. Hubbard in the Jefferson chan-statute will prevent a lapse in such a case has been held to render it proper to consider such words as importing a contingency.

In some instances, in each of which a reference to some point of time formed a part of the provision, it has been regarded as supporting an inference of an intention to give a contingent remainder. See People v. Byrd, 253 Ill. 223, 97 N. E. 293; Clark v. Cammann, 160 N. Y. 316, 53 N. E. 749; Rosengarten v. Ashton, 228 Pa. 389, 77 Atl. 562; Fulkerson v. Bullard, 3 Sneed, 260.

In some cases inferences of an intention that the remainder shall be contingent will be found to have drawn from the phraseology of the provision that the children of the deceased remainderman shall take; as where the gift to the children is of the share which the parent "would have taken if living" (see People v. Byrd, 253 Ill. 223, 97 N. E. 293; Rosengarten v. Ashton, 228 Pa. 389, 11 Atl. 562), or where the provision is that they shall take the share "which would have vested in their parents" (see Cummings v. Hamilton, 220 Ill. 480, 77 N. E. 264).

The conclusion reached in many of the following cases is often considerably influenced by the form of the gift, since the fact that a gift is not direct, but takes the form of a direction to divide and distribute, although not controlling, gives rise to a strong inference of an intention to postpone vesting.

Where the remainder is given to persons named or otherwise definitely designated, and there is no clause of survivorship, the fact that a construction of the will which will render the remainder contingent may produce an intestacy as to the share of any of such persons who may die without leaving children surviving, during the continuance of the precedent estate, is a consideration which will influence the courts to regard the remainder as a vested one. See Northern Trust Co. v. Wheaton, 249 Ill. 606, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1150, 94 N. E. 980; Roberts v. Roberts, 102 Md. 131, 137 L.R.A.(N.S.)

This objection is, of course, obviated by the fact that there is an alternative limitation over in the case of the remainderman's death without issue. As to the time to which the contingency of death of the legatee or devisee without children or issue, upon which a gift is conditioned, is referable, see note to Smith v. Smith, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1045, especially the discussion, at page 1100, of the doctrine that where a gift in absolute terms is followed by limitations over, both in the event of death leaving issue and in the event of death without issue, the contingencies are to be restricted to the period before the primary gift takes effect.

While the circumstances that persons to whom a remainder is limited are not children of a testator or relatives of blood or marriage is of no affirmative weight to show that the remainder in question is contingent, there is in such case an absence of one consideration, which, if present, would have tended strongly to indicate that a vested remainder was created. Crapo v. Price, 190 Mass. 317, 76 N. E. 1043.

It seeming that the convenience of the user of this note will be best subserved by such an arrangement, the decisions which follow are grouped primarily with reference to the results reached therein, and secondly (so far as possible) with regard to the similarity of the testamentary provisions under construction, rather than to the considerations inducing the adoption of the conclusions therein.

Instances in which remainder is held contingent.

In Bates v. Gillett, 132 Ill. 287, 24 N. E. 611, testator devised his real estate to his three children equally for life, "and after the death of either of them, their share to be equally divided amongst their children or their descendants, giving to the descendants of each child one share." In a subsequent portion of the will he expressed his intention to give his daughters an estate cery court, and the orders of that court relative thereto, were conclusive of the question that M. M. Hubbard was entitled to the fund alleged to be a part of the principal estate that was paid to him by the trustee, and accordingly decreed that the land should be rented out to pay the debt due by M. M. Hubbard to Jacob Hubbard.

So much of the will of John S. Hubbard as it is necessary to consider in disposing of this case reads as follows: "I direct that my estate shall be divided in two equal parts whenever my executor shall deem it proper to do so. The one equal half to be held by said executor for the use of the family of my son, M. M. Hubbard, including himself, during his life, to be used for the support of himself and family residing with him and his wife, so long as the children are under age and remain with their parents. But after the death of my said son, the share of my estate set apart for the use of his family is to pass to and go to his children or descendants, the descendants of any child to take the share which its parent would have taken if alive at the time. The income from this portion of my estate may be by my executor paid to my son if, in the judgment of said executor, said son is leading a sober and temperate life; but if not, then the same is to be from time to time paid to the wife of my said son, and her receipt shall be an acquittance to said executor for the same. Only the rents, profits, and issues are to be paid over by said executor. . . ." At the

for life "and the remainder to their children and descendants." The question having arisen as to whether a child of a daughter dying in her lifetime without issue took an heritable interest, it was held that, even without taking into account the use of the disjunctive "or," which might be regarded as having the effect to create an alternative devise to the descendants of a daughter other than her children, and to import a condition which could not be determined until the period of distribution had arrived,—as, at the time of making the will, and when the devisee of the life estate took effect by the death of the testator, a daughter was unmarried, and there was no person in existence to take the remainder under the will; as the division of each daughter's share was to take place "after the death of either of them," and as the designation of "descendants," in the phrase "children and descendants," as persons entitled to participate in the division, would be unmeaning and useless, should the remainder be regarded as vesting in the children of a daughter at their birth, it was testator's intention that the remainder should not so vest, but should be contingent upon their surviving a period when the estate was to vest in possession.

In Dohn v. Dohn, 110 Ky. 884, 62 S. W. 1033, 64 S. W. 352 (which is distinguished in REDMAN v. HUBBARD), testator, after creating a trust for the benefit of his wife during her lifetime and his children until the youngest should attain twenty-five years of age, provided: "After the death of my wife, and when my youngest child is twenty-five years of age, my entire estate, real and personal, of every nature and description, shall be divided in equal parts among my children or their heirs. The issue of the child or children dying shall inherit the share of its parent." The question having arisen as to whether a son who died without issue took an heritable interest, it was held that no intention that the remainder should vest in the children who survived the testator could be drawn from the provision that the issue of the child or children dying should "inherit" the share of its parent, as, if the death of the child be referred to the period before the testator's death, the issue would not inherit at all, either from its parent or from the testator, but would take under the will, so that it is probable that the word "inherit" was loosely used in lieu of "take;" but as the devise in the clause under consideration is coupled with and following a provision for the time of distribution, and as neither the words nor context tend to show that the payment directed was postponed for the convenience of the estate, or to let in some other interest, the interests taken by testator's children were conditioned upon their surviving the time for distribution.

In Ross v. Ware, 131 Ky. 828, 116 S. W. 241, where a testator bequeathed all his real estate to his wife, to have the use and control thereof until all his children, who were to have the privilege of living with the wife and were to be supported and maintained by her, should become twenty-one years of age, when the property was to be sold and the proceeds divided,  $\frac{1}{3}$  to the wife, "and the balance to be equally divided between my children or their descendants, the descendants getting the portion the parent would have gotten," and the question arose as to who was entitled to participate in the distribution, two of the children having died without issue, it was held that, viewing the will as a whole, it was but reasonable to assume that it was the intention of the testator to defer the vesting in his children of the title of the estate devised them, until the period fixed by the will for its distribution and delivery to them should arrive.

In Schaeffer v. Schaeffer, 54 W. Va. 681, 46 S. E. 150, a testator gave his wife for life all his property, with power to sell some and use its proceeds, and then provided: "At the death of my wife what real and personal property may be left shall be sold and divided equally among my children, or their children, or their representatives." Two of his sons having died leaving children, in the lifetime of the widow, the question arose as to whether deeds of trust given by them on their interest in their father's estate constituted a valid death of the testator, M. M. Hubbard had a wife and three children. Two of these children died in infancy prior to 1900, neither having married; and the wife of M. M. Hubbard died several years before this suit was brought,—the only remaining child being the appellant, Mrs. Eddie A. Redman, who is some thirty-five years of age. The estate received by M. M. Hubbard and his family under the will consisted of real property worth some $12,000. This property was sold by a trustee under a power given in the will, and about one half of the proceeds was paid to M. M. Hubbard by the trustee, and the remainder invested by the trustee in the land, the rent of which it is sought to subject in this action. If, therefore, M. M. Hubbard inherited two thirds of the estate from his deceased daughters, he has not received any part of the principal estate to which his daughter, Mrs. Redman, is or was entitled, and so her defense must fail. It is therefore apparent that the first question to be disposed of is: Did M. M. Hubbard inherit from his deceased daughters?

It is insisted by counsel for Mrs. Redman that the children of M. M. Hubbard took not a vested estate in the land devised by the will, but only a contingent remainder or defeasible fee, depending upon their survivorship of their father, M. M. Hubbard, and so he did not take by inheritance from his deceased daughters. In other words, the argument is made that no estate vested in the children until the death of M. M. Hubbard, and that at his death Mrs. Redman, lien thereon, as against the claims of their children. It was held that the words "or their children" could not be regarded as having been used to prevent lapse from the death of a child in testator's life, because likely those very words by their force would prevent a lapse, and also because the statute would prevent it; but that they import a condition that the testator's children shall survive the life tenant, on which the vesting of any estate depends, rendering the remainder to testator's sons contingent.

In Re Ehle, 109 Fed. 625, it was held that under a will by which testator created a trust for the benefit of his children and grandchildren, naming them, directing its division among the grandchildren at the termination of the trust, "or their lawful children, for their own use and in their own right forever," and further providing that if any of them should not be living and should have no lawful children when the trust fund was to be divided, it should be given to the surviving grandchildren, a grandchild took no vested interest which would pass to his trustee in bankruptcy.

In Crapo v. Price, 190 Mass. 317, 76 N. E. 1043, a testatrix directed a sum of money to be held in trust for a friend during her life, and after her decease, to pay, distribute, and divide the principal fund to and among the friend's children "and the issue of any deceased child by right of representation, such issue taking the share which would have belonged to their deceased parent." It was held, in view of the fact that the remainder was not given to children of testatrix or to her relatives by blood or marriage; the fact that there were no words of present gift to the children of the life tenant, the gift being made by a direction to the trustees to distribute; and the fact that the natural import of the words used by the testatrix excludes those children who should die during the life estate without leaving issue, so that some of the legatees in the remainder cannot be ascertained until after the termination of the life estate, while the intention of the testatrix seems to have been that the whole fund should be divided among the beneficiaries whom she identifies by description,—that the persons entitled to take the gift in remainder were those who at the time of the death of the life tenant were her children and the issue of any deceased child by right of representation, and that a child of hers who died in her lifetime leaving no issue had no vested interest which would pass to the executor of his or her will.

In Brownback v. Keister, 220 Ill. 544, 77 N. E. 75, where testator, after creating a trust for the benefit of certain persons, provided that after the death of some of them, and when all the rest of them should have reached the age of twenty-one years, "the trust hereby created shall terminate, and said lands in the item described shall vest in fee simple absolutely in the said now living children of my said son, Julius, and his present wife, Matilda, and their descendants, share and share alike, the descendants of any of said above-named children taking the share of their parents," the question arose as to the title acquired by a purchaser of the interests of some of the grandchildren, and it was held that, as it could not be ascertained until the termination of the particular estate what persons would come within the description of remainderman as contained in the will, the remainder was a contingent one.

In Denison v. Denison, 96 App. Div. 418, 89 N. Y. Supp. 126, affirmed without opinion in 183 N. Y. 505, 76 N. E. 1093, testator devised certain realty in trust during the joint lives of his two daughters and the life of the survivor of them, to apply the net income for the use of one of them during her life, and in the event of her decease leaving the other daughter her surviving, to apply such income to the use of her children and the issue of such as might then be deceased, share and share alike, per stirpes, and not per capita. He further provided: "Upon the death of the survivor of my two said daughters, Pauline and Adele, then I devise one third of said two stores in fee to the children of my said daughter Pauline and the issue of such as may be then deceased, share and share alike, per stirpes, and not per capita." It was his only child, if living, or, if dead, her children, if any survive her, would be entitled to take the whole of the principal of the estate left by the will. In support of this construction, the case of Dohn v. Dohn, 110 Ky. 884, 62 S. W. 1033, 64 S. W. 352, is strongly relied on. In that case the estate was to be held in trust for the purposes designated in the will. In item 6 it provided that "after the death of my wife, and when my youngest child is twenty-five years of age, my entire estate, real and personal, of every nature and description, shall be divided in equal parts among my children or their heirs. The issue of the child or children dying shall inherit the share of its parent." It was held that the estate devised in item 6 was conditional upon the survival of the beneficiaries until the time fixed for the distribution; and, upon the death of one of them prior to that time, his interest, not having vested, did not pass to his heirs and distributees. But this construction of the will was rested upon the conclusion that the children did not take any present interest in the estate under the will. This is apparent from the language of the will, and we quote the following extract from the opinion as pertinent to the principle announced. "If the testator has annexed futurity to the substance of his bounty, and it is of the essence of the gift, then its vesting is suspended; but, if it merely relate to the enjoyment or payment of it, then it vests in presenti, unless this be made to depend upheld that the interest taken by Pauline's issue was contingent upon their surviving the termination of the trust estate, and hence was not devisable.

In Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Harris, 20 R. I. 408, 39 Atl. 750, it was held that under a gift of a trust estate on the determination of an estate given to testator's widow, to the children of testator's brother, and the issue of any of them who might then have deceased, in equal shares, the descendants taking the share his or her parent would have taken if then living, the remainders were contingent, the gift being to them and the descendants of any of them who may then have deceased, etc., since it could not be known until the determination of the widow's estate who of the children would survive that event, and thereby become entitled to the benefit of the gift.

In Rosengarten v. Ashton, 228 Pa. 389, 77 Atl. 502, a testator gave a moiety of his residuary estate to his executors and trustees in trust to pay over the net income for and during the lives of his children, equally to and among all of his children and the issue of such as might be dead, such issue to take the share of the said income of said trust estate the parent would have taken if living, and on the death of the last of his children, then to pay over and distribute said trust estate equally to and among all his grandchildren and the issue of such as might be dead, such issue to take the share the parent would have taken if living at the time of the death of his last surviving child. It was held that, as there was no direct or express gift to the grandchildren, whatever interest a grandchild took in the corpus of the estate passing under the direction for distribution, the intention of testator clearly appeared to make the interest taken by any grandchild to be contingent upon its surviving the termination of the particular estate, the court saying: "The testator directs what is to be done with what remains of his estate upon the death of his last child. He directs who shall take directly from him, and, while he does not expressly say that they are to be grandchildren then living and the issue of those dead, no other intention is to be gathered from his words, unless we deny them their ordinary meaning, in which sense the law presumes the testator used them. No share is given to the estate of a deceased grandchild. The condition of participation in the distribution is life at the time it is to be made. Living grandchildren and living issue of deceased grandchildren are to be the distributees. They constitute the exclusive class to which the testator declares his estate shall go. The issue of a deceased grandchild shall take 'the share the parent would have taken if living' at the time of distribution. Could words more clearly indicate the intention of the testator that a grandchild shall take only if living at the time of the death of his last child? And if a living grandchild will take only at that time, by the express words of the testator, it cannot take before."

In Paget v. Melcher, 156 N. Y. 399, 51 N. E. 24, it was held that under a will by which testator gave his wife the use of certain personal property during her natural life, and then provided: "Upon the decease of my said wife, the property by this and the preceding clause devised shall belong to my children, the descendants of any deceased child to take the share their parent would have taken if living; and if no descendants of mine survive my said wife, then said property shall belong and be delivered over by my executors to the same persons named as residuary legatees in case of such failure of descendants in the next clause of this will, and in the same proportion," the testator's children took no vested interests upon his decease, the concluding clause, that if no descendants of his should survive his wife, the property should belong and be delivered over by his executors to the persons named by him, showing that he did not intend that his children should have such a vested interest in the property during the lifetime of his wife as to make it pass under their wills or go to their next of kin.

The same testamentary provision came before the supreme court of Rhode Island in on an event which may never happen. The legacy is to be regarded as vested or contingent, according to the time when it is to take is annexed to the enjoyment of the gift or the gift itself. If there be no substantive gift, and it is only implied from a direction to pay, then the devise is contingent, unless a contrary intention may be collected from the words or context, or the payment be postponed for the convenience of the property or estate, or to let in some other interest.' In the case at bar we do not think a contrary intention may be collected from the words or context, or that the payment directed was postponed for the convenience of the estate, or to let in some other interest." In the case at bar the estate was to be held by the executor for the use of the family, including M. M. Hubbard, during his life, and the profits used for the support of himself and family. The devise was in effect to M. M. Hubbard, his wife, and children. The children took a present vested interest in the estate, only the enjoyment of their individual interest being postponed until his death. The interest they took was not postponed. It was only the enjoyment or use of it. The testator only intended that his estate should be kept together for the use and benefit of his son and family until the children were able to take care of themselves. When his son died, his children then living were to come into the use and possession of that part of the estate undisposed of by them to which they were entitled. If any of them died, not hav-Re Melcher, 24 R. I. 575, 54 Atl. 379, where a like conclusion was reached.

In Straus v. Rost, 67 Md. 465, 10 Atl. 74, where a testator devised all his property to his wife during widowhood, and provided that in the event of her marriage the whole of the estate was to be divided as though he had died intestate, that is to say one-third of the personality absolutely to the wife, and one-third of the realty for life, the balance or remainder to be divided equally among the children of the testator, "share and share alike, the issue or descendants of any deceased child or children to take per stirpes, and not per capita, the share such child or children would have respectively taken had such child or children survived," it was held that the survivorship mentioned in the will was referable to the second marriage of the widow, and therefore that the remainder did not vest until that time, so that the interest taken by a surviving child of a son dying during the continuance of the precedent estate was unaffected by any conveyance, assignment, or encumbrance placed upon the property by his father.

In Bowen v. Hackney, 136 N. C. 187, 67 L.R.A. 440, 48 S. E. 633, it was held that under a will giving real estate to testator's widow for life, and providing that at the expiration of the life estate, "that which is given to her for life shall be equally divided between all my children, share and share alike, the representatives of such as may have died to stand in the place of their ancestors," a child dying before the widow had no interest which would pass by its will, whether the remainder was contingent or vested subject to be divested by its death before that of her life tenant.

In Richey v. Johnson, 30 Ohio St. 288, where testator, after devising to his wife the use of a farm for life, continued: "I devise that my executors or the survivors of them, after the decease of my said wife, shall sell said last-mentioned farm, either at public or private sale, and that the proceeds thereof be divided equally between my brothers and sisters and their heirs,—the children of any that may be dead to have the shares of their deceased parents," it was held that, as the gift was of a fund which could not be raised until the death of the widow, and which was to be divided among brothers and sisters then living, the interest of the legatees remained contingent until the time fixed for distribution.

In Clark v. Cammann, 160 N. Y. 315, 54 N. E. 709, a testator directed a sum of money to be held in trust for the use of a niece for and during her natural life, "and from and immediately after her decease upon trust to pay over and divide the said principal sum of $10,000 unto and among all her children, share and share alike, and to their lawful representatives forever as tenants in common per capita, the issue of any such child who may then be dead to take his or her deceased parent's share." The niece's children having died without issue in the lifetime of their mother, the question arose as to the disposition of the remainder interest; and it was held, although the result of the construction was to produce an intestacy as to the fund, the remainder would not be held vested, the provision that "the issue of any such child who may then be dead to take his or her deceased parent's share" negating the claim that the estate vested in the sons; the fact that the gift was found only in a direction to the trustees to pay over to the sons on the death of their mother being also invoked in support of this conclusion. The court said: "The view that we entertain of this will is that the testator intended the estate to go to the issue of the sons of Mrs. Gillespie in case of the death of either during the existence of the life estate. No issue of these sons were in being at the death of the testator, and it was uncertain as to whether they would ever have issue. The remainder was therefore contingent, and not vested, for the reason that the persons to whom, or the event upon which, the estate was limited to take effect, remained uncertain until the termination of the life estate. Futurity was annexed to the substance of the gift, and the vesting was suspended."

In Lee v. Miller, 71 App. Div. 195, 75 N. Y. Supp. 673, a will by which testator gave ing disposed of their interest, and leaving descendants or children, then, at the death of the son, these descendants or children were to take what their parents would have taken if alive. There is no expression in the will indicating a purpose upon the part of the testator to postpone the vesting of the estate in the children until the death of their father. On the contrary, we think it plain that the direction that the executor was to hold the estate for the use of the family of M. M. Hubbard vested in his children the estate, subject to the enjoyment of it by M. M. Hubbard as long as he lived. These children took under the will an estate that they might at any time dispose of subject to the rights of their father, and an estate that would pass by inheritance in the event of the death of any of the children. The essential difference between this case and the Dohn Case is that in the Dohn Case the children did not, as held in the opinion, take under the will any present interest in the estate. Here they did. It follows from this construction of the will that M. M. Hubbard inherited two thirds of the estate from his deceased daughters, and therefore no part of the principal of the estate to which Mrs. Redman was or is entitled was paid to him. He has a life interest in the estate that can be subjected to the payment of the debt, and this is all that the court did in a judgment directing that the land should be rented out until the debt was paid or the death of M. M. Hubbard, his residuary estate in trust to pay over the net income to his wife for life, and after her decease then to convey, assign, transfer, and set over unto his children "in equal proportions, share and share alike (the issue of any of such children who may have died before the death of my said wife taking per stirpes the share that their deceased parent would have taken if living)," was held to manifest an intention to limit the gift over to the children who should be living at the death of the wife, and to the issue of any child then dead who should survive her decease.

In Dougherty v. Thompson, 167 N. Y. 472, 60 N. E. 760, a testator created a trust for the benefit of a nephew and his family, directing an annual sum to be paid to the nephew for life and the residue of the net income to be divided among the nephew's wife and children. Upon the death of the nephew and his wife, the trust was to cease and the trust property transferred over to their children, and if any of said children should have died leaving issue, such issue should take their parent's share. One of the nephew's children having died without widow or issue surviving him, during the continuance of the trust, the question arose as to whether his share passed under his will. It was held that, the gift being found in a direction to pay or distribute at a future time; and there being no indication that the estate was to be benefited by postponement of distribution, or its convenience further promoted by it than to facilitate the immediate partition and application of the income; and the inference of an intention to postpone vesting drawn from the form of the gift being strengthened by testator's general scheme; and the grandnephew's share of the income during the continuance of the term being less than the income of his ultimate share in the corpus, the grandnephew took nothing which passed under his will; the court finding it unnecessary to explicitly decide whether his interest was contingent or one vested subject to be devested by his death during the continuance of the trust.

that under a will by which testator provided that upon the death of the survivor of his two daughters, to whom he had given a life estate, "all the real estate so devised shall be sold and the proceeds divided equally among my grandchildren, share and share alike, and if any of my grandchildren shall die leaving issue then surviving, such issue shall take the portion their parents would have been entitled to had they been living," a grandchild took no present gift which would pass to his trustee in bankruptcy, but only a contingent future gift; the real intent of the testator being that those who should neither survive the daughters nor leave issue surviving them should take nothing; but that the whole proceeds should be divided among those grandchildren or their issue who did so survive.

In Cummings v. Hamilton, 220 Ill. 480, 77 N. E. 264, where testatrix, after giving her husband a life estate in certain realty, devised it after his death to three persons named, further providing that in case of the death of either of the three "(prior to the death of my husband or prior to my decease) leaving a child or children, then in that case such child or children, or the descendants of such child or children, shall inherit the share of the real estate which would have vested in their parents under the sixth and last provision above made," it was held that although the gift of the remainder was by words of present devise, and not conditioned upon the remaindermen surviving the life tenant, the expression "which would have vested in their parents" was significant to show that it was the purpose of the testatrix that the remainder was not to vest in the parent unless the parent survived the life tenant; and therefore the land was not subject to partition until the death of the life tenant. The court in this case stated it to be immaterial whether the remainder is to be regarded as contingent, or as vested subject contingent to be devested.

In People v. Byrd, 253 Ill. 223, 97 N. E. 293, where testator gave his wife, should she survive him, his residuary estate, both real and personal, during life, and upon if this event took place before the debt was paid.

It is said, however, that by a judgment of the Larue circuit court in the case of M. M. Hubbard and Mrs. Redman v. Jacob Hubbard, the appellee herein, and others, from which no appeal was prosecuted and which stands unmodified, it was finally adjudicated that M. M. Hubbard did not inherit any estate from his deceased daughters. The chief purpose of the action in the Larue circuit court was to enjoin the sheriff from selling under an execution in favor of Jacob Hubbard an undivided two thirds interest in the land in Larue county. The land was sought to be subjected upon the theory that M. M. Hubbard inherited two thirds of it from his deceased daughters. The lower court enjoined the sale of the land under the execution, and also adjudged that M. M. Hubbard did not take any part of the principal estate by inheritance from his deceased daughters. The judgment in so far as it enjoined the sale of the land was manifestly correct, because in virtually all this land M. M. Hubbard only had a life estate with a vested remainder in his daughter, Mrs. Redman, he having received from the trustee practically all of the estate inherited from his deceased daughters. But so much of the judgment as held that M. M. Hubbard did not take any estate by inheritance from his deceased daughters cannot in any event be res judicata of the question here presented, for the reason that many years before this action was brought her death to his children, naming them, "share and share alike; and if either of my said children, Anne, Lucy, William, or Francis, die leaving issue either before me or before my said wife, then the issue of the child so dying shall take the share which his, her, or their parent would have taken if living at the death," it was held that the language of the clause above set forth clearly evidenced an intention that the remainder given to the children should be contingent upon their surviving the life tenant, the court saying that if the clause had ended with the words "share and share alike," there would be much force in the contention that the remainder was vested, and that the words "upon her death" merely referred to the time when the devisees were to come into the enjoyment of the estate, but that the latter part of the clause clearly indicates that a child, in order to take under the will, must be living at the death of the life tenant. And it was further held that such conclusion was supported by the fact that by the succeeding clause of the will testator provided that if his wife should not survive him, he gave all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate to his children, naming them, share and share alike, and if either of them should die before testator leaving issue, then the issue of the child so dying should take the share which its parent would have taken if living at testator's death,—showing that the words "if living at her death" in the preceding clause were used advisedly. The ultimate question in this case was as to whether the remainder was subject to an inheritance tax. Had the remainder vested in the children living at testator's death, the amount taken by each would have been exempt; whereas, the devise being construed as one to the children surviving the widow and the issue of such as might predecease her, such was not the case.

In Acken v. Osborn, 45 N. J. Eq. 377, 17 Atl. 767, where a testator directed that the income of his residuary estate should be paid to his daughter during her life, and that after her decease the principal "shall be equally divided among such children of 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

my said daughter as she may then have, provided always that if any child of my said daughter shall die before its mother leaving children or a child, such child or children shall take the share of such deceased parent," it was held that the remainder taken by the daughter's children was contingent upon their surviving her.

In Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295, a testator, after a limitation to his wife for life, provided as follows: "At the death of my said wife the said plantation with all its rights and interests, I bequeath and devise to our seven sons [naming them], or such of them as may be living at their mother's death, and to their heirs, share and share alike; and if any one or more of our said sons should be dead leaving lawful issue, such issue shall take the deceased father's share in each and every such case." It was held that the limitation to each of the sons was not of a remainder vesting at testator's decease, but a remainder upon a contingency with a double aspect, vesting on the mother's death.

In Re Albiston, 117 Wis. 272, 94 N. W. 169, a testator gave all his property to his wife for life, and after her death gave, devised, and bequeathed one half thereof to her brothers and sisters, share and share alike, adding: "If any of her said brothers or sisters have died or shall die before my said wife, the share which would have gone to him or her shall be equally divided between his or her children, share and share alike." It was held that the fact that there are no words of present devise or bequest, and the expression "the share which would have gone to him or her," clearly indicated that the testator's idea was that the time when the bequest was to go or become effective was at the death of his wife, and not before, and therefore that the beneficiaries were to be determined as of that time.

In Darnell v. Barton, 75 Ga. 377, where testator, after giving all his property to his wife for life, directed that after her death "all the remainder of my said property be sold by my executors, and be equally divided among my children; and in the in the Larue circuit court, an action was brought in the Jefferson chancery court to settle the accounts of the trustee under the will, to which action Mrs. Redman was a party. In this action, the question was raised as to whether or not M. M. Hubbard inherited the estate of his deceased daughters, and it was held by both Chancellors Edwards and Miller that he did; and, in accordance with their decision, the settlement of the trustee, in which it appeared that M. M. Hubbard had been paid a large part of the estate that came to him by inheritance from his deceased daughters, was confirmed. We are therefore of the opinion that the judgment of the Larue circuit court in so far as it conflicted with the judgment of the Jefferson chancery court previously rendered, and which has never been modified, was a nullity. The judgment event that any of my children should die prior to the death of their said mother, leaving a child or children living, then I desire said child or children so left should stand in the place of its or their deceased parent, and heir a child's part; that is, the part that the deceased parent would have taken if living,"—it was held that as it was only the remainder or residue of the estate not consumed by the wife of testator which was to be sold and divided, and, as the mention of grandchildren as taking if their parent should be dead showed an intention to exclude the widow of a deceased son, who would otherwise share with her child had the son taken a vested remainder, the remainder was contingent upon surviving the life tenant.

In Re Crane, 164 N. Y. 79, 58 N. E. 47, where a testator created a trust the term of which was measured by the life of his wife, providing: "Upon the decease of my said wife, I order and direct that my estate be divided as follows: namely, equally between my brothers and sisters and my niece; and after directing the shares of some of them to be held in trust, provided further: "That if any of my said brothers and sisters and niece shall depart this life before my said wife, leaving lawful issue him or her surviving, then the share of the one so dying shall be paid over to their issue in equal shares. Should they leave no lawful issue him or her surviving, then the share is to be divided among the survivors and the lawful issue of any one or more of them who shall have died leaving lawful issue him or her surviving, each one of the said survivors taking one equal share thereof, and the lawful issue of anyone deceased to take the share of the parents." The testator's seven brothers and sisters and his niece survived him, but all died during the lifetime of the widow, four leaving issue who survived the widow, and four without issue. It was held that there being no direct gift of the principal of the trust estate, but instead a direction to divide it on the death of testator's widow, and the gift being of money and the direction to convert the estate absolute, and no contrary intention being manifested by the will, the remainder was a contingent one, and not one vested subject to be divested as to any of the parties by their death prior to the decease of testator's widow, and in case of the death of a party leaving issue, then on such death vesting the share of the parent in the issue.

Atl. 662, where a testator devised his real estate to his widow for life, and directed his executors at her death to sell it and divide the proceeds among his children, naming them, in certain proportions, and further provided: "In case either of my above said children shall die before the division of my estate as hereinbefore directed, having lawful issue, such issue shall receive the deceased parent's share; but if there be no such issue, then such share shall fall into the general fund to be divided among the survivors in the manner hereinbefore provided," it was held that this provision made the interests of the children clearly contingent.

In Oliver's Estate, 199 Pa. 509, 49 Atl. 215, the will of a decedent gave his estate to his wife during widowhood, and at her death or remarriage, "then the same shall be divided" as follows, to wit: To my son Robert Oliver, one half of all my real estate, household furniture of whatsoever kind. And the other half to be equally divided, share and share alike, among Joseph Oliver, Martha Burchill, Sarah Ann Lenhard. I further direct that in case any of the said persons named shall die before the division of my estate, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall receive the parent's legacy; but, if without such issue, the legacy to him or her therein given shall revert to and become part of my general estate, and be divided equally among the other children then living, share and share alike." It was held that the remainder was not vested, but that Robert Oliver having died during the life of the widow without leaving children, his share was to be divided between the others.

In Magill v. McMillan, 23 Hun, 193, a testator gave his estate in trust to apply and pay over the net income to his five children in equal proportions, until one, or, in case of such one's death before then, another, should attain the age of twenty-one years, at which time he directed that his estate should be converted into money and divided between his said children equally, share and share alike, adding: "Should any of my children die before such distribution, leaving issue her surviving, such issue shall take the share his or her or their parents would have been entitled to if living, and in same manner, that is, in equal shares." It was held that there being no immediate gift to the children, but all the estate being given to the executors to be divided at the termination of the trust, the right to share in the distribution was contingent upon of the Jefferson chancery court was and is binding upon the parties to this action, and, as it was there correctly determined that M. M. Hubbard inherited two thirds of the estate from his deceased daughters, it is manifest that the Larue circuit court had no power in a subsequent action to modify or annul the judgment of the Jefferson chancery court. It may be well to add that we do not determine on this appeal whether or not M. M. Hubbard is entitled as heir of his deceased daughters to any part of the land in Larue county. He may or not have an interest as such heir in a part of this land, this depending upon how much of the principal he received from the estate devised.

Wherefore the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

the duration of life of the beneficiary until that time.

In Fulkerson v. Bullard, 3 Sneed, 260, where a testator directed that his negroes should be hired out for the benefit of his estate for five years, and at the expiration of such time divided equally amongst all my children; "and in case any of my children should die before the time aforesaid, leaving lawful children, said last-mentioned children shall take the share of their parents in said negroes," it was held that the bequest to the children was not vested, but that the clause quoted showed a contrary intention; and therefore that the bequest was to a class answering the description at the end of the designated time.

In Spengler v. Kuhn, 212 Ill. 186, 72 N. E. 214, testator created a trust for the benefit of his wife during widowhood, providing that upon her death or remarriage, the trust estate should be divided equally between his children, share and share alike, "and if in the meanwhile any or some of my children shall have died leaving a descendant or descendants, such deceased child's share shall go to his or her issue, descendant, or descendants." It was held that as the testator plainly manifested an intention that those to take should be determined at the time of the expiration of the trust, the estate did not vest in the children of the testator at his death, for the reason that it could not then be known that any child of his would survive the termination of the trust and become entitled to it, and therefore did not pass to their trustee in bankruptcy.

Instances in which remainder is held vested.

In Hatfield v. Sohler, 114 Mass. 48, where a testatrix devised certain realty to a daughter to her sole and separate use, "and to the children or child of the said Louisa, or the issue of any deceased child, in equal proportions," it was held that, construing the devise as one of a life estate to the daughter, and a remainder to her children, upon established rules of law the remainder vested in the children at the death of testatrix, opening to let in after-born children: so that upon the death of an after-born child his estate passed by inheritance to his mother.

In West v. Smith, — S. C. —, 72 S. E. 395, a testator bequeathed property in trust for his married daughter for life, providing that on her death the property 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

should pass to his daughter's "child or children and to the issue of any deceased child or children; the child or children of such deceased child or children representing and taking the share or shares to which his, her, or their deceased parent or parents would have been entitled had they survived the said" daughter. It was held that the devise in remainder not being to the child or children of the daughter who might survive her, but to her child or children generally, it created a vested remainder; so that upon the death of the grandchildren in the lifetime of their mother, without children, their shares passed by inheritance.

In Pike v. Stephenson, 99 Mass. 188, in which the question before the court was whether a remainderman dying without children during the continuance of the life estate had an heritable interest, it was held that in the provisions of the will, by which testator, after giving his daughter a life estate in certain realty, provided: "In the event of her decease, I do then give, devise, and bequeath the same in equal shares to the children of said [life tenant], and the children of any deceased child of said [life tenant], who shall take the parent's share by representation, to hold to them and their heirs and assigns forever," there was nothing to control the presumption that all devises and bequests vest upon the death of the testator, the devise over not being restricted to such of the daughter's children or grandchildren only as might survive her, but being to all her children and the children of any deceased child.

In Thyng v. Lane, 69 N. H. 403, 43 Atl. 616, a bequest of a sum of money to testator's son for life, and after the death of the son "to the children of the said William and the legal representatives of such as may be dead, to be equally divided between them, giving to the legal representatives of any deceased child the same share to which such deceased child, if living, would be entitled," was held to give the grandchildren an interest vesting upon the death of testator, the words looking to the future apparently relating to the time when possession of the property was to be taken, instead of the time when the right to the property was to arise and therefore the interest of a grandchild dying during the continuance of the life estate descended to its mother.

In Re Heinze, 20 Misc. 371, 46 N. Y. Supp. 247, it was held that under a testamentary provision by which testator gave the corpus of a trust fund created for the benefit of his wife during her life, to his children "and the issue of any deceased child or children, to be equally divided between them, such issue, however, to take by representation the share which the parent would have taken if living," the remainder in the trust fund became vested in testator's children at the time of his decease.

In McComb v. McComb, 96 Va. 779, 32 S. E. 453, where testator, after giving one sixth of his residuary estate to each of his four daughters, provided that, at their respective deaths, what each should receive under such provision "shall pass and belong absolutely to their respective children and to the descendants or descendant of any that may have died leaving issue, such to take what its deceased parent would have taken if alive," it was held that there was nothing in the language of the clause, when read alone or in connection with other provisions of the will, to show any special intention that the remainder given should vest at the death of the life tenant; but that the fact that in prior clauses of the will testator, after giving certain property for life, gave the remainder at the death of life tenants to their "children then living and to descendants or descendant of any that may have died leaving issue, such to take what its parent would have taken if alive," thus manifesting his intention that the remainder should not vest until the death of the life tenant, showed that in the clause under construction a different intention was manifest.

In Little v. Brown, 126 N. C. 752, 36 S. E. 175, it was held that a testamentary provision as follows: "At my wife's death it is my will and desire that all the property and estate, real and personal, that I have left to her for life, shall be equally divided among my children, and the issue of any deceased child or children," when read with the concluding clause of the same item: "It being my intention that all my children shall receive an equal share in valuation of all my estate, real and personal, left to my wife for life," clearly manifested an intention to give the children a vested remainder.

In Kean v. Tilford, 81 Ky. 600, it was held that the interest created by a testamentary provision that after the death of the testator's wife, his property should be divided between his children, the children of any who might be dead receiving the share of the parent, was a vested interest. The question before the court was whether the interest was so vested that the property might be partitioned.

In Gibbens v. Gibbens, 140 Mass. 102, 54 Am. Rep. 453, 3 N. E. 1, testator provided that at the decease of his wife all his estate, real and personal, "shall go to and be equally divided among my children, the issue of a deceased child standing in the place of the parent." One of the children having died in the lifetime of the mother, without issue, the question arose as to whether her share passed under her will; 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) and it was held that while the meaning of the testator is open to some doubt, yet (there being no words of contingency as to the children who shall take, but the devise being generally to the testator's children, not merely to those surviving at the termination of the precedent estate, the issue of a deceased child standing in the place of the parent), the case falls within the general rule that a vested remainder will be held to have been intended in the case of a devise to testator's children, unless there is something sufficient to show the contrary. The court said: "An argument in favor of contingency is drawn from the use of the words, 'the issue of a deceased child standing in the place of the parent.' It is urged that such issue, if there were any, would take at all events; that the parent could not have disposed of his or her share, to their exclusion; and that therefore the interest of the parent was not an absolute vested one. It is contended, on the other hand, that the interest of Harriet was a vested remainder, subject only to be divested by her death in the lifetime of her mother, leaving issue. . . . But in the present case we do not find it necessary to consider whether Harriet's interest was liable to be divested by the birth and survivorship of issue or not. It is quite as natural and probable to infer that the words above quoted were used for the purpose of showing clearly that the testator did not intend the devise to lapse, in the case of the death of one of his children, leaving issue. Words to the effect that the issue of deceased children shall take by right of representation are not uncommon in wills when, strictly speaking, they are entirely unnecessary; and the use of so familiar and common an expression does not carry with it a strong inference that the testator thereby designed to express some peculiar intention with reference to the vesting or contingency of the interest divised."

In Ackerman v. Ackerman, 63 App. Div. 370, 71 N. Y. Supp. 780, a testator gave a power of sale to his executors and a life estate in all property to his widow, further providing: "Upon the death of my said wife, or in case she does not survive me, I give, devise, and bequeath to my three children [naming them] all my estate, real and personal, to be divided between them, share and share alike, the share of such of my children as may be deceased to be divided equally among his or her heirs, if any there be, the share of such child or children to be held in trust and placed at interest on good security until said heir or heirs have attained their majority; but in case there should be no such heir or heirs, or such heirs should be deceased before they have attained their majority, then and in that case the share of such heir or heirs shall be equally divided among my surviving children." It was held that, as the possible event of the death of the devisees was clearly shown by the expression "upon the death of my said wife, or in case she does not survive me, I give," etc., to refer to the time of testator's own death, and not to that of his wife, the remainder vested at the time of testator's death.

In Taylor v. Stephens, 165 Ind. 200, 74 N. E. 980, testator, after giving his wife a life estate in his realty, provided and "at the decease of my said wife I desire that said lands be owned equally and jointly by my children [naming them], or in case of the decease of any of said children, his or her share to descend to the heirs of their bodies, if any, and if not, to those surviving." One of testator's children having died, apparently without issue, a proceeding was instituted by his administrator to subject his interest in said lands to the payment of debts and the widow's statutory allowance. The court based its conclusion, that the children of the testator took a vested remainder at his death, upon the argument that words of survivorship in a will are to be construed as referring to the death of the testator in all cases where the words of the instrument are not such as clearly to show that they refer to a subsequent date, which rule of interpretation was stated to find justification in the fact that, in most wills wherein language is used which upon superficial consideration might seem to lead to the conclusion that it was the design of the testator to postpone the vesting of the estate beyond his own death, an adequate explanation is found in the general tendency of testators to look forward to the time when the devisee will enjoy the estate in possession, and to overlook the proposition that it is necessary that, at or prior to the time of entering upon the possession, the right to the property should vest; holding that the language of the testator was not persuasive of a purpose upon his part to postpone the vesting of the remainder. With reference to the expression used by the testator which brings this case within the scope of the present discussion, the court said: "We have not failed to observe that in the latter part of the language quoted the will provides that in case of the decease of a child his share shall descend to the heirs of his body. This does not prevent the view that the class was to be ascertained at the death of the testator. The children were in esse, and it is evident that, if the words 'heirs of their bodies' were not used as words of limitation, the gift to such heirs was substitutional, and, as said in Williams, Real Prop. 17th ed. 287: 'The heirs are no objects of the testator's bounty, further than as connected with their ancestor.' It is to be recollected that the testator was providing for the disposition of his estate by will, and, even if the bequest were to operate as an executory devise (a construction not favored), it would still follow that the case was one wherein the testator was by will giving direction concerning his property; and therefore we would not be doing violence to the testator's intention, as manifested by his language, to hold that the word 'descend' was used in the sense of 'go to.' A construction which has often been adopted in will cases."

In Meyer v. Eisler, 29 Md. 28, a testator gave his residuary estate to be held in trust until the end of twenty years from and after his death, or until his youngest child should arrive at the age of twenty years, when the whole was to be divided and paid over, one third to the wife, if living, "and the other two third parts to all my children, share and share alike, as well the children by my first wife as the child or children by my present wife, Ann Meyer; and in the event of the death of either of my said children leaving lawful issue, such issue to have and receive the share or proportion that the deceased would have been entitled to if living." One of testator's daughters having died without issue before the termination of the precedent estate, the question arose as to the rights of her surviving husband; and it was held that, there being nothing on the face of the will to indicate the intention of testator to postpone the vesting of the estate till the happening of the event named, the daughter had at his death a vested estate, in which her husband was entitled to assert his statutory rights.

In Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 118, a testator, after giving a life estate in all his realty to his wife, provided as follows: "From and after the decease and death of my beloved wife, . . . I give and bequeath all my real estate then being . . . to all my children, and to their heirs and assigns forever, to be equally divided, share and share alike, and should any of my children die and leave lawful heirs, such heirs to receive the portion that their parent would have been entitled to had such parent lived; namely, after the death of my beloved wife, I give to my son John A. Livingston one equal share," and so on, naming all his children. It was held that the language used in the provision quoted referred to a death in the lifetime of the testator, and therefore that the children took a vested remainder at his death; but that even if the death of any of his children had referred to their death after the testator's and before his widow's, it was a death leaving children, so that their estates were not divested by their dying without children.

In Embury v. Sheldon, 68 N. Y. 227, testator gave his residuary estate in trust for the benefit of his wife and children during the lifetime of his wife and of one of his sons, and devised the remainder of the estate, after the termination of the trust, to his four children, with the direction: "In the case of the death of Anna, Daniel, or Philip, leaving lawful issue surviving them, I direct that such issue shall take of income as well as principal, the share which the parent would have been entitled to if living; and should no lawful issue survive them, the share of the one so dying shall go to the survivors of the last above-named persons, and the children of my son, James W., in equal proportions, per stirpes, and not per capita." The language of the clause quoted was held, in the absence of any other controlling provision showing a contrary intention, to refer to a death in the lifetime of testator; so that the share in remainder of a son became vested upon the death of his father, and upon his decease during the continuance of the precedent estate, passed under his will.

In Heberton v. McClain, 135 Fed. 226, it was held that under a will by which testatrix gave her residuary estate to her husband for life, and upon his death equally to and between her daughters, adding: "Should either of them die leaving issue, such issue is to take and receive the share of its parent," the interest taken by the two daughters in the residuary estate was vested.

In Re Jennings, 28 N. Y. Week. Dig. 807, 15 N. Y. S. R. 807, 1 N. Y. Supp. 565, where a testator gave among certain legacies, one to a grandson, and directed the residue to be invested for the benefit of his widow during her life, after whose demise the whole estate to be equally divided into five parts, one of which was to be paid to the grandson, and in case of his death to his children, it was held that, as the legacy payable immediately to the grandson was free from contingencies, and the time of payment of the other legacy was postponed for the convenience of the estate, to let in and subserve the interests of the widow, both legacies to the grandson vested in him at the death of the testator.

In Reed's Appeal, 118 Pa. 215, 4 Am. St. Rep. 588, 11 Atl. 787, testator directed certain realty to be sold, and, after reciting the fact that he had nine grandchildren, directed that the net proceeds should be divided into nine equal parts, and that his executors should, for the period of twelve years from his death, keep such proceeds invested and pay over to each of his grandchildren named in the will one ninth of the interest thereof annually, "or if any of them have died leaving heirs, then pay the same to said heirs, and at the full expiration of twelve years from the time of my decease, shall in like manner pay over the principal. But neither interest or principal shall be liable to attachment." It was held that, although the gift was not a direct one in terms, yet, as the remaindermen were to enjoy the interest during the continuance of the precedent estate, it was nevertheless a substantive one; and that the provision that neither principal nor interest should be liable to attachment, coupled with the trust, was insufficient to prevent the vesting of the legacies at the time of testator's decease.

In Richardson's Appeal, 3 Sadler (Pa.) 217, 19 W. N. C. 175, 6 Atl. 204, where testator gave his residuary estate to his wife for life, and upon her decease directed that it be sold by his executor and the moneys arising therefrom divided between his children, naming them, share and share alike, and if any of such children should be deceased leaving issue, then the share the parent would have been entitled to if living should go to such issue, it was held that the interest of the children was a vested one during the life of the widow.

In Kinkad v. Ryan, 65 N. J. Eq. 726, 55 Atl. 730, it was held that under a will by which testator gave his estate to his wife for life, and after her death to his children, share and share alike, and to their heirs and assigns forever, with the further provision: "If any of my said children should die before my said wife, then it is my will that upon my wife's death the share of my said estate which would have gone to such deceased child if living shall go to the heirs of such deceased child," a son took a vested remainder, which was capable of being sold under execution in the lifetime of his mother.

In Byrnes v. Stilwell, 103 N. Y. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 760, 9 N. E. 241, a testator devised to his daughter certain realty during her natural life, and after her decease "unto the lawful child or children of my said daughter, his, her, or their heirs forever, if more than one, share and share alike, as tenants in common; and, in case any or either of the children of my said daughter Maria at the time of her death be dead, leaving a lawful child or children him or her surviving, such child or children shall take the share or portion which his, her, or their parent would have been entitled to if living; to have and hold to him, her, or them, and their heirs forever." Some of the daughter's children who were living at the death of testator having died during the lifetime of their mother, without leaving issue, the question arose as to whether they took such a vested estate in the lands as was alienable or devisable by them or descendible from them. It was held that no words of survivorship being found in the will to indicate an intention of testator that the surviving brothers and sisters were to take in the event of the death of any of his daughter's children without issue, the remainder taken by the children vested at testator's decease, subject only to open and let in children born thereafter.

In Swerer v. Ohio Wesleyan University, 27 Ohio C. C. 144, 6 Ohio C. C. N. S. 185, a will contained the following provision: "I give, devise, and bequeath to my grandson Bert L. Rees and to my grandson Walter B. Huffman, share and share alike [certain realty], in the following manner, to wit, my executor hereinafter named is to have and to hold the same in trust for the term of ten years; to collect the rents arising therefrom, . . . and to pay the net balance of such income equally to my two grandsons aforesaid, or the lawful children of such grandchildren in case of the death of either or both of said grandsons before the expiration of said ten years; and at the expiration of said ten years after my decease, my executor shall turn over to my said grandsons, or in case of the decease of either of said grandsons before said term of ten years shall have lapsed, without lawful issue of said decedent, then the share of such grandson to go to the surviving grandson and to his heirs and assigns forever," the said real estate. It was held that, as the will showed that no other persons except these grandsons were in the mind of the testatrix as beneficiaries, and that, as the devise was not to the trustee, but, direct to the grandsons, the testatrix intended to give the grandsons an immediate vested interest therein.
